Albert Leighton passed to the higher life, from his home in East Pepperell, Mass., Jan. 2, aged 90 years. I think no one enjoyed The Progressive Thinker more than he, and he has been much interested in The Light Among the Hills. He thought so much of that little poem, "A Future Thought," you published a short time ago, that in accordance with his wish, it was repeated at the funeral by his brother.

GEO. F. LEIGHTON.

Haverhill, Mass.

James Essicar Hyde passed to spirit life in the town of Roendale, Wis., aged 84 years. Beneath the rough exterior was a soul honest and true, which would not tolerate deception. For more than forty years he has been a confirmed Spiritualist; always a subscriber to, and reader of, one or more spiritual papers. This beautiful truth has been a solace in his declining years, taking away all fear of death and supporting him in his terible suffering as the end approached.

I was suddenly called to Decatur, Ill., to conduct the funeral services of one of the noblest sisters, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thos S. Kizer. Mrs. Rosa F. Newlen passed to spirit life, Jan. 4, 1904, at her home in Decatur, after a short illness, aged 44 years. I learned a beautiful lesson from her pure life, and I trust the example she set will be more closely followed in the future by all who knew her.

MRS. THOS. J. SHERIDAN.

January 11, 1904, J. R. Ward, of Pittsfield, Ohio, passed to the higher life after a long and painful illness, at the age of 90. A veteran Spiritualist. He leaves a wife who was a good medium in the early days of Modern Spiritualism. It was his request that services be conducted by a Spiritualist. Mrs. Anna E. Baird, of Elyria, officiated. Shortly before he expired, with a smile he extended his hand, clasping that of his spirit sister, calling her by name, saying, "They have come for me." He soon closed his eyes, sleeping his last earthly sleep. He awoke in the land where there is no more pain, but with the knowledge that he can return to cheer the dear ones who will miss his presence from this earthly home.

The Light of the Truth Society meets each Sunday at the northwest corner of 47th street and Cottage Grove avenue. Conference at 3 p. m., and lecture and tests at 8 o'clock. Mrs. M. A. Burland, pastor.

VOLNEY'S RUINS

—AND—

THE LAW OF NATURE,

TO WHICH IS ADDED

Volney's Answer to Dr. Priestly, a Biographical Notice by Count Daru, and the Zodiacal Signs and Constellations by the Editor;

Printed on heavy paper, from new plates, in large, clear type, with portrait and illustrations. One vol., post 8 vo, 248 pages; paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

This is undoubtedly one of the best and most useful books ever published. It eloquently advocates the best interests of mankind, and clearly points out the sources of human ignorance and misery. The author is supposed to meet in the ruins of Palmyra an apparition or phantom, which explains the true principles of society, and the causes of both the prosperity and the ruin of ancient states. A general assembly of the nations is at length convened, a legislative body formed, the source and origin of religion, of government, and of laws discussed, and the Law of Nature—founded on justice and equity—is finally proclaimed to an expectant world.

The Law of Correspondence

Applied to Healing.

Read and Think for Yourself! Study the Occult and the Scientific Problems!

"Come let us reason together, with charity for all and malice toward none," was said to all the world, and is still echoing down the ages, to the annihilation of old superstition and ignorance and the upliftment of the human mind and soul, and Spiritualism shouts it again to the world through The Progressive Thinker, which makes its regular weekly visits to every country on the earth, and contains all the latest occult literature afloat, and the very cream of the scientific and philosophic world.

The Progressive Thinker.

VOL. 29. CHICAGO, ILL., JAN. 30, 1904. NO. 740.

THE GREAT MYSTERY OF SPIRIT FORMS

NUMBER FIVE.

The aim of this chapter is to show that the Spirit Form of every living Spiritualist (who has not passed out) is an evolved form.

The same is of course true of those who have realized their transition.

What, then, is the nature of this evolved Spirit Form or man?

That is; both on this side, and that?

If, after my own Spirit passes out (it is ever seen on Earth again), such a visual knowledge will be due to the fact, that my Spirit will possess its form.

And this, form, figure, or shape—apart from the matter or substance of which it is composed—will possess the distinct classes of forces and motions peculiar to the expression of the nature of the "substance," of this evolved Spirit Form.

In order to assist myself temporarily in this analysis, I will define my own spirit, as my Psychological-Vital-Self.

I give to my Spirit this definition, for four reasons.

First, to emphasize the fact that my Spirit is psychological in its nature, and not physical.

Second, that being vital, it possesses its own order of life.

Third, that as a Self it possesses a distinct individuality.

Fourth, that the realization (by the sense of sight) of the existence of my Spirit, implies the transmutation of some physiological substance, out of which the Form of my Spirit was evolved.

To make all of this clear, let me make plain, in what way, and by what evolutionary method, my spirit was evolved in the first place.

To do this, I must begin by referring to myself as a Dual Being.

I have two selves, two wills, two bodies, two lives, two forms.

Each has its own distinct unity of form, force and motion.

By a rough metaphor, I may explain my duality by asserting that the higher of my two selves has the joints of its wings limed to the egg shell of the former self out of which it sprang.

The law of evolution posits, as the only condition of its existence, that my higher self, will, body, life and form, must evolve out of my lower self, i. e., become a distinct unity of living being, possessing its own distinct unity of form, force, and motion.

If I identify both of these selves as one; and in an indistiguishable unity; then there is no evolution; no butterfly is ever evolved from its pupa, or chrysalis; the gorgeous humming-bird is, on this principle, forever regarded as identical with the egg out of which it sprang.

My Dual Self, or Soul, therefore implies, as the possibility of its existence, two Vital systems of reconstructive, vital dynamics, viz., two unities of vital forms, forces and motions.

One of these selves, or unities, I call my Spirit or Psychological-Vital-Self. The other, my Physiological-Vital-Self.

But; these two Selves appear as one self, one will, one life, one form, one consciousness. This unity is a self-delusion. The illusion of the one self had its primary origin in the self-constructive laws of Physiological Hunger.

But the laws of Hunger themselves evolved, viz., to a desire to get, keep, reproduce, and reconstruct spiritual or mental images.

Out of this self-constructive action of what has now become Psychological Hunger (as distinguished from Physiogical—Hunger) has evolved my spirit or Psychological-Vital-Self.

When this phase of evolution took place within me, the nature of the form, forces, and motions of my self was altered.

If some portion of the more lowly, Vital dynamics of my Self, could not be altered, changed, or evolved to spirit the ordinary association of ideas, and its laws, would be impossible.

The evolution of the vital nature of a Self, or Spirit, always implies an evolution in the nature, of the form, forces and motions of that self.

When that form of Nature which we call water is changed into steam, the nature of its form, force and motion is altered. Change water into the gases H.O., and the nature of its motion, form and force is again changed. Change water into ice, and we have another change in its form, force and motion. Thus; heated water—as steam—laughingly lifts up the kettle lid; roguishly assists in playing the calliope at the circus; and drives the express train in triumph from Chicago to New York. If water possessed no natural capacity to evolve into steam (under certain conditions) the forms, forces and motions of steam could have no existence.

So when that force of Nature which we call Vital is changed into the Psychological or Spiritual, the nature of its form, force and motion is altered. In the evolution of water into steam a more powerful class of forms, forces, and motions are developed.

The Same holds true in the evolution of Psychological or Spiritual from lower Vital forms, forces, and motions.

The Soul Self, or Ego, acquires a new and more vast range of powers.

The vital powers, which get, keep, reproduce and reconstruct cells, are expressed in those feelings which we call Hunger and Coenaesthesia.

When; in addition to the construction of cells, these vital powers become evolved to such a degree, that they can keep and construct mental images; a new self-constructive series of loftier forces, motions, and forms are evolved (sub-consciously) in the Self.

If the Vital powers of the Self possessed no capacity of evolving into Psychological forms, the development of all the higher forms of human intelligence would be impossible. That is; I consider the Vital forces (of my Self or Ego) as the nebulae, that keeps the Psychological Sun of the Soul burning as an entirely new and independent system of force and motion?

After its evolution, this Psychological Self, or Spirit, attracts the nebulae, or misty forms of the Vital Forces to itself as a condition for re-expression. God creates my Soul on the same principle that He created the sun, viz., my Soul was once in a condition of psychological nebulae. Thus; my psychological Self or Spirit had its origin in my lower Vital Self.

Otherwise, the word evolution has no meaning when applied to the spirit or Self; for the term evolution (as the very condition of its possibility as a universal law) unvaryingly posits a lower state as an absolute condition for the development of a higher.

This is why, in my perverse admiration for the plan of evolution, I often disclaim all nationality; and stoutly insist that my father and mother proudly belonged to the oldest of the ape families of the zoological gardens; not to the family of the archangels.

Thus, when my broader, lower Vital Self was sub-consciously evolved, a new and broader Psychological Self was subsequently evolved as its consequence. In my own experience this was illustrated at Puberty, when my Vital Forces (of Hunger, and Coenaesthesia, in connection with another organic constructive force) attempted the reproduction of the Species. Prior to this time these Vital Forces had been chiefly concerned with the organic reproduction of myself as an Organic Individual.

But, at Puberty a new Psychological Self or Spirit appeared. The following paragraph may illustrate what I mean, i. e., as illustrative of the sudden appearance of a phase of this evolved Psychological Self or Spirit.

When new organs come into action—after a primitive period of quiescence with the total revolution produced in the organism—innumerable sensations, new desires, vague, or distinct ideas, and novel impulses pass into the consciousness in a very brief space of time. Little by little they penetrate to the circle of primitive ideas. And finally become an integral part of the Ego. Which by the same token is completely transformed. It is renewed. The sentiment of personality undergoes a radical metamorphosis. Until assimilation is complete, this penetration and disintegration of the primitive Ego is accompanied by extreme commotion in the consciousness.

Thus; the evolution of my Ego, Self, or Soul, from birth to puberty, implied, as the possibility of its development, a Vital system of constructive dynamics, viz., the evolution of an ascending, self-constructive series of complex forces, motions and forms.

But; as already shown, my personal evolution did not stop with my development as a physically organic being. My physical organism possesses its own system of forms, forces and motions.

My Psychological Self or Spirit has also been evolved; and its evolution implies also the existence of its own special system of transcendental dynamics, viz., its own system of forms, forces, and motions.

The harmonious temporary union of the motions of the forces of the forms, of my Psychological-Vital-Self, to the motions of the forces of the forms of my Physiological Vital Self, is my ideo-motor activity.

But, these two Selves (being, in a sense, independent in nature) may become disunited; and act independent of each other; viz., in mystic or intellectual ecstasy; or, at death.

Abnormally; they become disunited in certain cases of insanity.

Genius implies a relative disunion of the Spirit or Psychological-Vital-Self, from (and, at the expense of) the Physiological-Vital-Self.

Examples are seen in the cases of Newton, Pascal, Gauss, Scott, Archimedes, La Fontaine, Dante, Plato, Hamilton, French, Vieta, La Bruyere's, Hill, Hogarth, Sheridan, Sidney Smith, Jonathan Edwards, Macaulay, and Lessing.

In mystical, religious ecstasy, this disunion was also affected; as in the cases of St. Theresa, the Martyrs, the Yoghis, Plotinus Porphyrius, Buddha, Mohammed, Saint Margaret, Saint Gertrude, Swedenborg, Amiel, Malvida von Meysenbug, Walt Whitman, Bucke, Al-Ghazzali, Saint John of the Cross, Saint Ignatius, Behmen, Saints Peter and Paul, Symonds, the Sufis, Whitfield, George Fox, Saint Francis of Assissi, Madame Guyon, Luther, Finney, Wesley, Lee, Bunyan, Tolstoy, and others.

This actualizing and realization of the separate and distinct existence of my Psychological Vital Self or Spirit as a distinct Being, Self, or Ego, from my Physiological Vital Self, has been called by various names, according as it has taken on various religio-intellectual forms.

At bottom, the principle is the same.

When the sudden realization of the separate existence of the Psychological Vital Self is experienced (in ignorance) with no knowledge whatever of the simplest principles of comparative and experimental psychology; it often ends in insanity.

Thus; the ignorant ecstasy may cause one woman to proclaim herself, "Her Majesty the Queen of Glory." Another to condemn her Physiological Vital Self as a rat.

But; neither in genius, mysticism, religion, ecstasy, or insanity, are such human experiences possible, save on the fact of the sudden perception of the Duality of the Self.

This general law makes all of these varied experiences possible.

By thus calling my own evolved Spirit, my Psychological Vital Self, I keep three analytical ideas in mind, viz., that my spirit is a psychological being; that it has its own order or life; and that it has an individuality, or self, distinct from that of the physiological; and also its own Form, Figure and Shape.

SALVARONA.

It is wit to pick a lock and steal a horse, but wisdom to let it alone.

The Light Among the Hills.

A Charming Narrative.

Most Beautifully Suggestive is "The Light Among the Hills," by Mrs. I. L. Lewis, of Bethel, Vt. It is a narrative founded on facts alone, and every Spiritualist should read it.

Mrs. Austin was about to speak, but the woman interrupted her: "You must think it very strange, to have me stand here and tell you, a perfect stranger, all I have. When a person once gets his or her mouth open there is no knowing what will come out of it. I haven't opened mine before for a good while. I don't know what has come over me to-day."

"Wait a moment, please," said Mrs. Austin, as the woman started toward the house; "I have something that I want to show you," and she produced the paper given her the night before. The woman read it and when she saw the name at the bottom of the page she exclaimed in great astonishment: "Why, that is my mother's name! Did you know her? Where—what does this mean?"

Mrs. Austin fixed her grave and honest eyes upon those of the woman before her and slowly and impressively told how she came in possession of the paper. The color came and went rapidly in the face of the listener, and when Mrs. Austin finished she asked with a decided show of interest, "Are you a Spiritualist?"

"Yes."

"Then you believe that the dead can come back and communicate with the living?"

"I know they can and do, under right conditions."

"How do you know?"

"I have felt them, and heard them, and seen them?"

"Are you sure?"

The question came in a low intense tone as if the whole soul of the questoner was concentrated upon it. The answer came with calm assurance: "Most certainly I am. Have you a daughter?"

"One lies sleeping in the valley yonder."

"If this daughter were living, sick, tortured and wretched, would you not do everything that lay within your power to do to help her?"

"Of course I would."

"Do you think that if there was one thing that you could do to make her life any easier or happier, that you would not make a supreme effort to do it?"

"I would do all that it was possible for me to do."

"Well, that is just what your mother has done for you. All these long years she has been watching over you. She has seen your hardships and sufferings and bitter disappointments, and your heart-aches and soul yearnings have all been known to her, and her love has grown deeper and stronger as you have needed it more. Feeling that neither of you could endure present conditions any longer, she has made a mighty effort to help you and has sent me to your aid, and she will help you still more if you will give her the opportunity."

"During this conversation Mrs. Grey had permitted the restive horse to move along and browse upon the bushes by the wayside. Martha watched with interest all that passed between Mrs. Austin and the stranger, and she was not surprised when a few minutes later Mrs. Austin came down to them and said, "Mrs. Daley says that we are to drive up to the barn and leave the horse. There is no need to go farther, for our work lies here, and here we must stay to-night."

"As Mrs. Daley ushered the three women into the living-room, which was also the kitchen, she glanced at the old clock in the corner and a look of terror passed over her face which did not escape the watchful eyes of Mrs. Austin. Quickly laying aside her outdoor garments, she quietly donned a kitchen apron and went to work as if she had always been accustomed to it. After a few minutes' hesitation, Mrs. Grey and Martha followed her example and in a few minutes the table was laid, and the supper cooking, and the gloomy kitchen was filled with the sound of cheerful voices. Mrs. Daley moved with the preoccupied air of one who moves through force of habit rather than conscious thought. There was a burning spot upon either cheek and a new light in her sad eyes. She started as there came the sound of heavy footsteps at the door and again that frightened look passed over her face, but only for an instant, for as the door opened she stepped forward with a dignity and grace that surprised her visitors and said to her husband, "John, these ladies are my guests, and they will spend the night with me. Of course you will see that their horse is properly cared for." She introduced her husband to each of the women and resumed her work of putting the supper upon the table.

Mr. Daley, a short, thick-set, unkept-looking man, with a stern mouth and hard gray eyes, regarded his wife with undisguised astonishment, but she carefully avoided meeting his gaze. At the supper table he looked curiously at his guests and made a few remarks about the weather. Mrs. Austin began conversation with him by asking questions about his farm and stock and before supper was over, she had him giving an animated account of his herd of thoroughbreds to which she listened with apparent interest.

Martha observed that Mrs. Austin hardly tasted of the food before her, but she showed no trace of nervousness. As soon as supper was over Mr. Daley and his men went out to their work. Four pairs of hands soon had the after supper work done at a most unaccustomed hour and Mrs. Daley ushered her guests into what was by courtesy called the best room, and there left them for a short time. During her absence Mrs. Austin threw wide open the doors and windows, letting the pure sweet air fill the room.

From the pasture near by came the low tinkle of the cow-bells, the robins were singing and scolding in the maple boughs, the toads were purring down by the brook and the odor of new-mown hay filled the room. The evening shadows had begun to gather as Mrs. Daley joined her guests. Mrs. Austin requested her hostess to sit beside her upon the old-fashioned print-covered lounge, and Mrs. Gray and Martha seated themselves in near-by chairs.

Taking one of Mrs. Daley's hands in her own, Mrs. Austin said gently, "Your mother did not bid me seek you out for nothing. I feel sure that she intends to come to you to-night and give you some message or in some way convince you that your lost ones still live and love you. Let us each earnestly desire her perfect success. I know what despair means; I know what it is to lay from sight one dearer than my own life, without a hope of ever seeing her again. I, too, Mrs. Daley, have a daughter in spirit life, and she came to me not long ago—not the baby I laid away, but a beautiful maiden nearly as large as myself."

"Certainly I did. You may rest assured that your spirit will know and claim its own. My child looked at me with the same dark eyes free from all pain and sadness. The same long black lashes swept her cheeks no longer marble white but flushed with a color as exquisite as the pink in an apple-blossom. She stretched out her hands to me—such joy thrilled me as I never expect to know again while I remain in the flesh."

Putting an arm about the weeping woman beside her, Mrs. Austin continued: "A spirit once stood beside me and spake words of comfort to my sorrowing soul, and in conclusion he said, 'Say to those who weep over the graves of their loved ones, that they shall surely claim their own again. As springs the steel to the magnet so will you and your loved ones be again united. Your departed ones are not lost, they have been born again and as surely as the suns and worlds swing in their places, and the seasons come and go, so surely will the spirit find and claim its own."

"Mary!"

"The voice that spoke was indescribably sweet and tender. Mrs. Daley started violently and saw a white robed figure standing before her, a soft light shone around the figure and the features were clearly discernible. Mrs. Daley gave one startled glance and stretching forth her hands cried, "Mother, oh! my mother!"

The spirit smiled and put out a hand as if in benediction. "My child," she said, "my poor little girl, I have tried so long to find a way to come to you and help you. Listen to what these women tell you, for they speak the truth. I have the little ones you call lost with me. Remember always through storm and calm, through good and ill, we love you and care for you."

The figure was gone—vanished where it stood. Mrs. Daley staggered to her feet and dropped upon her knees on the spot where her mother had stood. Mrs. Austin went and knelt beside her and Mrs. Grey and Martha stole softly from the room. For some time they walked silently to and fro in the shadow of the big maples. At last Martha spoke, "I would rather be Mrs. Austin to-night, Auntie, than to be the richest and greatest woman in this land."

"Mrs. Austin is only a woman like unto ourselves, dear child," was the gentle answer, "a woman who has toiled and suffered, whose heart is full of love and compassion for her fellow beings, aid having found the light she now walks in it."

"But she is more than an ordinary woman, auntie."

"Yes, but she has made herself just what she is, and you can do the same, my child, if you will."

The next day, before starting for home Mrs. Austin went out into the field to gather some wild flowers. She had been engaged at her occupation but a short time when Mr. Daley appeared beside her. He gave a few cautious glances around as of to make quite sure that they were alone and then with a directness that was characteristic of him, said, "I saw and heard what happened when you women folks were in the parlor last night."

Mrs. Austin looked up surprised.

"Yes," he went on, "I was curious to know what you were here for, and what made her act so queer. I couldn't make it out and so I watched around and when I saw you go into the parlor, I crept into the closet back of the lounge. The closet used to be an old entry so I got in all right from the other room, and I heard and saw everything."

"I am very glad to know it, Mr. Daley, and I feel sure your wife will feel equally glad."

Mr. Daley pushed back his straw hat and rubbed his head, shifted his weight from one foot to the other while he plucked a handful of grass and tore it to pieces.

Mrs. Austin who had been quietly observing these signs of mental disquietude, now kindly said, "I suppose you recognized the spirit form that appeared to us?"

"Oh, yes, I knew her the minute I saw her. Do you suppose that she knew I was there?"

"Certainly."

Again there was silence for a few minutes and then Mr. Daley, straightening himself to his full height, said with a visible effort, "Some way last night when her mother stood there I felt as if I wasn't much of a man. I felt dreadful mean and small, and I wouldn't have had that spirit look at me for all the land and stock I own. I never meant to abuse my wife, before God I never did, but it came to me then that I have been abusing her these long years. I have not in some ways treated her as well as I have my cows and horses. As I looked at her a crying there I felt that if I should die now that I should be so small and mean-looking that I should be ashamed to have anyone look at me. Now what I want to know is, what can I do to mend the matter?"

Mrs. Austin stood pale and silent, looking like one who is suddenly called upon to decide a matter of vital importance, then fixing her earnest eyes full upon the man before her, she said slowly, "The past is gone and cannot be recalled, but the present is yours with all its possibilities. Begin anew and begin now to lead a different life. The habits of a lifetime cannot be overcome in a day, but hold the earnest desire and persevere with a firm determination to conquer and you will soon make a better and nobler man of yourself. Go to your wife like a brave and honest man and tell her what you have told me. Let her know that you love her and you will see a very different woman in a short time. Live up to your highest, noblest impulses. If you feel that you ought to do a thing because it is right or kind, do it. It may cost you something to always obey the inner voice but it will lead you in the right way, and if you have fully determined to lead a better life you will not stop for any cost. Remember that you are now an immortal spirit clothed in human flesh, and the flesh and all that pertains to it will pass away, but your spirit and all that pertains to that will survive death and decide your future welfare."

Steps were heard coming along a path near-by, and Mr. Daley stepped into some friendly bushes and was lost to sight, but it was he who led up the horse and buggy a little later.

In reply to an earnest invitation the three women had made Mrs. Daley to visit them at their home, she was saying, "I would be more glad to go than I can tell, but I am afraid I never can."

"Oh, yes, you can, Mary," said her husband, cheerfully; "you can go next week if you want to."

The look of astonishment and joy that went over Mrs. Daley's face was in itself a revelation. As Mr. Daley handed Mrs. Austin into the cariage he said, in a low tone, "I am going to do what you told me to."

"That is right," was the glad reply, "and if I were you, I would buy back that colt that was sold yesterday."

Here and Hereafter.

BY CHARLES DAWBARN.

Chapter IV.—The Big Civil Engineer.

Carl Snyder, the author of New Conceptions in Science, has delivered what he considers a crushing blow—a complete "knock-out" for Modern Spiritualism—by his assertion that the recently invented instruments of precision are so delicate and sensitive that they could be easily used by spirits—if such beings exist. The careful student who has read the preceding chapters will, however, note that such a claim becomes absurd and impossible in the light of the fact that the disintegration of the human form by death is itself one of the "critical points" we have been describing and emphasizing.

After passing this "critical point" Intelligence finds herself once more manifesting amid new conditions, and which this time permit no use of instruments manufactured of metal, wood or glass. Such instruments would be as impossible for her use as an attempt by a mortal to run a steam engine with ice for fuel, or to race his yachts upon an ocean of steam.

The materialist, such as our author, may assert in reply that advocates of Modern Spiritualism are claiming that they have raps upon wood, receive writings with pencil, or sometimes without, upon paper and slate; and that typewriters are now run by asserted spirits. And even some Spiritualists cannot see what effect, if any, has been produced by death upon such phenomena, or realize the meaning of a "critical point."

All phenomena perceptible to Homo must manifest through matter moving at a speed which his sense can realize. The spirit in the body thus uses crude matter through which to express himself. How intelligence, matter and energy blend and mutually affect one another we do not pretend to understand, but they do, and man the mortal is one of the results. As soon as death changes the conditions the three co-workers may adapt themselves and go on as before, but that is not our present question. We are asking how those co-workers, after they have passed that "critical point" can possibly come back to the old conditions?

We reply, they must manufacture some kind of a form with which to touch our crude matter. To do this they must have a certain kind of raw material, which seems to be found, so far as we know, only in the mortal body. If they find it and use it, we call that body a "medium." It is then, and only then, it becomes possible for those living beyond death to prepare phenomena visible to us. But they cannot find this raw material in metal, or wood or glass. They must have the mortalized essence, as supplied by some medium, but when this is at their service there is no reason they should not use the new scientific instruments of precision, and perhaps more effectively than the pencil or typewriter. The real difficulty in the way is that Mr. Scientist would relegate all such mortal sensitives to an asylum, if he had the power. Very naturally they leave him to his limited use of his own inventions and instruments.

When a Crookes appears, and is willing for a few brief hours to put these powers to a kindly but thoroughly scientific test, he finds the desired raw material at his disposal, and then a Katie King appears. Very soon he is obliged to let go, and confine his studies to the normal raw materials of earth life where Intelligence continues to do her very best for him on the HERE side of her "critical point." Whenever these new and sensitive instruments are placed by Carl Snyder, or his ilk, at the disposal of intelligence beyond death, amid such conditions as were provided by Sir William Crookes, they will learn lessons that will lift them over the material point which now blocks their progress.

The present writer, who has only a finite mind, knows nothing whatever of His Majesty, the Infinite, and could not exchange thought with him if he exists. But he sees Intelligence at work inside and outside all "critical points." It is an intelligence, except in degree, exactly like his own. So he believes there is a CIVIL ENGINEER so big he can build worlds, just as our civil engineer bores tunnels and builds bridges. And it is this Big Civil Engineer who seems to be playing the game depicted in these articles. And if it really work out in supreme happiness beyond the next "critical point" it is, perhaps, as well to suspend criticism until we get there.

Meantime, although the theologian and his pupils may accuse the writer of gross irreverence, the student will see no reason why a small civil engineer should be greeted as "Hail fellow, well met," and a big one approached on bended knee, with a humble request for Boston brown bread and baked beans. Moreover we may rest assured this Big Civil Engineer, living far beyond the death "critical point," cannot be reached by any theological process in earth life.

Yonder is an Eastern ant-hill, with its millions living under a civilization quite as advanced, in some respects, as our own. They see a mighty upturning coming rapidly toward them, and endangering their very existence. It is what humans call a railroad, and will utterly destroy them. So they appoint fast days, and hold prayer-meetings, and try, through a committee to open a communication with the ant lord and master.

They do, we assume, just as man does when he beseeches somebody, he does not know who, to save him from cloud-burst and tornado, from pestilence and famine, and everything else that is objectionable.

Is there anybody but an ant to hear an ant, or anybody but a man to hear a man? Could the ant, under any circumstances, make the man understand what he wanted to say, or both of them together send out prayers that would reach either the Big Engineer or His Majesty the Infinite? I trow not, and the reader trows just the same.

But whether an ant, beyond his death "critical point," or a man who has escaped earth life, can listen, and perhaps reply, is not a subject for philosophical study, but a simple question of fact.

We know nothing about the ant and his future, but the facts are with us when we assert our KNOWLEDGE that the MAN OF HEREAFTER can, under certain conditions, give greetings, and sometimes a little help to the MAN OF HERE. We get from him a few statements concerning his HEREAFTER which our philosophy approves. We get quite enough, in any case, to make us pity the limitations of the Man of Science who, immersed over his eyes and ears in the HERE, is blind and deaf to every whisper from the HEREAFTER.

THE END.

WANTS TO KNOW.

Facts Respecting the Effects of Mediumship.

The time seems ripe for a better classification of facts respecting mediums and mediumship—with special reference to the effects of mediumship on the subject. As no one within my knowledge has compiled any statistics or collected any comprehensive data relative to the matter, the writer has decided to undertake the task, for his own information, and for the benefit of all others interested.

The value of the results will depend almost entirely on the extent and reliability of the data secured, therefore I ask your aid. If you can give any information, please send it to the address given below, and do it now—for what is put off until to-morrow is often left undone. All letters will be considered confidential. I wish the following:

1. Name and address of every medium for spirit manifestations, with statement of phase of mediumship—whether trance, clairvoyance, clairaudience, raps, materialization, automatic or independent writing, drawing, painting, inspirational speaking, etc., etc.

2. Length of time the manifestations continued, and whether they are still experienced. Where not definitely known, give approximate time.

3. Effect on mediums:—(a) Physically, as to health, strength, nervousness, etc., etc.

(b) Mentally, whether followed by mental derangement, periods of depression, impairment of memory, or lack of self control, etc.

(c) Morally. Where physical, mental or moral weakness is noted, state if there is any other known cause.

4. The names and addresses of two reliable persons who either know the facts stated and can verify them, or can vouch for the person making the statement.

5. The above information is desired concerning all mediums or sensitives, whether professional, public, private—and all persons who have had such experiences though unknown to the public and not distinctively classed as mediums.

It is desired that this information be reliable, impartial, definite, concise, verifiable—except experiences of a private nature which may be disclosed by and known only to the subject. To this end your personal co-operation is earnestly invited.

It is intended that the results of the information obtained and the conclusions arrived at, will be given to the public at as early a date as may be consistent with careful work and the time possible to devote to it.

This undertaking is at my own initiative, without suggestion from any one, but with a sincere desire to get at the facts, if possible.

Write me a letter to-day.

SPEECH.

Talk happiness. The world is sad enough
Look for the places that are smooth and clear,
And speak of those to rest the weary ear
Of earth, so hurt by one continuous strain
Of human discontent and grief and pain.

Talk faith. The world is better off without
Your uttered ignorance and morbid doubt.
If you have faith in God, or man, or self,
Say so; if not, push back upon the shelf
Of silence all your thoughts till faith shall come;
No one will grieve because your lips are dumb.

Talk health. The dreary, never-changing tale
Of mortal maladies is worn and stale.
You cannot charm, or interest, or please
By harping on that minor chord, disease.
Say you are well, or all is well with you,
And God shall hear your words and make them true.

—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

Thoughts.

Think hope and strength and comfort. These shall bring
The fairest blossoms on life's barren bough.
White blooms of spirit forces which will cling
And with their wealth your poverty endow.

Think love and trust and wisdom. They will come
To walk beside you on the unsteady earth.
Their germs are 'neath your disbelief, yet dumb,
Waiting the sun of thought to bring them birth.

Think purity and honor. Each high thought
Shall root and spread its leaves abroad to seed
A plenteous harvest, bringing you unsought

Think courage, truth and faith in all mankind.
They lie as pearls beneath concealing form.
These priceless gems your hand may hold to bind
To glorious crowns, once rescued from the storm.

Think help and joy and blessing. Richer far
Than all the treasured wealth to kingdoms given,
Such thoughts shall form a radiant guiding star
Leading the weary wanderer home to heaven.

BEATRICE ST. GEORGE.

TO MOTHER.

I tramped the prairies over
To find each tiny flower;
I searched in vain,
And searched again,
A violet I wished to find,
The expression of my mind.
Only the other day
I passed one on my way.
But like in life's career,
We meet each other here,
And then we pass away,
To meet some happy da
In the spirit land
We will clasp each loving hand.

REMARKABLE MANIFESTATIONS OF SPIRIT POWER.

In the 40's Patrick O'Neal lived in the northern part of Christian county, Ky., in a wild, rough section known then, and possibly at the present time, as the Pond river country. He had a comfortable home situated in one of the many fertile valleys among the foot hills of the river. It was understood that he was a childless widower, who had sought this remote section on account of its healthfulness and remoteness from the busy marts of the world. His only help was an aged negro and his wife, who looked after his stock and his home. O'Neal's farm consisted of about 120 acres, divided almost equally by the public or stage road from Hopkinsville to Madisonville. That part on the east side was all in the valley, arable and highly productive, while the other half, on the west side was rough and covered with timber. He raised grass, a small patch of tobacco, corn and oats enough to feed his stock, assisted when necessary by hired labor in the neighborhood.

In addition to the products of the farm which were more than enough to supply his frugal wants, he received an annuity of £100 from Ireland. The draft was taken by him to Hopkinsville, cashed in gold and the latter carried home with him, as he kept no account at the bank.

He had, which was very unusual in those days, a fine library which he kept replenished with such new books as his fancy dictated. He was very fond of reading and preferred the society of his favorite authors to that of his non-cultured neighbors. He was not known to have an enemy in the world, while it can be truthfully said, he had formed no strong friendships. At this early day he had established a rural route for his own benefit, by putting up a box on the side of the road and paying the stage driver to deliver and transport his mail.

His nearest and most prominent neighbor was Alonzo Pennington, a well-to-do farmer, prominent as a local politician, ex-sheriff of the county, and a man of far more than ordinary intelligence and force of character. He had cultivated O'Neal assiduously to interest him in politics without avail, and time and time again had tried to buy him out because their lands adjoined.

It became necessary in January 184— for O'Neal to go to Hopkinsville to have his draft cashed, leaving his place, as he had done in several instances prior, with his servants. After waiting for several days the servants were surprised by a visit from Pennington, who rode over, he said, to notify them that he had a letter from Mr. O'Neal stating that he had been suddenly called to New York and asking Pennington to look after his affairs until his return. He exhibited a letter, purporting to be from O'Neal to several of his neighbors to this effect. He rode over every day or so to see how things were progressing and inquire if anything was needed. In about two weeks after O'Neal had left he came again and announced that he, himself, had been suddenly called to New Orleans, and gave directions to the servants what was to be done until his or O'Neal's return and left them a few dollars to meet unexpected contingencies. He was absent over a month. When he got to Hopkinsville, en route home, he got a letter from the postoffice, dated New York, and purporting to be from O'Neal, announcing the death of an old uncle in Ireland had made it necessary for him to return immediately to that country and inclosing a power of attorney, legally executed, empowering him (Pennington) to dispose of all of his effects, real and personal, and remit the proceeds to him at Dublin. Pennington had this power of attorney recorded and proceeded to dispose of all of his effects in a legal and orderly way. The land was sold to a neighbor, who, in a few months reconveyed to Pennington. The two slaves were sold to another neighbor who, shortly after, reconveyed to Pennington. On the west half of O'Neal's land, in a remote corner, was a suck hole, about fifteen feet in diameter at the top and taper to the bottom, where it contracted to a very small space. It was about fifteen feet in depth. Surrounding it was a cedar thicket, in which O'Neal had built him a rustic seat and was accustomed, when the weather was hot, to go and spend hours reading. A well-marked path led from his house, through one corner of his orchard, across the meadow and stage road, through the brush and woods to this suck hole.

He had not been absent more than a twelve months before there were rumors quietly circulated that the O'Neal place was haunted. These rumors were so well defined that Pennington who had come into possession, could not find a tenant who remain longer than a few weeks. The old negroes who remained, declared that they had seen at midnight a light in the library; they had heard upon more than one occasion a noise that sounded like a book falling from the shelf; they had heard a key placed in the lock of the library door and the bolt thrown back. On account of these strange occurrences they had begged Pennington to remove them to his residence. He only laughed at their fears and attributed the noise to rats and the lights to a highly superstitious imagination. After the books had been removed and scattered over the country when sold at auction, the renters, whom he put in confirmed the story of the negroes, except that they saw a man or something like a man, with a candle wandering about the room, looking at the empty shelves. One man bolder than the rest, suddenly burst open the library door and rushed in, but the light was extinguished and a careful survey failed to discover either the thing or the candle, while the lock on the door had no appearance of having been tampered with.

The stage driver, when belated, as was occasionally the case in extreme bad weather, had not failed to notice the fact that when his horses came to the place where the path from the orchard to the woodland crossed the road, was the box in which he was wont to deliver O'Neal's mail, they invariably shied or snorted and sprang across as if more or less alarmed. Upon one occasion, when delayed until near midnight by a broken axle, he saw a figure slowly cross the road a couple of hundred yards in front of him. He could not tell whether it was a man or a woman. It was of almost transparent whiteness and appeared to float rather than walk. He could see no movement of the lower limbs. One hand appeared to be pressed against the back of the head, while the other was thrown up as if to ward off a blow. It followed the path in the woods leading in the direction of the sink hole. When the horses reached the spot where it crossed the road, they stopped, snorted and it required all his skill to prevent them from turning around and upsetting the coach. It was not until he took them by the bridle and led, that they could be induced to go onward.

This condition of affairs continued until it was the talk of the county and a half dozen determined men met and resolved to solve the mystery. They concealed themselves on a bright moonlight night in the edge of the woods, near the path, and awaited events. Exactly at 12 o'clock they were rewarded by seeing the object of their search come slowly, apparently floating along the path through the meadow. When it reached the fence it appeared to pass through it. It crossed the road not twenty feet in front of them, when they got a good view of it. It appeared to be mist in the form of a man or woman; the arms were well defined and one hand concealed the back of the head, while the arm next to them was extended, prevented them from seeing the head, except the bare outline. When it reached the woods, it did not adhere to the path, but passed in a bee line, through the trees and undergrowth toward the sinkhole. They followed as rapidly as possible and were in time to see it pause a moment over the hole and then slowly sink down into its depths. When these facts were reported, the excitement was greatly intensified. Pennington, however, was the only one who appeared to treat it lightly. He declared that it was a willo' the wisp or marsh ball, that had assumed this singular shape.

Arrangements were speedily made to thoroughly examine the sinkhole. Attention was directed to the fact that a stream of water several inches in diameter continually poured into the hole without filling it and the inference was that there was a subterranean passage below. Before arrangements could be perfected for a thorough exploration, Pennington sold out all of his possessions and removed hurriedly to Texas, his excuse being that his brother had purchased a very large ranch and had given him an interest upon his coming immediately to look after it.

The first thing the party did was to lower a ladder into the sinkhole and remove the logs and trash at the bottom. When this was done they discovered an aperture about the size of a man's body through which the stream escaped and they could distinctly hear the latter falling upon a rock floor below. Enlarging this opening, one man let himself down by means of a rope into what proved to be a chamber twenty feet in diameter, of irregular shape, the ceiling being a little higher than this. Another ladder was improvised and the party, with pine torches, descended.

About the first object that presented itself at the bottom was the body of Patrick O'Neal, lying on his face, in a lump under the mouth of the entrance and at the edge of the stream that poured down from above. A hasty examination disclosed the fact that his skull had been crushed in the rear by a blunt instrument. His pockets were turned wrong side outwards and only his silver watch and pocket knife were found, the former on his person and the latter by his side, where it had evidently been thrown in after him.

The news of the discovery of the body was instantly flashed all over the country and within twenty-four hours fully a thousand persons—men, women and children—were on hand at the coroner's inquest. That O'Neal had been foully murdered admitted of no doubt; that Pennington was, if not the real murderer, the beneficiary of it, was equally certain. Inquiry in Texas disclosed that he had no brother in the county as he had claimed and that Pennington himself had never been seen or heard of. The governor of Kentucky offered a reward of $50 for his arrest.

Dr. William Bowling, of Adairville, Ky., had a brother practicing medicine near the line of the Indian Territory, and he read the advertisement offering the reward in the Louisville Journal. He immediately wrote his brother that there was a man in the Territory answering the description; that he had lately been made a chief; that he was very popular with the Indians and could not be taken except by kidnaping. The doctor went to Texas and securing the services of a couple of cowboys succeeded in getting him drunk at a dance and spiriting him over the line into Texas. He was returned to Hopkinsville, tried, convicted and hanged. He confessed that he had murdered O'Neal, that he had gone to New York and had the papers fixed up that had been registered.

During the civil war the O'Neal homestead was destroyed by fire. The two old slaves of O'Neal had found their way back to Kentucky after the war and squatted on the land formerly owned by their old master. No heirs had laid claim to the estate, and in the disordered condition of the country, they were left unmolested. In excavating an apple house, immediately over where the library hearth had stood, they dug up a box made of iron from an old steam boiler. There was a square hole in the top covered with the same metal and securely locked. Upon breaking the lock and opening they found about $12,000 in gold, that was supposed to have been the hoard of O'Neal. The state made no claim to the money; no heirs were ever found and the heirs of this old couple still occupy the premises. An immense deposit of coal was discovered in exploring the cave under the sinkhole and is now worked with profit to its owners, who purchased this portion at a nominal sum.

Constipation Needs a Cure.

A simple remedy only is not sufficient, especially if the relief is brought about by the use of salts, aloes, rhubarb, or some similar purgative or cathartic. They temporarily relieve but they weaken the bowels and make the condition worse. In constipation the bowels require strengthening, toning, and something that will assist them to do their work naturally and healthfully—in short a tonic laxative of the highest order. That is what Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine is. It both relieves and permanently cures by removing the cause of the difficulty. It positively cures dyspepsia, indigestion, kidney and liver troubles, headache and all other diseases which grow out of sick and clogged bowels. One small dose a day will cure any case, light or bad. It is not a patent medicine. The full list of ingredients goes with every package with explanation of their action. It costs nothing to try it. A free sample bottle for the asking. Vernal Remedy Co., 166 Seneca Building, Buffalo, N. Y.

THE PRIVILEGE OF SPIRITUALISTS

And the Duties of Spiritualism, Carefully Considered.

The principles of nature teach us that within the breast of every living creature there is a spark of divinity, which can be fanned into a flame, and made to blossom as the pictured Garden of Eden; by attuning one's self to the harmonies of nature's law of evolution. The erroneous teachings of so-called Christianity (theologies of an undeveloped age) have had the effect of dwarfing the principle known as individuality—the most important factor in intellectual progress. This can best be illustrated by a young forest; the saplings of which are young and slender. If a steady westward wind be brought to bear upon them for a long period they will be inclined to the east. So also the minds of a young generation have been swayed by the teachings, or psychological influence of a theology of the past. In the eyes of the church it has ever been a crime to have a thought contrary to its teachings. When in this forest of mental saplings there appears one stronger than the rest, who is able to stand upright and looking about him see the bent condition of his brothers. He starts to preach the natural law of symmetry and beauty, which says "do not allow yourself to be played upon by every wind that blows."

Here he encounters a hindrance unlooked for; failing to recognize these bent or warped intellects (his weaker brothers, hence more easily swayed than himself,) he has not only the erroneous teachers to deal with, but at the cry of heretic, infidel, crucify him! from the fountain head of theology, these weaker brothers, not understanding him, and willing hands to gather fagots to once more light up the world with lurid flames to extinguish the true light of inspiration intended by the spirit world to advance civilization.

Let me here assert and emphasize, with all the power at my command, and without fear of scholarly contradiction—that all the blessings brought to humanity have come outside, and apart from all churches known to man. The combined churches have ever stood for and upheld tyranny; they have ever aided the oppressors of the poor to widen the scope of their scheme of robbing humanity of its individuality. The so-called Christian churches have been the potent factors in martyring the brightest minds of all ages who have had the moral courage to stand alone and suffer death if need be in order to impart to the world the beautiful lessons of truth, taught by the applied principles of nature.

It is inspiring to note that with the spread of spiritual teaching, the leading minds of the arts of learning are fast severing connection with the institutions that oppose the law of evolution, knowing that by mentally painting the picture of truth the world would turn to nature's studio, the source of truth.

Little wonder that man has strayed far from home on the thorny by-ways and paths of ignorance; when for generations he has been taught to look within himself for all manner of evil, disease and death. Instead of Spiritualism coming to tear down the religions of the world, it has come to prove the truth of the continuity of life; to lead man out of the fog of materialism, taught by the superstition of church isms, and bring him into the daylight of reason. It teaches him that he is a part in nature's law of evolution and like all other phenomena in nature, he unfolds from within and that within him lies the possibility of perfection. Everything in nature bespeaks of a future or continued life. The flowers bloom and fade away, to bloom more bright another day. The harvests spring forth in their season, fold their seed in an envelop that withstands the chilling blasts of winter, and in the next season bursts forth with all the grandeur and beauty of the preceding harvest. So it is with the thought productions of the universal harvest of the ages; each age produces the seed for the intellectual harvest of the succeeding age; which by cultivation becomes more perfect, as does the cultivation of plants. The strong intellects of each generation have blazed the pathway through untrodden forests and opened up avenues unknown to primitive man.

There is not a person in the world, no matter what creed, nationality or belief, who is not personally interested in what comes after death. When one views the unpressed pillow where a little head once rested, or the little shoes laid away to be worn no more forever, by little feet that had begun to untangle the mysterious ways in the path of life; this query invariably wells up in the heart: "Oh, to know that my darling still lives!"

Therefore the spiritual philosophy is the grandest ethics that ever engaged the attention of man. Spiritual teaching is the bugle call that awakens the soul to a realization of its essential duty in opening up the true way of a pure life, in order to lead the spirit out of the materialistic tendencies of the body.

As soon as the soul realizes that God is not far away, but within each of us, and that the divine voices did not all speak in the past, but are speaking now, and that whosoever will listen may hear within his own being just as pure and as divine a message as did any prophet or teacher of old; he or she has learned the secret of the evolution of the soul, and is prepared to become a teacher and a blessing to his fellowman.

Spiritualism teaches that it is a crime to be selfish, and where selfishness exists there is an undeveloped mentality. Harmony depends upon the universal relation of brotherhood, which implies an equal interest for the universal whole. The duty of Spiritualism is to eliminate the cause of crime, which is the law known as special privilege, and if it fails in this it falls short of its mission, and must soon be relegated to the garrets of past hypocritical teachings. In regard to the philosophy of Spiritualist teaching the curiosity stage has passed. The world is ready for the spiritual truths that can only be presented to them in effect, by the lives of the promoters of this beautiful philosophy. To my mind the most essential step for the future will be the uniting of the spiritual forces. As long as we are divided against ourselves we cannot hope to unite the world and bring about the brotherhood of man.

CRIMES OF DISORDERLY VICIOUS SPIRITS

That a spirit can commit a crime has been fully established. They do so when they control a medium against her will, and use obscene and profane language. This fact has been fully established in the discussion that has been carried on in The Progressive Thinker. It will not do for Spiritualists to close their eyes to this important feature of Spiritualism. It must stand side by side with the glorious truths that emanate from exalted spirits, and be carefully analyzed. In connection herewith, Mrs. Price, of Washington, D.C., gives some interesting particulars.

The Experiences of a Clairaudient Medium and Inspirational Lecturer—Obscene Talk by Spirits—The Unpleasant Side of Spirit Control.

In The Progressive Thinker you ask those who have had experiences with ignorant or vicious controls, or obsessed by such, to give their experience. For the benefit of others no doubt, it is desired.

I had not intended to give my experience to the world, and shall not in full detail, but will give some essential parts, hoping it may aid some, as The Great Psychological Crime IS BRINGING TO LIGHT MUCH OF IMPORTANCE TO THE ADVANCEMENT OF HEALTHFUL KNOWLEDGE.

I stated some facts in an article which you published, but I did not speak of anything regarding the experience I had before I learned what the voices were, and that they could converse with me at any time or place.

My father passed from earth life the day I was one year old; my mother followed in little more than a year. I learned of their character only by hearing others tell of events of their lives, and from a few letters they had written to relatives, and which had been preserved.

I did not know till I had proved their presence around me, that spirits were with mortals all the time, as mediums always led me to expect them to come and go. I only heard the voice in moments of solitude and sorrow, but I got strong impressions of my mother's and sister's presence at times after I had learned of such a possibility.

Spiritualists taught me of different guides that came unbidden to aid mortals to conduct a work similar to their own while they were here as mortals, also of evil spirits coming unbidden to a medium.

If there were ghosts, I always said I would like to see one. If I had spirit influences around me, I wished to learn who and what they were. I wanted the proof of immortal life, and I sought the parents lost to my earthly life. I got table-tippings and raps, but could not tell who were the ones making the demonstrations, as the clairvoyant visions were more of live people and their conditions than of those we call dead; therefore I believed in their reality as visions, and I was no more sure of the spirit's personal presence when I saw one, than I was of the mortal which I was sure was not present.

I went to a medium who told me of my mother and father being with me at times, but said Louise Alcott was my guide and control, if I would allow her to control me; said I could get writings automatically, and so on—the same list of things usually promised the seeker whom the spirit wishes to develop into higher wisdom.

I got the automatic writing. I felt my hand held by another. Sometimes my father's name was signed; sometimes Louise Alcott's, and at other times various names, leading me to see they were not serious in all their communications.

They told me helpful things with regard to the health of the family. As my father had only been a young farmer, with an education obtained in a country school, I did not doubt when he signed Louise Alcott to articles such as she might be expected to give, that it was her, as I was superintendent of the children's department of work for the W. C. T. U., and her life was given to advancement of higher and better training for children. When I asked for her, they told me she was not always here, but would be here to help me with my speech for next convention. And the aid I did receive I thought was of her penning, as it was worthy and like her ideas.

I later learned it was only the proof of my father's progressive intellectual and educational doviopment since his residence in spirit life, using Miss Alcott's name to inspire confidence in me to receive his help, till he could prove that the help was really what I wanted.

A kind friend discouraged me as much as she could, she tried to persuade me to give up investigating, getting the writings, or letting them influence me in any way; she said they were all evil creations, soulless beings, a something she had learned from Theosophy, but could not make me understand just what the Oriental teachers had given her as an explanation.

I learned later that she confounded the mental conceptions of clairvoyant sight with the personalities which made the demonstrations. But with my partial and imperfect understanding, I was quite startled when I began to get messages that showed a mental inharmony in the personalities of those around me. I could feel their touch as plainly as a mortal hand, and realized they impressed my mind. They spoke as they wrote and I got the tones of kindness telling me not to worry; they would explain later all about it, and soon I heard them speak without the written message at any and all times. BUT THEN I BECAME CONSCIOUS OF SOME ONE SAYING THINGS I DID NOT CARE TO HEAR.

For days—sometimes weeks—I would be happy as a child could be that had just learned to recognize the invisible parents and commune with them; then all at once there would be vile expressions that one would not expect to come from a person of refined nature, and the voice told me sometimes it was my father; at other times claimed to be my grandfather, for my father would make me understand that there were truly kind, loving ones, around me, and I could not believe the father I had learned to respect both as a mortal young man, and an advanced spirit being could use the words and expressions I heard.

I had always disliked to hear even slang phrases, and to hear REPEATED A STRING OF OBSCENE WORDS was torture to me. I wondered if a spirit could be insane, and what powers they did have, used for harm.

I feared not for myself, but my little girl might develop the gift of hearing or be controlled by this person. My own mind I believed strong enough to hold its own; but I was tormented in various ways. There were times when horrible tales of spirit life were told me, and when I had been made almost ill—for I was several times on the verge of nervous prostration—it would be explained as a joke, and I would be told not to let it bother me; that they could not explain, but to trust them because of the good and try to forget the unpleasant. I did not take anyone into my confidence, but was determined to learn alone all I could of spirit influences, but I was satisfied I could hold my own independent will powers and not be entranced.

I found I could be held mentally from thinking of a name or word I wished to use, but I could turn my mind and use it independent of the influence, and my mother usually spoke the word so I could hear, after I had been prevented from thinking of it.

Before allowing me to understand who the evil or seemingly evil-minded companion was, I was led to see that I could hold a mental force of my own that willed him to desist, when speaking of what I did not care to hear; and I could turn my mental powers so as to give the father a chance to explain if what I was told was truth or false.

At last when a favorable condition presented itself for a pleasant talk between myself and the spirit father, he explained that the man was here because he was a relative of his back two generations; had come to him as a boy; had stayed with me, as he and my mother had, and it was this great uncle who tormented me, as people do a young child, just to see the effects of what they say or do. He loved to experiment and see how he could annoy a mortal, and also to learn how much I would believe of spirit stories made up by him and told as a truth.

People believed such impossible things of spirits, and the real truth was so hard for them to learn or believe that half truths were usually told, and he believed lies useful sometimes, so he said, and told them when he happened to be in the mood.

We agreed to let him talk if he would, and not let it trouble us more than if an idiot were here; that we had to put up with, and the mental influence could be controlled by my understanding and using my own will powers to work in harmony with them.

He ceased doing the things that had bothered me when I no longer allowed myself to be bothered by them. He was not wholly degenerated, as I sometimes thought, for he dictated very excellent articles for me to use in my talks to the Wage Earners' Club, as he seems fond of boys.

I am conscious of the re-embodiment of three different personalities at the same time. I hear them all speak at once, different words, to prove they are three people. I feel the vibrations of their throats in my own throat, but distinctly separate vibrations of magnetic principle in separate places so as to prove they are there at the same time. My whole physical body is controlled by a power separate from my own will when I am off guard for a moment, or when I allow the control. I am influenced to speak sharply or start to punish my little girl for a slight offense. I feel the mental suggestion and the physical impetus, but knowing now what it means, I check the unspoken word, and hold my hand still. I give them permission to pet her through me, but not to punish, and to prove the powers that can be used when one is passive, they experiment and make me feel a mental desire to stop doing one thing and do another. They take away the interest in a story, and lead me to put the book away and do some trifling thing to show how people are unconsciously influenced by spirit powers of mind, and call it the different selves. I used to feel these influences and thought the personality of each influence the different sides to my character.

I can close my eyes and open them, at the same time feel the other lids move with and controlling them, or I can hold my eyes closed and feel the other lids open and shut through mine. I am as conscious of the re-embodied spirits as I am of my own physical life, and talk to them or allow them to speak with me or to use me, or my body rather, to give their messages to the world. But it was not an easy lesson to learn, and the teachings I had of evil spirits—ignorant is the better word to use—made it harder for me to come into a perfect understanding of my present condition, for they do really re-embody themselves at will within the physical of our lives, and live with us to help more often than injure us.

If we learn self-mastery or self-control as the greatest lesson of life as children, we will be able to master all influences of evil that come to us from any direction.

I was criticised quite strongly by a prominent Washington medium for teaching that mediumship was best developed without allowing the entranced condition, but to grow into a knowledge of higher laws and hold their own personality.

I heard one medium tell in a public meeting that the best way to get aid from spirit friends was to give up to any influence that they felt. If they got an impression to sing, dance, or yell, just do as the influence directed, and in time they would come under its power of control. But I have learned to get the aid of my spirit friends, even to lecture (with no knowledge whatever of what I am going to say), by working intelligently with them and learning the laws that govern these conditions.

Mediumship is the greatest blessing that can come to mortals, but much of its laws are yet to be learned, and much unlearned, for both spirit and mortal are ignorant of the invisible laws of power, and demonstrate them without knowing what the result may be.

UNIQUE LADY MEDIUMS.

Mrs. Catherine McFarlin and Rev. Nellie K. Baker.

These are, Mrs. Catherine McFarlin, residing at Plainview, Minn., and Rev. Nellie K. Baker of Portage, Wis. The latter is the president of the Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association.

Mrs. McFarlin is a noted speaker and platform test medium, as well as highly developed in other phases, including excellent private sittings. In all the work she is CONSCIOUSLY HERSELF. Her discourses are as educational to herself as to the audience. She is no more fatigued than the ordinary speaker that does the same amount of work. She further has the advantage of relief from the labor of preparing the lectures. The relief has the effect to encourage rather than discourage her individual study. Commencing with only common school advantages, she is now an accomplished lady.

With but a slender capital of health and resolve, she is now strong and efficient. She would consider it dark and selfish to keep her gift to herself, when it can be used to instruct and entertain large audiences at a single effort. She regards it a sacred privilege to be a message bearer of the advanced departed friends to the thousands of mortals who know nothing of the hereafter, and that are thirsting for the light. Her manner of receiving the knowledge is unique, in that the ideas are simply tossed to the brain, as it were, and she catches them. It is a decided case of CONSTRUCTION and not destruction.

Rev. Mrs. Baker is different, yet unique. While speaking she reads the lectures from spirit manuscript. Sheet after sheet is held up, and so on to the end. By nature she is literary, now she is more so. Some persons that heard one of her lectures told me it was the most finished and delightful they ever heard from spirit or mortal. Her health and resolution have been improved by the mediumship. She is thoroughly conscious while giving forth the enlightening strains and it is equally enlightening to herself. She would think it a painful denial to be obliged to confine the heavenly talent to her individual life. She freely admits that the best of gifts may be misused through lack of understanding of their best use.

Tennyson was asked if poetry was hard work. He replied, "Poetry that is hard work isn't poetry." Dickens said he didn't write his novels, "that he was only an amanuensis." Shakespeare was, undoubtedly, like Dickens. Mrs. Stowe said she didn't write "Uncle Tom's Cabin." All the world is familiar with the story of the little, young girl, Joan of Arc, and the great things she accomplished for France. These were all great mediums, and didn't know it. The difference is, now it is known; thanks to the invaluable mediumship of the glorious modern Spiritualism.

There are no two phases of mediumship alike, any more than there are two faces alike. When the clever author of the wonderful Psychological Crime demonstrates that he can beat nature by reducing all the myriad phases to a single phase, as he proposes, he should be presented, by the combined Spiritualists, with a crown of diamonds.

I repeat, that I am the friend of this stirring, moving, ambitious author. The Symposium was a great help and very profitable to the present condition. Without this book, Editor Francis would have been short on capital; at least, this is my opinion. I think of Francis that his judgment is his genius.

I am highly pleased with the gallantry our immensely talented Lyman C. Howe displays toward the fair Florence Huntley. I don't mean that gallantry is the only element of the introductory letter.

The Decline of Spiritual Societies.

My attention was forcibly drawn to your editorial in reply to the Boston correspondent on the "Decline of Spiritual Societies," which is apparent, and which we need not try to disguise, and for which he need have no feelings of humiliation. Change is marked on all the expressions of nature, in the religious, political, social and economic relations of life. While it is a matter of deep regret that the society here in the city of Kalamazoo has disbanded, through indifference, carelessness, and not from an abandonment of its truths. Only a few years ago the secular newspapers would refuse to notice a meeting of Spiritualists, but they, too, have changed. They not only are free to notice all meetings, but will publish articles on Spiritualism and treat us with the same courtesy as the most popular society in the city. The pastor of the First Presbyterian church—an orator, and a man of high scholarly qualifications—does not preach the old-style Presbyterianism of fifty years ago, but the basic principles of Spiritualism. Also the pastor of the People's church, a man of deep study and investigation, teaches the principles of Spiritualism in its most illumined aspects. In fact, nearly all the old-school advocates of total depravity, the fall of man, sacrificial atonement for inborn sin, and its minor details of absurdities and distasteful conclusions when applied to the crucible of Reason.

And from this condition of facts, why feel to despair or regret? The tiny rap at Hydesville may well be compared to the anticipated coming of the man Jesus Christ, by bringing about new and better conditions for the human family. So it is with Modern Spiritualism, it has infiltrated all classes of so-called religious teachers, with a more humane, comprehensive view of life, of the truth of Being—about God, our spirit homes, about the change called death.

Let none feel disheartened because some local societies are disbanding. All the so-called New Thought publications and societies which are becoming numerous all are birth legitimate from the so-called Spiritualism, or Naturalism, whose fruit is ever invigorating, and its flowers of sweetest perfume.

Death Defeated, or the Psychic Secret of How to Keep Young.

This book goes to the foundation of things—health, the laws of health, the foods to eat, the subject of marriage, who should marry and who should not marry, the causes of divorce, the proper time for conception, gestation, the determining of sex, animal flesh-eating, what Herodotus, Hesiod, Homer, Pythagoras, Shelley, Graham and others ate, the foods that produce long life and how to live "immortal" on earth, etc. This book is written in Dr. Peebles' usually clear, crisp style, and attracts the reader from the very first through its facts, logic and convincing arguments. Very handsomely bound in cloth. Price $1.

This finely illustrated volume of between three hundred and four hundred pages, by Dr. Peebles, treats exhaustively of inoculation, cow-pox and calf-lymph vaccination from Jenner's time to the present. It tells how the cow-pox pus poison is obtained—how the vaccine virus, while causing many deaths, sows the seed of eczema, pimpled faces, cancers, tumors, ulcers and leprosy. It gives a history of the several years' battle against vaccination in England, Parliament making it "optional" instead of compulsory. This book should be in every school library and family. Price $1.25.

INVISIBLE HELPERS

A Very Excellent and Comprehensive Work.

One from the Theosophical Standpoint.

This work, "Invisible Helpers," written by C. W. Leadbeater, the remarkable English psychic (whose lectures have graced the columns of The Progressive Thinker), is certainly very interesting and suggestive throughout. It treats of the "Universal Belief in the Invisible Helpers," the "Angel Story," "Work Among the Dead," "What Lies Beyond." The work is neatly bound in cloth, and the price is 55 cents.

ECHOES OF THE SYMPOSIUM

LYMAN C. HOWE. MRS. FLORENCE HUNTLEY.

The Great Psychological Crime

A Comparison of Views and the Reasons Therefor.

Lyman C. Howe, the veteran Spiritualist Lecturer and Medium, a man well and favorably known as one of the foremost thinkers and writers in our ranks, will Champion the Cause of Truth as reflected in Spiritualism, while Mrs Florence Huntley, the well-known Author and Journalist, will defend all the statements in The Great Psychological Crime, which Mr. Howe will dare to assail, making a series of articles instructive, suggestive and inspiring, and which every Spiritualist should most carefully read.

MRS. FLORENCE HUNTLEY REPLIES TO LYMAN C. HOWE.

My Dear Mr. Howe:—

Your No. 5 would seem to indicate that we are rapidly reaching the exalted plane of telepathy. Although written before you had received the proofs of my last letter, it is remarkable for the fact that it follows very closely the lines of thought with which I was dealing at the time.

In my former letter I called attention to that particular phase of the author's definition of mediumship and hypnotism to which you refer. But I did not elaborate the thought as I think it deserves. A brief restatement of the subject may make it clearer.

The author defines a definite and specific process. He tells us it is a "subjective psychic process." It is the process by which one individual obtains, holds and exercises control of the WILL, VOLUNTARY POWERS and SENSORY ORGANISM of another.

If the controlling intelligence is in the physical body the process is called "Hypnotism." If the control is a spirit the process is called "Mediumship."

Now if there is a process at all by which these results are or may be accomplished, then it is clear that this is what the author has written of in his book. It must be equally clear that any other process is irrelevant matter and not a proper subject of discussion by us in this correspondence.

If it were sought to show that there is no process of any kind capable of producing the results specified in the definition, this would be not only relevant but vitally material. For if such a claim were made and established it would convict the author of having based his entire book upon a false premise.

But no such claim has been made even by the most ultra critic. Nor could it be established if made, for the evidence is overwhelming against it. No one who has seen a hypnotized subject in the deep lethargic trance undergo an otherwise most painful surgical operation without knowing it, will ever deny that there is such a process.

It is this process alone that the author is considering. He makes it very clear WHY he draws the limitations of his definition so closely and adheres to them so rigidly. It is for the sake of scientific exactness only. As these terms have been employed by other writers they have been made to include all kinds of psychic phenomena, both "subjective" and "independent." When carefully considered it will be seen that this is unscientific, ambiguous, confusing, and has led to a general misunderstanding of the nature of the two distinct and differing psychic processes which the author has seen fit to designate as "subjective" and "independent."

Now, if he had divided mediumship into two great general classes on the basis of causation and had named one "Subjective Mediumship" and the other "Higher Mediumship," and had then announced that he intended to confine himself to the treatment of "Subjectiv Mediumship" alone, I do not believ leading Spiritualists would have foun anything vitally wrong with the boo I am convinced that it would ha passed among them as a work of sou morality as well as sound logic a common sense.

The whole fundamental difficulty a pears to me to arise from the fact th Spiritualists either ignore or fail to note the fact that the author's definition excludes what they have come to designate as the "Higher Mediumship." And they do this in the face of the author's special request to the contrary. Under his definition the so-called "Higher Mediumship" is not "Mediumship" at all.

The "Superior State" to which Mrs. Longley refers in her excellent article, is clearly NOT "mediumship" under the author's definition. It is true, she calls it so, and bases much of her criticism of the book on the evident supposition that she and the author are considering the same subject, when in truth he is writing of one thing and she of another.

Mr. A. J. Davis employs the same term used by Mrs. Longley. By his "Superior State" it would seem that he intended to convey the idea that what he acquired was by his own personal effort, and not through the subjective process. Whether or not his "Superior State" would rise to the level of the author's definition of "Independence," is quite another matter.

In Mr. Tuttle's warlike criticism of the book and its author, he tells us that there are "two general forms or methods" of mediumship. He tells us that "In one the medium preserved his selfhood and by concentration of mind brought it to the required tension." In the other the medium simply surrendered himself to his controls and became their instrument." He then says: "This INDEPENDENT culture of mediumship was recommended, as leaving the medium to choose," etc.

The difference between Mr. Tuttle and the author lies in the fact that this "INDEPENDENT" form or method to which Mr. Tuttle refers is not "Mediumship" under the author's definition. Mr. Tuttle calls it so, but he evidently had not carefully analyzed the author's definition when he wrote his symposium article, or he would not have assumed, as he seems to have done, that the author included this in his definition.

J. S. Loveland, who I believe is and has been for many years one of the leading Spiritualists, in his symposium article says: "I have also shown that there is a higher condition than ordinary mediumship open to all persons. I have termed it the Higher Mediumship." He further says: "I have submitted that mediumship should be an intelligent co-operation between the medium and a known and reliable spirit person. That the medium should be entirely independent of all control as much so as we are in our social intercourse with each other."

(Permit me, in passing, to call your attention to the manner in which he uses the term "independent.")

The difference between him and the author also appears to be that he calls this "Independent" co-operation "Mediumship," while the author says that it is NOT MEDIUMSHIP AT ALL.

Almost all the prominent critics of the book seem to recognize the fact that there is one phase of what they term mediumship, which complies literally with the terms and conditions of the author's definition. But they also claim that there is yet another phase which does not involve any of the subjective elements of "Control." They call these merely two different phases of "Mediumship." The author says one of them is "Mediumship" and the other is NOT.

I would be willing to leave it with any committee of scientists which Spiritualists themselves might select, whether the author's position is not the correct one from the standpoint of scientific accuracy.

If a process which necessarily involves "Subjection" and "Control" is "Mediumship," it would seem clear that one which involves neither is NOT "Mediumship." It must be something else. At page 132 of the book, the author makes very clear his reasons for this distinction.

He says: "The very nature of the subject and the almost unlimited field it covers, call for the most delicate and subtle distinctions and differentiations. This demands a terminology which is not only free from all ambiguity, but one which cannot, by the most clever devices of resourceful and unprincipled intelligence, be tortured and twisted into meanings at variance with the intentions of the writer."

"If the language and literature of Hypnotism are defective in this respect, even more fatally so are the language and literature of Modern Spiritualism in general and of 'Mediumship' in particular."

He then shows how different writers have employed the terms "Spiritualist" and "Spiritist," and the terms "Spiritualism" and "Spiritism" in such manner as to confuse the reader, and then says:

"To avoid this sort of embarrassment and difficulty in the present instance, as far as may be possible, the following additional definitions are here presented as a substantial basis from which to examine the subject of "Spiritual Mediumship" ACCORDING TO THE PLAN AND PURPOSE OF THIS WORK. IT IS SUGGESTED THAT A CAREFUL STUDY OF THEIR SPECIFIC LIMITATIONS WILL SERVE TO AVOID ALL CAUSE FOR MISUNDERSTANDING OR UNCERTAINTY AS TO THE PARTICULAR SENSE IN WHICH THE FOLLOWING TERMS ARE HEREINAFTER EMPLOYED":

Then follow the definitions among which is the definition of "Mediumship".

In closing the chapter the author says: "All that is claimed for these definitions, at this time, is the simple fact that they are in strict conformity with the knowledge thus far acquired by the writer and co-laborers in the School of Natural Science concerning the subjects covered by them, AND THAT WHEREVER THE TERMS SO DEFINED APPEAR IN THIS WORK AND IN SUBSEQUENT WORKS OF THIS SERIES, THEY ARE TO BE STRICTLY INTERPRETED AS HERE INDICATED."

"Mediumship is a subjective, psychic process. Like hypnotism, mediumship involves at least two intelligences. One of these, however, is a spiritual intelligence, while the other is in the physical body. The spiritual intelligence dominates and controls the WILL, VOLUNTARY POWERS and SENSORY ORGANISM of the medium. The medium, being thus under the domination and control of the outside, spiritual intelligence, is therefore in a subjective condition and relation to the exact extent that such control exists.

"That is to say, in just so far as a physically embodied individual is subject to the domination and control of outside spiritual intelligences, in just that far the process involved and the relation thus established are MEDIUMISTIC and therefore subjective."

"The corollary of this proposition is equally true, namely: to the extent that a physically embodied individual is free from the domination and control of outside, spiritual intelligences, to precisely this extent, the relation between them is INDEPENDENT and therefore NOT MEDIUMISTIC NOR SUBJECTIVE."

I have no doubt that it will be agreed by all lovers of honesty and fair play, that when an author defines any term and says to his readers that wherever he uses the term it is to be understood in the limited sense of his definition, it is only fair to take him at his word.

I have no doubt that every reader of The Progressive Thinker will agree that it would be unfair to ignore the author's request to bear in mind the limitations of his definitions. I believe they would all agree with me that to substitute their own definitions in place of the author's would not enable them to get the meanings the author intended.

I am fully convinced that the very largest amount of criticism that has been offered by the various writers, up to this time, has been based upon exactly this condition. Without intending to do so, the critics of the book have generally read their own conceptions of mediumship into the author's words, and thus made, or tried to make him responsible for sentiments he has never uttered nor thought of uttering.

I believe I have shown that even my esteemed correspondent, with all his good intentions and worthy motives, has done the same thing. It has not been with malice, nor even with intent, but the results upon our readers are none the less unfortunate on that account.

Lest our readers fall into another error as a result of this letter, let me make the following explanation:

The author recognizes three distinct conditions or states of being in which it is possible for one in the physical body to bridge the gulf between the two worlds of life and intelligence.

1. The first is by surrendering himself to the operation of the subjective, psychic process and becoming a "Medium" as he has defined that term. In this case he is successful only in proportion as he makes the surrender of self and becomes an automatic instrument under the control of those upon the spirit side of life.

2. In the second the individual comes into this physical life with his psychic faculties and senses awake and consciously active. This development seems to be the result of heredity, prenatal conditions, evolutionary development, or all these combined. It requires neither individual effort, education nor personal training, any more than it does to exercise the purely physical senses. It therefore appears to be a purely "natural" or "normal" condition or development. For this reason the author designates such persons as "Natural Psychics." At pages 280 and 357 he refers incidentally to this character of development, but in as much as this is not the particular theme he is considering he does not elaborate the subject in this particular volume.

3. But there is yet another state or condition different from both of these, the direct result of a definite training under an exact and scientific course of instruction. It comes as the result of individual effort in accordance with the law of individual development and growth of man's psychic nature. It also comes as the fruition of an educational training of every department of individual being, physical, mental, moral, spiritual and psychical. This is what the author designates as "Independent, Spiritual Self-Development." It is the exact antithesis of "Mediumship" as he defines this term. Brief reference to this form of development will be found at page 203, beginning with the last paragraph. But as this also is not the theme he is treating, he reserves its complete exposition for another volume of the Harmonic Series.

And now, if I comply with Mr. Francis' request as to space I must forego the pleasure of replying to the statistical part of your letter until another time. It is perhaps just as well, for it will not deflect the minds of our readers from the specific point I have endeavored to make clear in this letter, namely, the importance of keeping constantly in mind the limitations which the author has fixed in his definition of "Mediumship." If space would permit I should like to make the same point as to each and all of the terms he has specially defined, but perhaps our readers will bear this in mind without further emphasis from me.

With greetings and good wishes for your health and happiness,

Cordially and sincerely,

FLORENCE HUNTLEY.

AN IMPRESSIVE POEM.

PETER M'GUIRE; OR NATURE AND GRACE.

[From "Poems of Progress," by Lizzie Doten.]

It has always been thought a most critical case
When a man was possessed of more Nature than Grace.
For theology teaches that man, from the first,
Was a sinner by nature, and justly accurst;
And "Salvation by Grace" was the wonderful plan
Which God had invented to save erring man:
'Twas the only atonement he knew how to make

Now, this was the doctrine of good Parson Brown,
Who preached, not long since, in a small country town.
He was zealous and earnest, and could so excel
In describing the tortures of sinners in hell,
That a famous revival commenced in the place,
But he felt that he had not attained his desire
Till he had converted one Peter McGuire.

This man was a blacksmith, frank, fearless, and bold,
With great brawny sinews like Vulcan of old;
He had little respect for what ministers preach,
And sometimes was very profane in his speech;
His opinions were founded in clear common sense;
And he spoke as he thought, though he oft gave offense;
But however wanting, in whole or in part,
He was sound and all right when you came to his heart.

One day the good parson, with pious intent,
To the smithy of Peter most hopefully went;
And there, while the hammer industriously swung,
He preached and he prayed, and exhorted and sung,
And warned and entreated poor Peter to fly
From the pit of destruction before he should die,
And to wash himself clean from the world's sinful strife
In the blood of the Lamb and the River of Life.

Well, and what would you now be inclined to expect
Was the probable issue and likely effect?
Why, he swore "like a pirate," and (what do you think?)
From a little black bottle took something to drink!
And he said, "I'll not mention the blood of the Lamb;
But as for that river, it aren't worth a ——"

Then pausing, as if to restrain his rude force,

Quick out of the smithy the minister fled
As if a big bomb-shell had burst near his head;
And, as he continued to haste on his way,
He was too much excited to sing or to pray;
But he thought how that some were elected by grace
As heirs of his kingdom—made sure of their place;
While others are doomed to pains of hell-fire;
And, if e'er there was one such, 'twas Peter McGuire.

That night, when the Storm King was riding on high,
And the red shafts of lightning gleamed bright through the sky,
The church of the village, "the temple of God,"
Was struck for the want of a good lightning rod;
And, swiftly descending, the element dire
Set the minister's house, close beside it, on fire;
While he peacefully slumbered, with never a fear
Of the terrible work of destruction so near.

There were Mary and Hannah, and Tommy and Joe,
All sweetly asleep in the bedroom below;
(Like the wife of John Rogers, with "one at the breast;")
But Alice, the eldest, a gentle young dove,
Was asleep all alone in the room just above;
And, when the wild cry of the rescuer came,
She only was left to the pitiless flame.

When, lo! one was missing! "O Father above!"—
How madly she shrieked in her agony wild!—
"My Alice! my Alice!—oh! save my dear child!"
Then down on his knees fell the parson and prayed
That the terrible wrath of the Lord might be stayed.
Said Peter McGuire, "Prayer is good in its place;
But then it don't suit this particular case."

He turned down the sleeves of his red flannel shirt
To shield his great arms, all besmutted with dirt;
Then into the billows of smoke and of fire,
Not pausing an instant, dashed Peter McGuire.
Oh, that terible moment of anxious suspense!
And then their great joy, which was freely expressed,

In the arms of her mother, so pale and dismayed;
And as Alice looked up, and most gratefully smiled,
He bowed down his head and wept like a child.
Oh those tears of brave manhood that rained o'er his face
Showed the true Grace of Nature, and the Nature of Grace;
'Twas a manifest token, a visible sign,
Of the indwelling life of the Spirit Divine.

Consider such natures, and then, if you can,
Preach of "total depravity" innate in man.
Talk of blasphemy!—why, 'tis profanity wild
To say that the father thus cursed his own child.
Go learn of the stars and the dew-spangled sod
That all things rejoice in the goodness of God;
That each thing created is good in its place,

These Were Not "Godless Schools."

In view of Rome's continual boasting of her "Christian Schools," and in view of the fact that these so-called "Christian Schools" are taught by her men known as "Christian Brothers," and in view of the further fact that the "Christian Brothers'" schools have been condemned by the French government, and the "Brothers" are coming to the United States in large numbers (they have for years been teachers in parochial and other papal schools in this country), and the immigration officials allow them to land and pay them obsequious attention—in view of all this, the following extract from "Reynold's Newspaper," of London, will be read with interest:

Lay Brother Kneppert, of the Christian schools (Brother Asclepiod), twenty years' penal servitude for outrages on decency.—Assizes of Aube.

A Prominent Spiritualist Gone Home.

Elhanan Drake, of Monson, Maine, re-entered spirit life, Jan. 8, 1904, after an earthly pilgrimage of 73 years, 7 months and 7 days. Mr. Drake was a Spiritualist in the fullest sense of the word, hence a patriotic citizen in all relations of life. His word was his bond, and he was loved and trusted by all who knew him. He was proud of his religion and never hesitated to proclaim himself a Spiritualist whenever called upon to defend that which he knew to be true. In his palmy years, he took up arms for the preservation of our Union, and was mustered out in the summer of 1865. He enlisted in good faith, but from some strange chance, never took part in an engagement in the field. He believed in freedom for all races, for all peoples, and for the souls of men. Bigotry and superstition were no parts of his nature; he was broad-gauged, just and generous in all he said and did.

He was a member of the Etna Camp-meeting Association, of the State Spiritualist Association of Maine, and of the Bower of Beauty lyceum of Monson. He took special pride and pleasure in the work of the last-named organization, and was never so happy as when he was in attendance upon its meetings. "I only live when I am in the lyceum, or at Etna camp," was one of his last remarks during his final illness. Mr. Drake is the grandfather of the well-known juvenile Maine Spiritualists, the Coy and Jenne children, whose interest in and knowledge of Spiritualism are so well known in all sections of the land. The influence of Spiritualism upon these young lives is one of the holiest and sweetest chapters in all of its history.

Mr. Drake is survived by his loving wife, the stout-hearted helper of his life, by two sisters, and by two sons and five daughters. One son, two sisters and two brothers preceded him in his entrance into spirit life. One of his daughters is the gifted medium, Mrs. Mary R. Jenne, of Monson, the secretary of the Ladies' Aid Society of Etna Camp, and a speaker of no mean ability.

Mr. Drake will be missed by a wide circle of friends, and especially by his immediate household band. They have the truths of Spiritualism to comfort them in this hour, and have already received assurance of his presence with them through the mediumship of a granddaughter and of one of his sons-in-law. The memory of his gentle, unselfish life is a precious legacy to all all of his family.

The funeral services held at his late residence in Monson, on Sunday, January 10, and were conducted by the writer, who has long been a close friend of the family. The pastors of the Baptist and Congregational churches in Monson, offered the use of their edifices for the funeral, but the wife and mother preferred it should be held in the sacred circle room of the dear old home.

A good man has gone home. Greetings to my good friend as he takes up his labors anew in the world of souls.

A REMARKABLE BOOK.

The clear and very interesting account of the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, with the inciting causes of that tragedy, will serve to excite renewed interest in the great work of Father Chiniquy, entitled "Fifty years in the Church of Rome." In this book he exposes in the minutest details the corruption that exists in that church, and its iniquitous methods and aims.

It is a book of absorbing interest, and should be read by every patriotic American, and by every one who would be well informed concerning the evil works and designs of the Romish hierarchy. It is a large volume of 852 pages. Price, $2.25.

10—Seers of the Ages, or Spiritualism Past and Present.

Read This Carefully Before Remitting.

When you send in your subscription to The Progressive Thinker, carefully look over the books which you desire in this list, and their price, and send for them. They are very valuable. They are intensely interesting. They are elevating in tone and will do you good. In remitting do not fail to enclose a dollar for The Progressive Thinker.

These ten books, substantially and elegantly bound, and printed in the neatest style of the printer's art, will be furnished to our subscribers for $3.10, a price which modern machinery and enterprise has rendered possible in The Progressive Thinker office only. Sending out these books, however, at the prices we do, does not reduce the price of the subscription of the paper, apparently or otherwise, a single cent, for that cannot be afforded for less than one dollar per year, in view of the fact that we publish such a vast amount of reading matter.

In conclusion, bear in mind that the postage on these ten premium books is about ONE DOLLAR, leaving this office only $2.10, illustrating the great bargain you are getting—a bargain the like of which was never known before on this material plane.

CLUBS! CLUBS! CLUBS! CLUBS!

To Clubs of ten or more we offer the following terms to each one: The Progressive Thinker one year, and ONE of the following books, $1.15: "The Religion of Man and Ethics of Science"; "Seers of the Ages, or Spiritualism Past and Present"; "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands"; "The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World," Vol. 3. The one who gets up the Club will be entitled to the paper one year free, and any two of the books he may select among our list of premiums.

Man and the Spirit World as Disclosed in the Bible." By Rev. Arthur Chambers, Associate of King's College, London. An excellent book for Christian people who would investigate and learn the facts of Bible teachings as well as modern spirit phenomena. Price, cloth, $1.10.

Bible and Church Degrade Woman. By Elizabeth Cady Stanton. Comprises three essays on "The Effect of Woman Suffrage on Questions of Morals and Religion." Price, 10c.

Father Tom and the Pope, Or a Night at the Vatican. Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "poteen," and an Irish recipe for "conwounding" the same. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

A Worthy Example.

Our American clergy might find a worthy example in some of their European brethren. Especially is this true of the position taken by Professor Ugo Janni, of Florence, Italy, after a prolonged, patient and noteworthy impartial investigation of Spiritualism. He is among the most learned and orthodox, and of unquestioned attainments. In a series of articles published in "Ravista Christiana," of Florence, entitled "Spiritualism and Christianity." The attention he has given the subject, and the fair-mindedness of his treatment are in contrast to the snap judgments, and unfairness manifested too often in this country. We have not space to give more than his conclusions, as these contain the gist of the subject. These are three in number:

"(1) Not one of the scientific theories proposed, accounts for the mediumistic phenomena. (2) In the actual state of our knowledge, the Spiritualistic theory is the only one adequate to explain the whole of the mediumistic phenomena. (3) The spiritual cause of these phenomena is scientifically possible and probable."

In justification of his views he takes up a position unassailable by the Christian churches. He writes: "I am a disciple of him who brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel. If then the existence and immortality of the soul are certainties to my mind, communication between incarnate and decarnate beings is merely a simple corollary of my spiritual belief. If some persons suppose that there are insuperable barriers between those in and those out of the flesh, it behooves them to prove it. I not only cannot see it, but the Bible teaches me the very contrary. The Old Testament is full of spiritual phenomena, nor are examples wanting in the New." (He gives many examples.)

To those who quote the Bible as condemning unlawful communion with spirits, as the witch of Endor, which is the stock in trade of gospel ministers, he points out the difference between the divination of pagan and Bible times and modern investigation. These are not comparable.

Spiritualism is awakening great attention in Sicily. Lectures on the subject by such savants as Dr. Carmelo Lamona, call out large and enthusiastic audiences. The newspapers are filled with accounts of remarkable phenomena, and the mediums belong to the highest ranks of society. Among the most remarkable of these are the musical mediums, the Brothers Bordonaro, belonging to one of the most exclusive families of Palermo.

When a Medium Is Caught Tricking.

When a materializing medium is caught perpetrating a fraud, and the evidence is PLAIN AND OVERWHELMING, we will not publish communications stating that at a certain date previously he or she was perfectly honest and in every way reliable. Every convict in our prisons can establish such a record of honesty and reliability as that.

EXPERIMENTS OF PROF. ELMER GATES.

Prof. Gates is a scientist of great distinction, His investigations have led him largely into the regions of the occult, and therein he has made many important discoveries. In a late article in the Chicago Sundav Tribune he sets forth that he discerned the spirit of an animal after the death of the physical body.

The shadow of a soul!

Nay, more—the shadow of a beast's soul!

Can you conjure up such a thing in your wildest imagination?

Were you to distinctly see a shadow cast by something separating from the body of an animal at the moment of death—something penetrating all barriers and passing upward into space, then disappearing—what would you say that something was?

Call it illusion, hallucination, phantom, or what you will, such a sight was lately beheld by experimenters in the laboratory of psychology and psychurgy, near Chevy Chase, according to Prof. Elmer Gates, the director.

Prof. Gates tells the strange story thus:

"I have been experimenting with some light rays about five octaves above the violet—a form of wave energy akin to X-rays, but about as different from them as they are different from sound. This new radiant force is invisible when produced in an ordinary room, but I succeeded in making it visible by projecting it upon a wall coated with a substance whose color is altered by the action of the rays in question.

MADE FROM EYES OF BEASTS.

"This substance was rhodopsin—the visual purple of the retina, the seeing substance of the eye which light acts upon. This rhodopsin I extracted from the eyes of freshly slaughtered animals. I find that all known inorganic or inanimate substances are transparent to this force. Unlike the X-rays, they will shine through metals, bones, and such substances, which I can hold between the tube emitting these rays and the wall covered with rhodopsin without their casting a shadow, so to speak, or causing the color of the wall to be changed over the corresponding area.

"I find that any living thing, however, is opaque to these rays, and that it will cast a shadow as long as it retains life.

"A live rat is placed in a hermetically sealed glass tube held in the path of these rays and before the sensitized wall. As long as the rat remains alive it casts a shadow. On killing the animal it is found, after a certain lapse of time, that it becomes suddenly transparent.

"At the same instant a shadow having precisely the same shape as the animal is seen to pass out through the glass tube and move upward on the sensitized wall.

SAW THE SHADOW ASCENDING.

"Two of my laboratory assistants claim to have distinctly seen the shadow in the full course of its ascension. As soon as we can definitely prove this to other scientific men we will have demonstrated that some organism, presumably not atomic, perhaps etheric and capable of passing through glass, thus leaves the atomic body of an animal.

"Now, if in any way this escaping organism could be caught and made to give evidence that it still possessed mind, then we would for the first time have an inductive laboratory proof of the continuity of life after death."

"How do you now account for the opaqueness of the living organism under these rays, to which all lifeless matter is transparent?" the professor was asked.

ANIMALS DISCHARGE ELECTRIC WAVES

"I can best answer that after describing another experiment," said he. "I arranged a room lined throughout with sheets of lead—walls, ceiling and floor. The lead was connected with the earth by electric conductors passing through a galvanometer sufficiently sensitive to measure the amount of electricity emitted by any person in the room.

"With this apparatus I demonstrated that the body has its every muscle and nerve electrically excited whenever exercised. Every muscle and nerve is an electric conductor. If I lift my arm, thus, and keep the muscles tense, they give off more electric energy than when kept at rest.

"During exercise of the mind there are similar electric discharges into the surrounding atmosphere. By quantitatively measuring the electric waves given off by a person in mental activity we can effect some measurement of that activity. By measuring the electric waves given off by them you can compare two emotions. If you have a more intense emotion of any kind than have I, of that same emotion you will give off more electric waves while exercising that emotion than will I. Thus if I were to take two brothers separately into that lead-lined room, announce to each the news that his mother had died, the galvanometer would show in whom I had excited the strongest emotion of grief. This is the first time in the history of psychology that there has been any conceivable method of comparing subjective conscious states.

"But to return to the rat in the tube. My explanation of its opaqueness while alive is this: In any living body there are electric waves hurrying in all directions through the nerves and muscles. Light waves, which are electric waves, cannot penetrate such a bundle of electric impulses."

"Do you think, then, that the life fluid is an electric fluid, as many aver?"

"I think that life is some unknown resultant of a number of forces of which electricity is one. Life or mind is more intimately connected with matter through electric force than through any other."

"I am unwilling to discuss in detail my experiments in these as yet unknown fields until after they shall have been further investigated by others.

"If such an experiment can ever be successfully made, then biology and psychology will have been extended across the border without an intervening chasm, and the continuity of personal identity beyond death will have been scientifically demonstrated."

"Would that be a scientific proof of the immortality of the soul?"

"No, it would not demonstrate endless existence—merely the continuity of life beyond what we call death.

"The visible animal organism is composed of atomic solids, liquids, and gases. May there not be etheric solids, liquids, and gases, whose particles are infinitesimally smaller than atoms, and might there not be an etheric body composed of them, might be asked. Such truth could be made a co-ordinate part of the growing body of scientific knowledge.

"In the demonstration of nearly every scientist in the world such demonstration of the actuality of another life has not yet been made."

"Have you ever seen what you thought to be an apparition?"

"No. And while I disclaim to have yet had any such personal experience tending directly to demonstrate that there is an existence beyond death, yet I must confess that that I have always had what I will call an emotive certainty or a feeling insight, that there is that in my mind which will persist after the death and dissolution of my body.

"But while some of these principles have a scientific basis others are purely speculative. Do you not think that we have waded out deep enough?"

The Great Enigma Solved.

According to the very intelligent correspondent of the Chicago Record-Herald, Mr. Wm. E. Curtis, the mystery of that great wonder of the world, the sphinx, which has perplexed philosophers, archeologists and learned scientists for ages, has at last been definitely solved.

We let Mr. Curtis explain in his own luminous words:

Cairo, Jan. 12.—The Sphinx is no longer a mystery nor was it intended to represent a woman. The inquisitiveness of modern antiquarians has solved the greatest enigma that ever perplexed mankind. No other relic of antiquity has been the object of more discussion or the subject of wilder theories, legends and superstitions. During the last two thousand years a whole library of books has been written about it, and at times controversies as to its age, significance and purpose have been very active. While its age is still unknown, and no facts connected with its origin have come down to us, yet within the last few years Egyptologists have shown that it is nothing but a colossal image or portrait of Ra-Harmachis, God of the Morning, Conqueror of Darkness, and hence it faces the Rising Sun.

This was recently disclosed by inscriptions discovered upon the walls of a temple which lies underneath and around the Sphinx and the discovery was largely due to Colonel Ram, an American scholar, who has been engaged for several years in excavations there. He has uncovered the foundations of the great statue and has brought to light many interesting features which until recently were unknown. The temple surrounding the base was intended for the worship of Harmachis and several chambers hewn in the rock were the tombs of kings and priests devoted to his worship. In 1896 Colonel Ram discovered a stone cap with a sacred asp carved on the forehead, which once covered the head of the Sphinx like a royal helmet, and must have added immensely to its grandeur, particularly if it was gilded, as Colonel Ram believes.

The Sphinx is not an independent structure. The body and head are actually hewn out of the solid rock, but much sandstone was built in to make the outlines perfect and cover defects in the material. This re-enforcement of the original rock is very apparent now to a close observer, but originally they were concealed, for scientists believe that the entire image was once covered with enamel. Indeed it is possible even now to find fragments still adhering to the surface which resemble the porcelain tiles found in tombs and the ruins of the ancient palaces. Several private collectors and some museums have large blocks of most brilliant coloring and artistic design, and from them we can imagine what an imposing spectacle the great statue must have been before the Persians and the Mohammedans destroyed its glory.

While it is still an impressive picture it has no beauty whatever. The nose, the lips and other features have been mutilated by vandals, among whom the French soldiers under Napoleon are said to have been the most vicious, but the defacement began before the Christian era when Cambyses invaded Egypt and made it a province of the Persian empire. The expression upon the face of the great being statue is blank. Poets and imaginative people have expended much eloquence in describing lines which do not appear and are purely fanciful, and we have been told again and again that the solemn immobility of its expression is the "ideal of mystery in stone." One writer that I read the other day described it as having "a comeliness not of this world," "a mould of beauty now forgotten—forgotten because Greece drew forth Cythrea from the flashing foam of the Aegean and in her image created new forms of beauty." While this sounds fine it is preposterous rot. There is no more expression about the face of the Sphinx than there would be in any sandstone image that has been hit square in the nose by a three-hundred pound shot fired from a French cannon and had its features scattered over a square mile of desert.

But, nevertheless, there is a fascination about this great statue that cannot be avoided and one will go again and again and as often as possible to look at its shapeless face and monstrous figure which rises from the sand against the amber sky.

The body of the Sphinx, which resembles that of a lion, is 150 feet long; the paws and legs, which are stretched out in front, are 50 feet long; the head is 30 feet from the neck upwards, the face is 14 feet wide and the whole figure 72 feet high. It is believed to have been built long before the pyramids, for inscriptions found within the temple show that it was old at the time of Cheops, who erected the big pyramid 3700 years before Christ. He made many repairs in the temple and upon the image and left a record of that fact. There is also a tablet showing that it was repaired by King Chephren, one of his successors. Another tablet tells an interesting story. One day while he was taking his after-dinner nap, King Thophmes IV. (B. C. 1533) had a vision in which the god Harmachis appeared to him and made generous promises if he would dig his image, this same Sphinx, out of the sand. Thophmes did as requested and erected this tablet to commemorate the fact.

ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS.

One thousand dollars is the sum offered by a company of men (Spiritualists) in California for one genuine spirit materialization, as will be seen upon the fourth page of last week's Progressive Thinker, and they mean business. This is a splendid chance to settle this great question and gain the everlasting praise of all true Spiritualists. Will not some medium for this phase, who knows he or she is genuine, accept this offer and confer a favor upon our cause?

TO THE SPIRITUALISTS OF CHICAGO.

The Light of Truth while at Columbus, Ohio, championed the cause of Mabel Aber Jackman, whose "materialized spirit" (a confederate) was caught at one of her seances on the South Side, and whose methods had been previously exposed at Lily Dale, N. Y. It also championed the miserable, notorious gang who stole the name of the Illinois State Spiritualist Association, publishing freely its communications, which gang caused the Illinois State Spiritualist Association, headed by Dr. G. B. Warne, now vice-president of the National Spiritualist Association, no end of trouble and expense. Now that the paper has removed to this city, its editor, who has always had a penchant for "putting his foot in it," has been lecturing for the Jackman crowd, giving it favorable notices. Such being the case we desire to say that The Progressive Thinker does not fraternize in any sense whatever with the Mabel-Aber-Jackman-Willard-J.-Hull gang, nor will it publish the notices or reports of any society, speaker, association or medium that does.

Mr. Townsend, the owner of the Light of Truth, has always been most sadly unfortunate in the selecting of some one to run his paper, having lost much money in keeping it before the people, which fact fully illustrates and demonstrates the business incapacity of those who have had it in charge. Societies in this city which hereafter employ the Mabel-Aber-Jackman-Willard-J.-Hull gang to lecture for them have a perfect right to do so, but they are certainly in hard luck for talent, and are to be pitied. We advise Mr. Townsend to assume hereafter full control of his paper. If not, we can furnish him some data that will astonish him and startle Spiritualists and cause King Solomon's Mine to shake as if by an earthquake.

"Why Are Spiritual Outpourings In Cycles?"

Mrs. Richmond's address this week is especially interesting and suggestive. No emanations from the pulpits in Chicago can begin to equal it—it surpasses them all! Soon we will publish another lecture by Mrs. M. T. Longley—this time on THE LIFE OF THE SOUL. It is exceptionally fine. These two speakers ought to have at least one thousand to listen to them each week.

ALAS! WHAT NEXT?

Thick and Fast Are Coming Exposures of Materializing Mediums.

On Dec. 10, 1903, we held a materialization seance at my residence, 1110 Bedford avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y. Mr. S. Thompson, of No. 76 Clinton avenue, Kingston, N. Y., was the medium. Our suspicions were aroused that Mr. Thompson's "spirit manifestations" were not genuine. I therefore arranged for another seance which was held on Dec. 21, on which occasion Mr. Thompson was caught using deception. I was in attendance at the cabinet, assisted by Mr. Robinson, who is a personal friend of the medium, and who recommended him to me. The first part of the seance consisted of physical manifestations. The medium entered the cabinet, and all lights were extinguished. The medium's hands were firmly tied together by means of a rope which he brought with him. The tying was supposed to have been done by his spirit controls. The gas was relighted and the medium's hands, which were tied, were examined by all in the seance, no one being able to untie the rope. The lights were again extinguished. In the course of a few seconds he called for the light to be relit. He was found to be seated in a chair, with his hands firmly tied to his knees, and in this position was supposed to remain throughout the seance. He then requested one member of the seance and myself to enter the cabinet. We placed our right hands on the medium's head, and caught our left hands, holding them extended and even with his head, one of us placing one knee on the medium's hands. We were touched all over the body by some unknown means, supposed to be our departed friends. Bright luminous lights on the order of small electric sparks appeared in rapid succession for a period of a few seconds, directly back of the medium's chair, written messages also being given to some of those who entered the cabinet, none being recognized. Each member of the seance thus entering the cabinet in turn, the same manifestations were produced. Materialization was then begun with a very dim light in the room. All the forms that issued from the cabinet were exactly alike. The medium was recognized on several occasions, which left absolutely no doubt that he was not genuine. AS THE FORM OF WHAT WAS SUPPOSED TO BE A CHILD APPEARED AT THE CURTAIN I GRABBED IT, AND IT PROVED TO BE MR. THOMPSON ON HIS KNEES, WITH A SILK HANDKERCHIEF OVER HIS HEAD AND ANOTHER WITH EACH CORNER TUCKED IN HIS VEST POCKET. The handkerchief on his head I managed to keep hold of, and as the cabinet curtains were raised the lights were turned up and he was seen getting off his knees. The rope by which he was tied was lying on the floor beside his chair. I don't doubt that his physical as well as his materialization manifestations were the result of simple trickery. As it stands to reason that an honest, upright medium would not use any dishonest methods to produce his manifestations, I therefore conclude that he, being dishonest in one instance, was in both, as we all know the cabinet manifestations, such as the tying of hands, etc., can be and are done by trickery. I wrote Mr. Thompson, offering him the alternative of giving another seance at my residence to prove that he could produce genuine manifestations; or I would expose him to the public. I received a reply in which he refused my invitation, but would give another seance under conditions favorable for him to carry on his deception. I submit this to you as an unbiased statement, hoping that you will give the main facts publication. I think it is due to Spiritualists at large to be acquainted with the above facts, that they may be guarded against any further imposture from Mr. S. Thompson.

The Poison of the Catholic Church.

According to a dispatch from Rome to the Chicago Inter Ocean, owing to the hostile attitude of the Vatican toward the Italian government, petty reprisals on the part of the authorities are on the increase. Only the other day a public auction was ordered of all the sacred vessels belonging to the congregation of the Piceno, including several precious chalices and vestments. It was only through an injunction secured by the best legal talent, engaged by the parish priest of San Salvatore, that the auction was put off and the case refered to the courts.

Religious teaching in the public schools has been abolished in many provinces of Italy. The latest of these measures was taken by the government in Cesena, where the municipal council, with the approval of the council of state, decided that "the teaching of the catechism was contrary to civil morality."

The novitiate of the Jesuit fathers at Castel Gandolfo, where the Pope's villa is situated, has been removed from the Villa Torlonia by order of the government. Originally this property belonged to the Jesuits, and is the same place where Wolfang Goethe, the German poet, spent many months with his inamorata from Milan in 1786. When the late Duke Torlonia bought the property he let the Jesuit fathers use it on condition that his family tomb on the premises be properly attended to.

Now the Italian authorities have ordered the Jesuit fathers to vacate the premises, as only two or three would be sufficient for the custody of the tomb.

The Vatican authorities are much concerned over the matter, especially because religious teaching may be abolished in all the public schools, and the position of the many members of religious orders, who have lately come here from France, may be rendered unpleasant.

A Sudden, Strange Disappearance.

Many readers of The Progressive Thinker will remember the case of the strange disappearance of a young lady of Crookston, Minn., of whom no trace could be found at the time, and it appears from the following letters that no clue has been found to this day, more than a year since the occurrence.

To the Editor:—After waiting a year hoping to see some further report of the mysterious disappearance of Miss Gertrude Strassberger of Crookston, Minn., as reported in The Progressive Thinker of Jan. 10, 1903, I wrote to Mr. E. Strassberger, her father, to know more about it, receiving a reply which I herewith enclose, hoping you will publish for the benefit of your readers who are as anxious as I was to know more about it. W. J. GUILD.

Rolla, Mo.

Mr. W. J. Guild, Rolla, Mo.:

Dear Sir:—Your letter at hand inquiring about the whereabouts of our lost daughter. Will say, yes it has been a year on the first of December last year when she went skating with a party, and to a place where a good many people were, and accidentally was left behind when the others went home, at a time when most people had deserted the ice. She is gone since, nothing was ever heard about her although no trouble or money has been saved in investigating near and far.

She is undoubtedly dead, but which way she died nobody can tell.

I do not think that any newspaper stories will tell you anything near the truth, because the make-up stories then in many papers were all fictitious, and every clue proved false.

Very truly yours, E. STRASSBURGER.

Crookston, Minn.

In the Name of Humanity.

True, I am a materialist, supposed to be on the wrong road, and supposed not to feel for another's woe! Poor Geo. F. Perkins, 122 Mission street, San Francisco, Cal., with a chronic invalid wife to care for, who begins that piteous cry: "I am making a desperate struggle," closing with the manly appeal: "Give me a chance to earn a dollar."

I do not ask if this man and myself believe alike. He is a suffering brother with a suffering wife. I know what that means—a wife crippled by a fall upon a Cincinnati pavement five years ago. I dropped all public work abroad to nurse her back to health. Trials not a few, tribulations a flood; from comparative affluence to pinching poverty—naturally independent, proud-spirited, both of us, she a Southern woman, Baltimorean, and a Spiritualist—a perfect right to be one. Never asked a Spiritualist, knowingly, on her account, or my own, to "lend a hand,"—but, oh, Spiritualists I ask you to heed that cry of Geo. F. Perkins, feel for a dollar in your pocket and send it to him—you will feel better, and he will, and his wife. W. F. JAMIESON.

Firebrands in Our Ranks.

A firebrand was thrown into the ranks of Spiritualism when The Great Psychological Crime was first introduced to our readers, but a still more luminous and startling firebrand was tossed into our ranks when our own prominent Spiritualists intimated that only the impure could be obsessed or dangerously controlled by evil spirits. That assertion did not act like a "Soothing Syrup" when taken into the brain receptacle of those troubled by evil spirits. But these various firebrands of the past have never yet succeeded in injuring Spiritualism in the least; in the end they greatly promote its welfare. So let the firebrands come. Mrs. Straub speaks from actual experience.

MRS. HENRIETTA STRAUB, A LADY OF REFINEMENT AND CULTURE, CAREFULLY ANALYZES THE CLAIM THAT ONLY THOSE WHO ARE IMPURE ARE OBSESSED BY EVIL OR MALICIOUS SPIRITS—HER VIEWS WILL BE CAREFULLY READ AND CONSIDERED.

Nothing in the realm of mind seems to be more conducive to promote a deep general interest in a given subject, a strong concentration of mental forces in that one direction, than these symposiums which we evidently owe to the inspirational powers of Mr. Francis.

THEY ARE INTELLECTUAL TOURNAMENTS FOR SELECT COMPANY, AND OF INCALCULABLE BENEFIT TO THE CHAMPIONS AS WELL AS THE BEHOLDERS. . . . . .

Especially is this true of the last symposium, that has developed into a pitched battle between the forces pro and con that famous book, "The Great Psychological Crime."

The victory will not be decided for a long time yet, as the author of the book, the promoter of the battle, has kept in reserve his most effective ammunition, destined to burst upon the valiant fighters in the shape of another, a more conclusive, volume of the work.

Well-aimed, substantial volleys have been discharged from both sides of the combatants; many brilliant speeches have been made in print; many strong arguments based on proof, have been advanced, EVEN PERSONAL ATTACKS, UNFAIR INSINUATIONS HAVE BEEN VENTURED.

Certain weapons should never be used in polemic warfare, unless they have solid handles of verified truth.

It seems that even Spiritualists—and prominent ones at that—cannot maintain balance of temper when attacking an antagonist. Will they imitate our hot-headed, cross-grained politicians, THE CURSE OF OUR GOVERNMENT? True, they fight for their mediumship that has been wildly abused; but can it not be done in a dignified way, with the strength of convincing logic?

Why show lack of self-control, the very thing your assailant reproaches you with?

"Much truth and plenty of exaggeration" was the answer of a thinker in yonder world, when asked for his opinion about that stirring book.

No doubt many thinking persons will have to arrive at the same conclusion. Nobody can argue away the DANGERS OF MEDIUMSHIP, as nobody will argue away its blessings under the right conditions. We are not constituted alike; only a quack will give the same medicine to differently constituted people; neither are energy and will-power among the drugs that can be obtained at the pharmacy.

Whosoever does not possess them, while being of an impressional nature, should let mediumship severely alone. The readers of The Progressive Thinker have been invited to report all cases of obsession coming within their knowledge. This prompts me to refer to my own case, described in last year's Progressive Thinker, in form of a story-ette, "Connected Worlds." To show the persistency of some influences, let me tell those who may remember the facts, that I am forced to abandon the use of the psychic board, though on the best way to develop several phases of mediumship. Whenever, after long intervals, I try the board again to reach some dear one across the line, on comes the almost forgotten rascal, cleverly impersonating the one I called, until finally I catch a glimpse of "THE CLOVEN FOOT." Consequently, I only cultivate inspirational mediumship, while the inspiring influence insists on our working "viribus unitis," declining the honor of any leadership.

There are evidently mediums so constructed, physically and mentally, as to control the choice of their "controls." They are fortunate; but let them BE WARE OF INCESSANTLY REPEATING TO THE LESS FORTUNATE ONES, THE OLD THREADBARE SENTENCE, "LIKE SEEKS LIKE." It is a slap in the face of any man or woman who honestly desires the best, but is assailed by wickedness, happening to find some convenient avenue.

Look into human society and see whether "like always seeks like"; it is more often the contrary; but if there is mutual attraction, if like associates with like, that is another question. The old adage may hold good in one case, but not in another.

Some of those VIRTUE-PROUD PEOPLE go on saying, "Those tendencies attracting evil influences may have been so well hidden, that nobody was aware of them before."

Indeed! Might we not as well suspect a wolf hidden within a lamb's bosom, that never growls, except when some other wolf comes in sight?

Thinkers should be observers.

It must be something else but similarity that furnishes a vehicle for spirit approach. Let unbiased scientists work out this problem.

The great fascination of mediumship is a sure guarantee for its continuance, all books on psychological crimes notwithstanding. Innumerable facts demonstrate that the author's dreams of annihilation could at best be only applicable to moral weaklings who never had any individuality to lose. Besides, who has ever witnessed the process of annihilation? Reason as well as faith point to the opposite process. Evolution promises continued unfoldment; faith hopes to behold every mental or spiritual embryo develop in the course of eternity into a well-rounded immortal individuality. But since no absolute proof is possible, the most reasonable attitude is: Hopeful agnosticism.

It would no doubt be an immense blessing to humanity, should there indeed exist a direct road of communication between the two worlds, one that can be found and utilized by every honest and intelligent seeker.

Does it behoove Spiritualists to put the modern "would-be-Galileo" to the rack (mentally speaking)?

Having so much to suffer from ignorant skepticism, shall we be guilty of it ourselves?

Will any jury render a verdict unless all features of the case be duly examined?

It is strange, that no movement, however liberal, can exist for any length of time, without empiricism slipping into it.

Open your eyes, my friends, and see it stalk through the ranks of Spiritualism.

THERE WILL BE A RUPTURE ERE LONG. The rock of Spiritualism will split in two or several parts.

I feel it clearly. May it be for the good of the cause!

To enlarge further about the wealth of thought laid down in the Symposium would mean to carry water into the ocean; so I beg permission for a few closing remarks:

We theorize so much about far-off questions, that we naturally overlook the importance of nearer ones.

THIS WORLD IS THE FOUNDATION OF THE NEXT, AND THE BETTER THE FOUNDATION, THE SAFER THE BUILDING. The burning questions of to-day should enlist our sympathies much more than they actually do.

Many of us trust to the spirits, for questions we dislike to tackle, just as grown-up orthodox children trust to the clever management of their heavenly father. Surely this lacking interest could be aroused by putting the one or the other of these questions under the mighty searchlight of a symposium.

Why Are Spiritual Outpourings In Cycles?

The question forming the theme of our discourse this morning, "Why Do Spiritual Outpourings Come in Cycles?" is one that is frequently asked. In fact, the knowledge of the whole subject concerning the government of that which seems to regulate the spiritual universe is sadly lacking in human thought.

Most of the people who are in the world to-day understand that the physical universe is governed by what they are pleased to call "natural laws," and that these laws work in legitimate sequence, and that there are cycles and periods of time in which certain manifestations, according to these laws will inevitably occur. That there are certain larger cycles that sometimes seem to interrupt the smaller ones, but bear forward the greater physical purpose. For instance, you are perfectly familiar with the revolution of the earth upon its axis, and the small cycle of the morning and day and the evening and night, and these being familiar to you you do not look upon them as wonderful or strange. You are familiar with the larger cycles of the lunar changes upon which is predicated the foundations of your monthly computations. Of course there has been a great change in the calendar; but there has been no change in the actual lunar cycles since human life began on earth. The moon continues to present her many phases and is known to be a satellite of the earth and to revolve around the earth. The earth in its turn, now that you know what it is, and that the shadow which rested upon the people in the middle ages and earlier ages is removed, and you have returned to the great knowledge of the Egyptians, who knew the true astronomy, you understand that instead of the sun moving around the earth to light up the earth, the earth revolves upon its axis—as said before—and moves around the sun, and this is called a year, and the various changes for convenience and because of the changes of the moon are divided into months.

Of course there is the lunar calendar and the calendar of the months, because the ancient computation could not make the changes of the moon and the year come out even. So you have your especial calendar month, not cyclic, but only for convenience, and you have your lunar month which continues as a larger cycle than that of the day and night. Then you have your annual cycle of the revolution of the earth around the sun. Then there are larger cycles that can only be measured by astronomers; then other cycles that astronomers can only predicate, cycles that seem to interrupt the great general onward march, the great tide of growth to outline the harmonious unfoldment. There are cyclic storms and glacial periods, in which the ice and snow sweep down from either pole and destroy continents, change the courses of rivers, build up mountains and disturb the countries generally. Nevertheless, these are also cyclic.

Had you perfect knowledge of the meteorological, magnetic and electric conditions of the earth, you would know that earthquakes, volcanic eruptions and tornadoes are also cyclic; that there are certain periods in which through a tornado belt the tornadoes will rush and knowledge of this law would enable you to know when they will be likely to occur. That there are certain cycles in which there will be more earthquake shocks than usual. That these earthquakes follow certain lines in their cyclic disturbances which are the result, either of magnetic, electrical, or dynamical changes. You would, also, understand more about the glacial periods, that sometime formed the course of the great Mississippi river; that sometimes lick up great lakes like the great lakes of the northern portion of your country, and at other times release them, giving them an outlet to the sea. All this you measurably understand, and the astronomers have taught you that there is a larger cycle in which your solar system and other solar systems that are associated with yours move around a more distant sun, and that accompanying these cycles are great physical and astronomical changes.

People become familiar with day and night, summer and winter, and the changes of the year, but when you enter the spiritual and moral realm, theology on the one hand and material science on the other have locked up the door and lost the key by which you are to know about man's spiritual and moral natures; as science says it is simply a question of evolution, and theology says it is simply a question of Divine Providence; the history of the human race theologically considered, must be a great disappointment to Deity. Made perfect, man succeeded in falling, and ever since that time has been trying to retrieve the consequence of that fall by methods that are very difficult; or has been shirking altogether, whichever horn of the dilemma you choose to take. That is theology.

For our own part we have read the history of inspiration differently. We have seen that nations have risen and fallen. We have seen that in the course of their existence they have had certain experiences. That by beginning in a primitive condition they were simple in their habits and requirements, and that at the end there was intellectual and physical power, and with this success certain corruption. Then, sweeping in, comes the tide of inspiration to correct their principles and place them on the right road to moral discovery and achievement. That after a time certain lives reach that achievement, while the rest seem to go down in shadow. We have seen this in the history of all nations. We have marked, that inevitably at certain manifestations of physical and intellectual unfoldment in every nation the earth has any record of, there has been a distinct moral and spiritual outpouring. The knowledge of this is inculcated in the Bibles of the world. It can be traced in the Vedas, the Shasters, the Zend-a-Vestas and other sacred books, the Koran of the Mohammedans, in the Bible of the Jews, and in the New Testament of the Christians, as well as in the revelations of the oracles, prophets and seers, which, of course, are not mere assumption, nor the result of ignorance and superstition, but, primarily, the result of a distinct outpouring of the spirit to guide nations.

There is usually a primal religion, then when people are sufficiently prosperous and intellectual enough to think they can go along without that guidance they violate, seemingly, all the principles in their primal religion, and worship the intellect or some external image, departing from the simplicity of their primal faith, and then, there comes a voice of warning from seers, prophets and oracles to tell them of their danger and ask them to return to the primitive, and beautiful and worshipful faith of their fathers.

Now we say that this is just as regular and just as inevitably the course of human events as the changes of the tides and the recurring seasons, and once in a great while, when there sweeps over many nations a cloud of materialism, a shadowing of the primal light, a departing from that which in ethics is just as inevitable and constant as the North Star, there comes an overwhelming "glacial period" of national destruction, caused by the nemesis of justice, of the overthrow of existing states and institutions, of the downfall of kings and kingdoms and hierarchies and the beginning with the simplicity of a Galilee, or the simplicity of a Buddhistic period.

Intellectual materialistic people have ascribed these Messianic cycles and these periods of spiritual outpouring to superstition, and have relegated alike messiahs, prophets, seers and the one endowed with spiritual gifts to the domain of superstition. But no impartial reader of history, no student of the rise and fall of empires, no one watching what Egypt was in her least and in her greatest attainment, no one aware of what China has been in her past and is to-day, no one who has studied the great light of India and perceived how through many cycles her people have been led, no one who follows the "Children of Israel," not through the mythical wanderings that the Christians will have them perform, but through the actual history of their lives, no one that has followed the changes and fluctuations in Christendom but sees the evidences of great spiritual outpourings at certain critical points in the history of nations and people.

Therefore, it is not strange that the Magians of the East included these in their astronomical calculations. Because at that time science and religion were not separated. It is not strange that in the more western nations there was also knowledge that these spiritual achievements and attainments came accompanying a certain definite demand.

Now when people have forgotten their inspiration, as the Jews had, and turn to material worship, to external observances merely of the letter of the law and to external worship, the prophets begin to arrive, and they foretell, not only the downfall of material power, but they announce the oncoming of the new spiritual light. Among the Brahmins when they had departed from the original inspiration and the brahminical faith became mere priestcraft among the people, simply the observance of form and ceremony and the supporting of the priests, when there was nothing left in all that wonderful, dreamy Oriental and transcendental religion that reached the people in their needs, Buddha Gautama came and pierced the shadow and the darkness and received the inspiration and the knowledge of what was required for human life and human purposes, and carried forward the great reformation in India and all over Asia.

It is useless to deny that such lives are intended. It is easy to say the Plato was a student of Socrates and an incident in human history. The great moral purposes are carried forward by such lives and intelligences. There are only two sources of intelligence: the Infinite Soul and the finite souls of men (angels and spirits), and when a light is needed it comes, just as surely as after the shadow of the night and the departure of the shadow that precedes the dawn the light comes. The sun's splendor hath never disappointed man, even though it seems to be eclipsed sometimes by the clouds and shadows of the earth. Just as surely as that great light at the North, the "North Star" shines out to guide the mariner upon the sea, the traveler on the desert or in the wilderness and light human beings on their way, so there rises above the night of time and beyond the mere conditions of human lives a life that is needed to bear forward this great and divine purpose of giving to man anew, the moral and spiritual purpose of existence.

It would indeed be a blind nature that would create man with emotions and spiritual powers and nothing to guide them. It would be a blinder providence that would endow human intelligence with these surpassing attributes that awaken the love of justice of freedom, or Love itself and then give no answer.

The first inspiration ever given to man was an inspiration beyond the senses and endowed with the attributes of Infinite love; the last inspiration given to man is that which gives to his spiritual and divine attributes the highest place, whether he is a follower of Jesus, or Buddha, or Zoroaster or another. We find that the height of their moral teaching is the exalted thought of loving one another, the manifestation of the love of God through loving human beings and seeking to do them good. The Indian upon the plain, the savage—whom you call savage—in the islands of the sea has received the same message apart from his physical life; and all nations that pass to the heights of what are called civilization, and art, and science have laid the foundation of their loftiest principles in the inspiration of the spirit, in the teachings of oracles, seers and prophets, and in the poetry that has followed that inspiration, and in the high moral precepts that are the result of that inspiration.

Man does not learn to love his fellow-man in the way of self-denial in any proposition that he finds in material science. Ethics are not born of mathematics but they are born of the Sermon on the Mount, of the teaching of Buddha beneath that wonderful tree wherein all the lines of life are revealed to him; by what Confucius gathered from the great Chinese sages and the inspiration of the teachers of the past; by that which Zerdusht taught until it became a living flame in Persia and spread over the Orient. The ethics of every nation is found in its highest religious inspiration, in the teachings of spiritual gifts. We do not mean in the Vatican; we do not mean beneath the dome of Saint Peter's in Rome, or Saint Paul's in London. But we mean religion, that which clothes the man with the divine; that which pervades the dust with the spirit, that which quenches selfishness in the care for others, that which leads to divine love instead of human passion.

That which has exalted the human race from time immemorial is that which has come through tongue of prophet, seer and sage, which has been woven into its songs and borne forward in its sacred and divine reminiscences. To-day when you look out upon the world you know that you are in the midst of one of these spiritual cycles. That not only is the earth experiencing great changes, that not only is there desolation by fire, flood, earthquakes and volcanic eruptions, and so-called accidents among human beings, not only are there wars and rumors of wars stirring the Orient and the Occident to the uttermost, but there is great spiritual purpose: handwriting upon the walls; signs and tokens everywhere, and the outpouring of the spirit for the last fifty-five years in distinct spiritual ministration. What with Mother Ann Lee foretold that the spiritual experiences of the small society to which she ministered would become general among all people, and which has now spread all over the earth. What with George Fox and the Quakers separating themselves from theological dogma to receive the inspiration of the spirit that is now spread abroad, and that which various dissenting bodies from the church of England and the church of Rome have been pleading for.

This knowledge of the mighty meaning and personality of spiritual influence has come to pass. It has produced a great stirring; it has stirred the stagnant pool of Theology, and such as have seen the signs of the times have moved forward to receive the message. It has stirred the equally dead pool of material science, and such as were not utterly dead have moved forward to "Psychic Research" and similar investigations to clasp hands with the new revelations. It has stirred and troubled the pool of commerce, of political and social life, and such as were not utterly dead or immured in the toils of mammon have moved forward to join the ranks of Bellamy or Henry George, or some prophet of the great new Social Dispensation. It has stirred the lives of such as see that nations cannot rest upon material foundations alone, but must rest upon justice, freedom and love of humanity, until the future republic is a future fraternity, and the nations of the earth cannot be less than nations linked together in fraternity, and nations cannot be linked together in fraternity until the nations are founded upon fraternity. Of what value are treaties with Germany and Austria, and all the monarchies of the world so long as they are monarchies? Treaties are written in sand and are made to be broken. We know there can be no fraternal bonds of nations until there is fraternal bond of the people that compose the nations. So here in Chicago and other places you can have not fraternal bonds of sister cities until you wipe out the slums, the boards of trade and other things that depress mankind.

The spiritual light is here to tell you that the spiritual value of every human being to-day on earth is his moral and spiritual unfoldment, and that not one of the smallest portions of all his material power, his intellectual grandeur or whatever is material accompanies him into the realm of spirit except as a weakness. You conquer the earth and die at St. Helena, whether you are a Napoleon or a billionaire. And now this spiritual light is so holding up the mirror it has swept through and through the shadowy place called death, and changed the sepulcher to a gateway of life; changed the bier and the lifeless form to dust while the spirit stands released. It has made the gateway of immortality here and now. Every time a fluttering breath passes its great wide portals the sweep of immortal pinions are heard that welcomes an enfranchised spirit. You live in another world. You are in a great cycle of changes.

Happy are they who know what the "signs of the times" portend, who standing upon some height can perceive that which is moving and passing all around. So, dearly beloved friends, this is why at this hour your beloved ones greet you with a message from beyond the change called death; this is why these ministering ones have thrown open the immortal gateway; because the world needed it; because it hungered and thirsted for this knowledge; because buried in the shadow of creeds, in the shadow of materialism the spirit of man was hungering and thirsting for food and for the fountain of life. However simple the message; however untaught in worldly ways the messenger, the one thing that can open that gateway is what you want. To show you now, at this hour, you are in the spirit realm; that these great throes and agonizing human experiences are portions of this spiritual growth. Anything that does that is a benefaction and a blessing. Sometimes you know in summer time when the air is thick and heavy, when you can hardly breathe and there seems to be noxious vapors impinging and heavy clouds, "Oh!" you say, "I wish the storm would come." At last it does come, the pent-up thunder peals forth, the lightning flashes and the wind roars. Oh! how they crash and revel. Then in an hour all is gone and the sun smiles forth, the air is purified, there has been but little harm and great good.

Let us remember that nature is governed by the infinite law of love, and souls that pass through crises like that in their human experiences are neither lost nor lost sight of by ministering attendants; the great wide sweep of spirit helpers is around. Your experience is yours and you must pass through it, they cannot do it. But there are helpers on every hand, not the helpers of earth, they are feeble and liable to sink, but spirit helpers to tell you when the storm is over and past, and the great victory has been won, and to urge you to know in the great disturbances, changes and phases of life that go on so rapidly in this day and hour, that it is a cycle, that there is to be a culmination. It will not come in the form of "Elijah II," it will not come in the form of the many messiahs, like the epidemics of messiahs that have come forth in Chicago and elsewhere. It will not come in any such way. But it will come in the New Voice of Truth, whenever and wherever the cyclic time arrives.

The cyclic period and the voice will be the next voice; it will declare the next great truth. The world will not be ready to meet it, but the people will meet it according to their states, and they will climb up to it after centuries; as you have been climbing up to the Golden Rule and the Sermon on the Mount, albeit, not yet attaining it. But throughout the world some have attained it, more are seeking it, until sometime and somewhere it will no longer be a mockery in the, so-called, Christian service, but the light of souls. Then it will not only be, "Do ye unto others as ye would that others should do unto you," but the larger and more perfect commandment will have been fulfilled, the one commandment that Jesus gave: "Love ye one another."

RESTORES EYESIGHT.

Spectacles a Thing of the Past.

"Actina," a Marvelous Discovery That Cures All Afflictions of the Eye and Ear Without Cutting or Drugging.

A marvelous discovery has been made by that Scientist and Inventive Genius, Prof. W. O. Wilson. He has invented a restorer known as "Actina," through which all afflictions of the eyes and ear, such as blindness, granulated lids, cataracts, sore eyes, deafness, etc., are cured without cutting or drugging. It is a simple contrivance, known as the Actina Pocket Battery, and through it the patients cure themselves in the privacy of their own homes. It not only abolishes the butcheries and torturous methods practiced by oculists, and aurists, but at the same time perfects a positive and lasting cure.

Rev. W. O. Goodwin, Moline, Kansas, writes: "My honest opinion of "Actina" is that it is one of the most marvelous discoveries of the age. It saved my eyes from an operation."

Mr. F. W. Harwood, Springfield, Mass., says that "Actina" cured him of deafness of nine years' standing.

Mr. A. L. Howe, Tully, N. Y., writes: "Actina" has removed cataracts from both my eyes. I can read well without my glasses; am sixty-five years old.

Robert Baker, Ocean Park, Cal., writes: "I should have been blind had I Not used "Actina."

A party of prominent citizens have organized a company known as the New York and London Electric Association, and they have given this method so thorough a test on hundreds of cases pronounced incurable and hopeless that they now positively assure a cure. "Actina" is sent on trial postpaid. If you will call or send your name and address to the New York and London Electric Association, Dept. T.B., 929 Walnut St., Kansas City, Mo., you will receive, absolutely free, a valuable book—Prof. Wilson's "Treatise on the Eye and on Diseases in General," and you can rest assured that your eyesight and hearing will be restored, no matter how many doctors have failed.

BY M. M. MANGASARIAN.

This is a new "Catechism" in the full sense of the word. There has as yet appeared in the world of liberal literature nothing like this most wonderful little book or reason. E. P. Powell, the well-known author, the reviewer and critic, says: "The remarkable thing about this 'Catechism' is that it tells the truth." It deals with the questions of God, Immortality—the Creeds, the Clergy, the Church, Prayer and Salvation, Jesus and his Teaching, the Growth of the Christian Scriptures, and many other philosophical, scientific and ethical questions with the utmost candor, courage and clearness. 188 pages. Cloth 75c; paper, 50c

THE WOMAN'S BIBLE

PART I.--The Pentateuch.

THE WOMAN'S BIBLE.--PART II.

Judges, Kings, Prophets and Apostles. Comments on the Old and New Testaments, from Joshua to Revelation. The comments are keen, bright, spicy, full of wit, the work of radical thinkers who are not ignorant of the higher criticism. There is not a dull page in either of these books, but each is a galaxy of the bright minds of the day and throw a new light on the Bible teachings relating to woman. Price of each, paper, 50 cents.

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH,

Or the Future Life According to Science. By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French by S. R. Crockee. A very fascinating work. This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author says: "There is a true and respectable idea in Spiritualism," and regards as proved "the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of earth." Price, $1.50.

SAVAGE, AND CONSCIENCE

Is Conscience an Infallible, Reliable Mentor?

The popular and scholastic conception of conscience is that it is an infallible guide to conduct, an unfailing oracle of Divinity. As such it is not a function which can be developed, nor a faculty which can be educated. As well strive to educate the law of gravitation or fate. As an oracle it sanctions or authorizes only the good, and the good is not something comparative or relative, but what is divine in itself, which the soul can and does realize as the basis of its thought, feeling or action, the mode and operation of its conduct. Therefore, it does not depend upon evolution and is not the product of it. Neither is it the result of experience or education.

Strange as this may seem, the Spencerian philosopher or scientist, to which class Mr. M. J. Savage belongs, believes and teaches that while there is a moral standard, a sort of generally accepted criterion of conduct, conscience is fallible or unreliable. It is fallible and unreliable simply because it is not divine. Its authority to be sure is based upon the consensus of human opinion as to what is right or wrong, but it is co-ordinate with a knowledge of human rights; it is not admissible for a moment that it knows in itself what is eternally right or righteous. At best, according to the evolutionist, conscience is inductive and never deductive or causal.

Therefore, while Mr. Savage is agnostic of the divinity of conscience, and affirms that it is a function of our civilization, we teach that the spiritual interpretation of the word (con and scio to know with or together, hence to know synthetically) suggests that there is in conscience the voice which strikes the key note of all voices, that knowledge of right which experience but confirms but never creates or destroys and which sanctions at once the moral sentiment as the basis of moral action and morals and the consensus of opinion of mankind as to what is right or wrong.

Utilitarianism maintains that conscience is useful rather than regulative. It is both. Its utility lies in the fact that it forever affirms the general as well as the individual good, the universal as well as the personal end of existence, the right as well as a right, however time-honored or supported by might.

The synthetic value of the word is in the fact that its deductions follow and support the thesis of its origin, authority and divinity. This being so, its thesis which is God is emphasized in its synthesis of human knowledge and ignorance, and its antithesis of evil and error. Conscience reveals by the light of illumination the right from the wrong action, at the same time affirming the one to be right because it is unselfish or divine, the other wrong because selfish and personal.

What passes for conscience with the average scientist is not conscience at all as here set forth, but human judgment based upon experience, in short, the soul's selfishness and perversity. When man desires and works for a certain selfish object, good and pleasurable enough in itself, but harmful as touching the general good, as the accumulation of vast sums of money, landlordism, private ownership of land, he is very apt to undervalue conscience and even revelation, and speak glibly of its fallibility. And in the presence of awful crime, when it might appear that conscience is scared, the fact is that the man and not his conscience is at fault. His conscience, true to Divinity, illumined his soul, revealed to him the right from the wrong action, but he chose the wrong, because he was mad, insane, beside himself.

Make no mistake; God has given us an oracle in the soul. It is conscience, and it will mystically voice to us the eternal right. Until it is so realized society will follow a will o' the wisp and religion will become only a by-word.

J. C. F. GRUMBINE.

PHENOMENA—EXPLAIN.

W. F. Jamieson Rises to Explain, Etc.

Not wishing to interupt the deeply-interesting conversation which Brother Howe is holding with a lady, I remain silent, for the present, on the "Weakness of Witnesses." All my sympathy goes out to Brother Howe—the lady needs none! This is to pay him for meddling in my debate with Dr. Sweringen. "Ever the right comes uppermost and ever is justice done!"

While I am sitting on the fence watching Howe-Huntley, several correspondents are calling upon me to "explain the phenomena," and they are very pleasant about it, too—except one or two. I say to them in the language of Moses Hull's Bible: "Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all." I have a fondness for my own way—strange that I should be so singular.

Spiritualists speak and write of "phenomena" as their very "own," and use the word "explain" as if they have a patent right on it.

To these brethren, permit me to say I am a brother-in-law to Spiritualism. My first wife was a Spiritualist, and departed this life in the conviction that she was entering upon another state of existence. My present wife is a Spiritualist, a healing medium. I am doubly related. Some of the best women on earth are Spiritualists—I will not vouch for the men.

It has been said that I oppose Spiritualism with the same obstinacy as Balaam and his beast. Say what you please. It does you good and me no harm. I never did say, as do some illogical materialists, that "death ends all," for I do not know—hope it does not. This class of materialists are opposed to me because I concede too much to the Spiritualists. The Spiritualists are opposed to me because I adopt the Scotch verdict about their phenomena. I stand for my own convictions, one of which is that I do not think a departed human spirit ever communicated with anybody! I am willing, nay anxious, to be shown my error, if I am in error. We may as well bring this matter to an issue now: I would visit every celebrated medium in America were I wealthy. Unfortunately, five years ago wife fell on a Cincinnati pavement, spraining her right hip. Our savings melted away; hence, I am not financially able to obey my desire to investigate phenomena of a late date, pay mediums for their time, which is right, and all other expenses involved in making a tour of critical, scientific investigation. I challenge you Spiritualists, I say it in all kindness, to produce your best mediums who will, as friend Howe says, submit to "fraud-proof conditions," you to raise a fund for this purpose, the defrayal of all expenses of my tour. I will risk my time, or will depend upon my profession, public lecturing, for livelihood, and will make a fair report from week to week for The Progressive Thinker of the things seen and heard.

I say to you frankly, I am hard to convince; but should I obtain evidence satisfactory to my own mind, and that it must be, proof beyond the shadow of a doubt, that the spirit of a departed human being actually communicates, I will publicly acknowledge it. I hope you can trust me as a man of honor, as I will trust you to produce your best mediums and give me every possible chance to test their claims.

To the genial letter of Mr. Charles E. Hubbard, who hopes I will "come over and join us, and debate from the right side of the question, I will say: Whenever I get one demonstrated fact that a discarnate spirit ever did communicate I will be with you; but, as one of your own Spiritualists has well expressed it, I cannot take "every shadow for a ghost." Spiritualism, I freely admit is a fascinating system; there is nothing to compare with it. But I do not agree with Moses Hull, when he said in our debates, "If Spiritualism is a delusion it is a charming delusion, and I hope never to live long enough to find it out."

On the contrary, I say, Let me have the truth, though it slay me, instead of the most delightful delusion ever concocted. Hull says "the angels don't want me!" Doubtless my perversity unfits me for their society.

If you have the facts, and your explanations, which you have been giving to the world for a half-century, really do explain, I would be glad to receive your light; for I agree with you, and Job, that it is an important and interesting question, "If a man die, shall he live AGAIN?" (Put the emphasis there.) That makes Job's inquiry ironical. You cut the gordian knot, you tell me, by proving that he does not die and does not have to live again—lives right on, no interruption. If this is the case, then he was never born, never began to be, always was and always will be, worlds without end.

I know materialists who say they care nothing whatever for this subject. I do. If I can fathom this great theme of modern Spiritism before I "pass out" I will do so. The trouble is that the "evidence" is illusive: it is concealed under a mass of rubbish—so say leading Spiritualists. W. F. JAMIESON.

Letter From Mattie E. Hayden.

To the Editor:—With this year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker I have received the premium book, Seers of the Ages, by that prince of authors, J. M. Peebles. I have read it carefully, and pronounce it the most wonderful book of the age, containing the grandest and most beautiful gems of thought, expressed in the choicest of language. How I wish that a million copies of it could be placed in the hands of as many Christian readers, for after devouring its contents, I know they would certainly entertain a more exalted opinion of Spiritualism, and care less for the dry husks of orthodoxy, on which they have so long been fed. May the author live to round out his full century, and yet give to starving humanity more of this quality of puro spiritual literature, and may you and The Progressive Thinker live and continue to disseminate it.

The postman has just thrown in this week's issue of The Progressive Thinker, which I find upon opening to be full twelve pages. For goodness sake, Bro. Francis, don't enlarge the paper permanently, for it has always been so brim full of interesting matter that I neglected my household duties in order to take time to read it when it was only an eight-page paper, and now if it should be enlarged to a regular twelve-page paper I know I never would get anything done, so please drop it back to eight pages again, for it is a regular bonanza investment for a dollar at that size. Through its columns I wish to send New Year's greetings to each and all of the army of noble workers in the cause that ever tends to uplift and sustain all humanity. May this year be thus far to each of them their banner year in the cause to which they have devoted and consecrated their lives, and may each future year become to them brighter and brighter into the perfect day, when all shall know and acknowledge the ministration of our departed loved ones and their ability to guard and guide us to a sweet haven of rest and peace.

While we are not in public work at the present time our hearts are still in the cause, and when the guides direct we will again go forth among the reapers. I am doing considerable private work at home.

My husband, Ben F., joins in wishing you and yours and the dear old Progressive Thinker a happy and prosperous New Year. MATTIE E. HAYDEN.

What the Spiritualists of Cleveland Are Doing.

There are four live, wide-awake, up-to-date Spiritualist societies in Cleveland; two lyceums or Sunday-schools, and two Ladies' societies; all small, and poor in purse, but rich in knowledge and love, and flourishing in goodness.

The old Progressive Thought Society, the oldest now in existence in Cleveland, meets at 3 p. m., every Sunday, in Rhodes Hall, corner Franklin avenue and Pearl street, with Mr. Bellis as its president. In connection with the society there is a children's lyceum, which meets at 1 p. m. every Sunday.

The First German Spiritual Society has quite a large membership. With their new president, Mr. Carl Sollinger, in the chair, Brother C. F. Hunger declining to serve another year—wanted rest. They are doing a good work both among the German and English-speaking people. They meet every Sunday evening in Rock's Hall, corner Wilson and Woodland avenues.

The First Spiritual Church of Cleveland is a new organization, the outcome of the First Spiritual Sunday-school of the East End, corner Dunham and Wade Park avenues, Wilson Hall. The Sunday-school meets every Sunday at 10 a. m., Mr. Wells, as conductor; Miss Florence Barber as guardian—two very efficient workers, two people in the right place. The church society meets every Sunday at 7:30 p .m., with Mr. King as president, and a corps of genial earnest assistants whose influence for the betterment of humanity is far-reaching.

And last, but not least, the East End Spiritual Society, 1749 Superior street, meets every Sunday evening, with C. H. Figuers as its leader.

Then we have the "Good Old Samaritan Society," which dates its birth back nearly forty years, caring for the sick and needy in its quiet, unassuming way. And the Mattie Hull Society, named after that noble, earnest co-partner of the world-wide famous worker with tongue and pen, Moses Hull, doing all they can for the intellectual and financial benefit of society.

But before closing I must tell you of the efficient work of our Ohio State President, Mrs. Carrie Firth Curran. She has established circuits of missionary workers leading them herself and supplying the different small societies in the state with speakers and mediums at a very small remuneration and their expenses. Mrs. Curran spoke in Cleveland some weeks ago and twice again last Sunday.

We have had Mrs. Elizabeth Schauss twice this winter. She always draws a full house.

Mrs. Annie E. Baird, of Elyria, Mr. F. W. Martin, with others, help to keep our societies "in tune with the Infinite," as well as Sandusky, Findlay, Elyria, Ashtabula and other towns. Mrs. Curran and her co-workers are a host in themselves. Give us more such and the cause of Spiritualism will grow and its influence will be dominant in the religious world of progress and science.

MRS. MARY FRINK POPE.

An Easy Way to Make Money!

I have made $500.00 in 30 days selling Dish-washers. I did my housework at the same time. I don't canvass. People come or send for the Dish-washers. I handle the Mound City Dish-washer. It is the best on the market. It is lovely to sell. It washes and dries the dishes perfectly in two minutes. Every lady who sees it wants one. I will devote all my future time to the business and expect to clear $4,000.00 this year. Any intelligent person can do as well as I have done. Write for particulars to the Mound City Dish-Washer Co., St Louis, Mo.!

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Some one sends us an article from Butte, Mont., on "How to Build Character," but fails to sign his name. Please write us.

Catharine McFarlin writes: "Kindly permit me to announce to the Spiritualists that the material duties which interrupted my private work for the past few months are completed, and I am now free to accept calls for platform and parlor work, both week-day evenings and Sundays, upon reasonterms. I would also like correspondence in regard to camp work for the coming season. All mail will reach me at Plainview, Minn."

H. F. Schrader writes from Newport, Ky.: "Mr. Oscar A. Edgerly will close a very successful engagement of two months, the last Sunday in January, with the First Temple Society of Spiritualists, Newport, Ky. As an inspirational speaker Bro. Edgerly is grand, and he is liked so well by our society that we hope to have him with us again in the near future for a long engagement."

Mrs. M. A. Merrell writes from Ohio: "The Progressive Thinker comes to our home like a gleam of sunshine through misty aura, welcomed by all. May your happiness increase with each returning day, and may the sunrise of spiritual splendor bring to you a divine glory is my sincere prayer."

Anderson, Ind.—Secretary Wertz of the local association of Spiritualists received notice from Mr. Barrett, the National President of the Association at Washington, that the invitation extended to the national officers to come to Anderson during the latter part of February, to assist in the forming of a state organization had been accepted.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

Martin Sokep, an eccentric harnessmaker, 73 years old, residing at Bunker Hill, Ill., was found dead in his shop last evening. He had a premonition of death. Yesterday afternoon he shook hands with two of his workmen, as they were leaving the shop, telling them good-by, and saying while he held each of their hands in his: "I am half dead now, all that is left of me will soon be dead. The only difference between me and a dead man is that I can walk and he cannot." His family became uneasy as to his whereabouts late in the evening and started a hunt for him. After looking for some time they went into the shop and there on the work bench he lay dead. His workmen had left him but a few hours before. For some years he had been affected with heart disease. He leaves a grown family. Deceased was well to do.—St. Louis Republic.

W. H. Harrell writes: "I have been doing a little missionary work for our great 'educator,' The Progressive Thinker. Go on; great will be your reward."

Mrs. Nellie Van Dyke writes from Clyde, Ohio: "Allen W. Kaiser, trumpet medium of Toledo, Ohio, has been doing good work for more than a year, holding circles in Clyde, Ohio, where a trumpet circle has never before been held. He is a faithful servant to the angel bands, and we feel assured the cause of Spiritualism will be revived in our locality. It has been for long years neglected. We recommend Mr. Kaiser to all societies wanting the services of a strong, conscientious medium."

Mrs. Nora Batchelor writes: "In my article of recent date this phrase occurs: 'When such ideas prevail.' It is printed, 'when such idiotic ideas prevail.' The word idiotic I did not use. Again, following this expression, 'Evil spirits have no power to harm the good and pure? It is not true,' is this sentence: 'It is the most damnable falsehood that ever afflicted Spiritualism.' This latter sentence I never wrote." This brilliant writer is lucky in having only two slight errors occur in her long article. The mistake was made by some officious reader of the manuscript interlining a few words to add emphasis to the thoughts expressed (as he saw them) with no intention of having the same put in type. This fact was overlooked by the editor.

C. W. Babcock writes from Oxford, Wis.: "Will J. Erwood was at our place and gave the people two fine lectures. He is a fine talker and a fine man, and should be kept in the Spiritualist harness."

T. M. Snyder writes from Warsaw, Ind.: "We have had that good medium, C. J. Barnes, come to our very orthodox town to give us a few trumpet seances. We invited in a few and have stirred up quite a commotion. One thing, we have set them talking and thinking, which we hope will result in good to them if not to our cause. We hope to have him with us again in the near future."

From Sandusky, Ohio, Irving Jackson writes: "The knowledge of Spiritualism in our city is spreading rapidly through the efforts of the Psychic Research Society, in co-operation with the Ohio State Association. This is one of the places selected for a trial of the missionary movement, and we feel highly elated over its success. Mrs. Carrie Firth Curran, president of the State Association; Mrs. Elizabeth Schauss, of Toledo; Mrs. Anna E. Baird, of Elyria, and Mr. Lee M. Jenney, of Oberlin, have ably presented our cause to interested and appreciative audiences, and proved themselves devoted workers in the missionary field. Our society is now just a year old, and at its last meeting all the officers were unanimously re-elected for the coming year. Have been holding our meetings in Good Templar Hall, but have now secured the second floor of a building conveniently located, and will proceed to remodel the same to adapt it to our needs. We will then have a home of our own, where we can hold meetings at any time, and should be pleased to hear from any speakers or mediums who may be in this vicinity."

Captain Geo. W. Walrond, the veteran Spiritualistic lecturer and platform test medium, has, after several weeks of very severe illness and an almost fatal nervous attack, resumed his meetings every Sunday and Wednesday evening at his permanent offices and hall, 1512 Glenarm street, Denver, Colo., to which address all business and professional communications should be mailed. Mr. Walrond writes that the Spiritualistic cause is holding its own in the Rocky Mountains; that his meetings are well attended and much appreciated. The Denver people are looking forward pleasurably for Mr. Leadbeater and his course of psychic lectures.

Rev. Dr. Morgan Wood, pastor of Plymouth church, Cleveland, Ohio, told his congregation that as a result of an inquiry he had made it cost each of eleven prominent churches in that city something over $200 for each convert during the year. His point was to emphasize the great cost and disproportionate result, and he said that in no other calling would such unproductive work be carried on. Dr. Wood made a further statement as to the probable cause of the seeming deadness of church conversions. He said: "I think the old system of religious thought and ministers are passing away, are decaying. I do not consider the few conversions a matter to be pessimistic about; rather it seems to me an indication that what we are preaching does not supply the heart demands of the people. Many of us, I believe, would become prophets of the higher thought were it not for fear of losing our positions as self-leaders of men. But the time is near, I believe, when, if the voice if the Christian minister is to be heard, he must take his stand for those things which he has been trying to make those of the world believe true."

Dr. Beverly writes: "At Lakeside Hall, Mrs. Murtha contiues to draw crowds, and will continue for the balance of the month. Her tests are recognized and driven home to the skeptics so they have no room for doubt. Friday evening, Jan. 29, the society has made arrangements for another grand party to end with a dance. Refreshments will be served in the dining-hall. The leap-year girls will gladly pay the bills, all for 25 cents. Dr. G. B. Warne will speak for us the first Sunday in February. Give our loyal president a rousing ovation."

The Board of Directors of the Progressive Spiritualist Society of San Francisco, Cal., unanimously extend a vote of thanks to Madam Florence Montague for her kindness in delivering the address of our special Christmas evening celebration. The lecture was very beautiful and of the highest order, a source of great pleasure and instructive and a gratifying success. We feel grateful to Madam Florence Montague for her unselfish endeavors to please the people, which efforts have been greatly appreciated by all present. T. T. Leibich, president; John Koch, secretary.

H. Voorhees writes from Traverse City, Mich.: "You said some time ago that eternal hell was not preached any more. I made a canvass of this city's churches. The result is, they all preach it, only a single exception. The fear for hell is the only motive that the church relies upon. That is the trouble with Spiritualism. People have no motive only their personal interests at stake."

Elsa Hornbeck writes: "I have been protected by wise inspirers from committing 'The Psychological Crime,' and am one whose mediumship is a crown of glory and has been the means of strengthening individuality, and I know that mediumship SHOULD NOT BE MADE A COMMERCIAL COMMODITY."

Mrs. Nora E. Hill writes: "I wish the readers of your paper to know that the law of Illinois recognizes and upholds the validity of the Illinois State Spiritualist Association's ordination papers; at least it was so given in the circuit court of Cook county, on Jan. 14, 1904, before Judge Gibbons. R. Gilray was attorney in the case of Mrs. M. L. Schaffer vs. M. L. Schaffer; Mrs. Schaffer was granted a divorce under the laws of Illinois; this being something that has caused much comment, as to the I. S. S. A. having a right to issue its ministerial ordination papers to perform marriages. I am thankful that one more stain has been wiped out and lift our beautiful truth to stand untarnished by what would seem a most cruel wrong. I am happy to say that I am proud of the Illinois State Spiritualist Association and prouder still that the ordination paper I hold from the same is genuine, and I think our good brother, Geo. B. Warne, president, will tower a few inches higher in thought, if not in stature. Once more the flag of freedom waves o'er our beautiful cause, Spiritualism."

London, Eng.—Radium is puzzling and disturbing the Spiritualists. Professor Ramsay, the high priest of radium, declares he gets amazing letters daily hinting that radium is the active agent of the supernatural. "I receive letters daily," he says, "warning me to leave radium alone, assuring me that such a potent force of nature must not be tampered with. They seem to come from Spiritualists. Why I do not know." Many London Spiritualists and occultists believe radium to be one of the mysterious components of other worlds and are anxious to learn how ordinary mortals are going to deal with it. Professor Ramsay, asked if he believed radium over would have a commercial value, said: "I don't believe radium ever will be commercially used. Medically it will be."

Religious mania caused a man by the name of Bolks, living in Los Angeles, Cal., to murder his wife and children.

C. W. Stewart and the Folsoms are doing splendid work in St. Louis. Mrs. Folsom has developed a most remarkable phase, in being able to get written messages in electric light before an audience, that are recognized by the parties addressed; one gentleman getting a portrait of his wife along with the message from her.

An infant and two adults were christened at the meeting of the Spiritualist congregation, at Speed's Temple 622 East Jefferson street, Louisville, Ky. The christening in the Spiritualist church differs from the orthodox christening in that flowers are handed to the one that is christened instead of resorting to sprinkling of water or immersion. The sponsor of the infant or adult that is christened is admonished to cultivate the spiritual nature and subdue the passions. At the meeting last night Mrs. Matilda Gruenwald, of Bank street, delivered an address. This congregation has been holding meetings each alternate Sunday night at the home of V. Speed. An effort is now being made to raise funds to buy a lot and erect a church. There are perhaps half a dozen Spiritualist congregations in the city, but they are of perhaps as many different denominations.—Louisville Herald.

Charles Crane writes from Salt Lake City, Utah: "Mrs. Florence Huntley is certainly a very marvelous writer, and I believe the Master is behind her; I believe so for this reason, that in the 'Harmonics of Evolution,' I note sentences that could not have been penned unless learned in Masonic law, expressions that only a Mason could know and use. We have in this city one of the most marvelous mediums living. A married woman, wife of a conductor, but not a public medium. Mr. Aber is not in it. I have never met a medium in the same class, in any of the various phases, with which she is gifted. And she has them all. Some time I may write you more fully about her, but as she is the wife of a friend, I do not care to give her name at present."

"Professional hypnotists do harm," declared Professor George A. Coe of Northwestern University, while giving a demonstration to a psychology class. "In the attempt to create a sensation they produce dramatic effects that are often injurious to the nervous systems of their subjects. Moreover, they cause superstitious rumors concerning their power, which is no particular gift, to be circulated among the people." Alfred E. Harris was the first person who submitted himself to the professor's control and in a few seconds was in a hypnotic state. Upon being commanded to write his name, Harris wrote "Alfred E. Allen." Professor Coe explained that two days ago he had hypnotized Harris and told him that when he should be in a hypnotic state on Monday his name would be Allen. Before awaking Harris Professor Coe took time to disillusion him, to impress upon his mind that his real name is Harris and that he would suffer no bad effects from the hypnosis. J. A. Kappleman also submitted himself to the hypnotic suggestions, but he did not go into a complete state of hypnosis.

Mrs. C. H. Mullins writes: "I have just returned from Owosso, Mich. I went there, as some of my friends know, under a cloud, as it were. The cloud has been lifted, and I am glad to be home again. When I first went there, and at the time when the shadows looked blackest, Mr. and Mrs. Cherry, people whom I had never met before, came to me, offering their sympathy and support materially, if I needed it. They indeed showed the spirit of true Spiritualists. They are earnest workers in the cause of truth, and too much cannot be said in their praise."

Mrs. A. E. Sheets writes from Nichols Hospital, Battle Creek, Mich.: "I wish to thank the many friends who have cheered me by their letters since my illness here. My condition is somewhat better than when I entered the institution in September. I shall remain through the winter, and hope to secure permanent help in time. Grand Ledge Camp Association has met with a sad loss in the death of one of its trustees, Geo. Campbell. He was a valuable advisor in the business affairs of the camp and a warm personal friend of the writer and her family. He held many positions of public trust and was the city's mayor at one time. As a business man, a citizen, friend and neighbor, he was respected and beloved by all. He had been prominently identified with several fraternal orders, chief among them the Masons, under whose auspices the funeral services were conducted. Representatives from Lansing and other lodges in the state were present."

Aurin F. Hill writes from Boston, Mass.: "Sunday, Feb. 14, from 2 to 5 p. m., in the People's Forum, Morgan Memorial, Boston, Mass., is set apart for discussion of the subject, 'Is Spiritualism True.' The president of the N. S. A. has agreed to be the opening speaker, if it is possible for him to attend. If he fails to do so, J. J. Morse, editor of the Banner of Light, has agreed to be our leader. The People's Forum has an ordained Methodist clergyman for its president, and it is held in a Unitarian building. Spiritism is on deck here. 'Q. A. D., Boston, Mass., page 12 of The Progressive Thinker, Jan. 16, sends out a narrow opinion of Spiritualism, Spiritism and its teachers at present in Boston and Massachusetts. Never in the history of modern times has Spiritism been known to the people so thoroughly as at present. Powerful writers are at work. The pens and printing presses are used instead of the voices. Many parties meet in their homes, or in home parties, and learn what has been, is the same in manifestation now."

Mourned as dead for three hours, Ulysses S. Roberts, a musician of Harrisburg, Ill., suddenly came to life again to tell of his vision of heaven and to prophesy his death seven days later. This prophecy came true. Rev. A. S. Maxey, who had been called to comfort the family, was a witness to Roberts' revival, and questioned him at length about heaven. Roberts told of meeting with his father and friends who died years ago. E. S. Marsh, a well-known attorney, was also present at the time of Roberts' revelation.

G. H. Brooks is open for engagements during March and April. Mr. Brooks is an able advocate of our cause and should be kept constantly employed. Address him at 114 President street, Wheaton, Ill.

Chicago Spiritualists are making ready for another good time in the way of the fourth annual Grand Prize Masquerade Ball and Psychic Entertainment, to be held at St. George Hall, No. 3337 State street, Saturday evening, Feb. 6. This hall is extra large and on the ground floor, and absolutely safe. Thirty prizes will be given. For prize list and programme, address W. J. Elmo, 40 East Thirty-first street.

Samuel Ramsey has been elected president of the Spiritualist Society at Wabash, Ind. The medium, Mr. Davis, lectured for the society, and everything looks encouraging.

The death of Jacob Harlan, 50 years old, a well known resident of Union City, Ind., and brother of the Rev. E. A. Harlan, of Portland, is attributed to a dream. Harlan retired in perfect health, but awoke shaking as with the ague. He told his wife that he had just dreamed that he was in a runaway, and that his father had tried to stop the team but was run over. As he told the story his terror seemed to grow, and his wife tried to soothe him. While she was still speaking her husband gave a gasp or two and in a few minutes expired. Medical examination showed that the immediate cause of death was heart failure.

Thos S. Kizer writes from Decatur, Ill.: "You will see by the clipping herewith enclosed that our mutual friends, H. Pettibone and wife, have gone to Boston. He finally thought he was not receiving any lasting benefit from the treatment with Dr. Ball. His guide, Will Rollins, tells him he will be all right inside of a year. By invitation wife and I took dinner with them at Mr. J. W. Haworth's Sunday before they left. Although he has little use of his lower limbs he is quite cheerful most of the time. Wife and I had to part with all that was mortal of our last daughter only a few days since. She had a complication of diseases, but we know she is better off, and will still be near us in spirit. She leaves a son and daughter aged respectively 12 and 17, which we will have the care of, their father, J. S. Wayne, passing to the higher life in 1898. Mrs. Alice Sheridan of Joplin, Mo., assisted by Mrs. Garrow of this city, conducted the funeral services."

M. Jaqur writes from Berkley, Cal.: "I went to Edward Earle, 1052 Ellis street, San Francisco, and from two slates full of writing, under the strictest test conditions, with the names signed in full and in the writing of those to whom the names belonged, my doubts were set at rest forever! At his seances I have seen him write messages on the blackboard in five languages, and each was recognized, translated by some one in the room. A slate that had been hanging in full view all the evening with 'Seance Sunday,' written in heavy chalk, was taken down and a clean slate was placed over it and the two fastened together with a rubber band, the medium standing under the electric light held them out nearly at arm's length for about ten minutes while he talked, and then removed the band. The clean slate was covered with a letter to a lady from her uncle in spirit life, signed in full, with the picture of some spirit land flowers drawn in three colors. On the other slate over the heavy chalk marks were seven messages in seven different colored pencil writing, all of which were signed in full and recognized by some one in the room. Your paper is a great source of enjoyment to our family and I could not get along without it. As soon as I finish one number I feel like saying with Oliver Twist, 'More!'"

Geo. Hamilton Brooks writes: "Dr. Agnes Chester See, of Chicago, will lecture for the Englewood Spiritual Union, at Hopkins' Hall, 528 West 63d street, Sunday evening, Jan. 31. Her subject will be 'Deliverance.' Dr. See is a disciple of the New Thought school, her address at the recent convention was listened to with marked attention. Thinkers and investigators should not miss hearing an interesting speaker."

E. E. de Yongh writes from Portland, Oregon: "The First Spiritualist Society of Portland, Oregon, held its annual meeting for the election of officers for the ensuing year, the first Sunday in January. Mr. C. H. Goodwin was elected president; Mr. W. H. Boebinker, vice-president; Mr. E. E. de Yongh, secretary; Mrs. C. N. Goodwin, treasurer; Mr. Ed Kling, second vice-president; Mr. C. C. Affolter, third vice-president; Mrs. Louisa Bentikofer, financial secretary; Miss Jennie Werner, corresponding secretary. That Spiritualism is advancing in Portland, is shown by the fact that all Spiritualist meetings are being well attended by interested and enthusiastic addiences. The past year was the most successful year in every way in the history of the First Society. Noted speakers from abroad and belonging to the city of Portland have occupied its rostrum, and crowded houses have been the rule, even during the summer months, when attendance is usually light. The present year opens most encouragingly."

S. L. Lee writes from Washington, D. C.: "An explanation from you as to the light in which Kellar, the magician, is viewed by Spiritualists would be interesting. Undoubtedly he is a medium—so it appears to me—but understanding that mediumship is the way of the cross, and wanting dollars and popularity he holds Spiritualism up to contempt and ridicule every moment. He says: 'This is how bogus mediums do; I know nothing about real ones,' and then proceeds to show genuine mediumistic phenomena. Is not this a baser variety of fraud than even bogus mediumship? His case resembles Mme. Blavatsky's—only his motive is different. She in order to pose as the author of a distinctive philosophy, decried mediumship together with all else that might be recognized and placed under the head of Spiritualism, to which she owed whatever she has given to the world. That she was controlled, and by no means always by a high order of spirits, is plainly shown in old diary leaves. Evidently she is Kellar's antitype. He began the public seance (as I would call it) that I yesterday attended, by the jest that the white handkerchief he held in his hand had been the property of Koot-Hoomi. He seems to take the utmost delight in the success of his jests upon Spiritualism." All of Kellar's "spirit manifestations" are simply the result of trickery or sleight-of-hand. The great fault with credulous Spiritualists, is all "manifestations" that seem mysterious they foolishly ascribe to spirit power. Kellar is not a medium.

Ortha A. Clark writes from Spokane, Wash.: "Flora Heckman, of Tacoma, spoke for the First Spiritualist Society of Spokane, before a large audience, after which our sister, Mrs. M. S. Corselius Tomley of DesMoines, Iowa, and Mrs. M. E. Connell, of Grand Rapids, Mich., were ordained ministers of the Gospel of Spiritualism. It was a very impressive ceremony and the recipients of the certificates are worthy of their promotion to the ranks of ordained speakers, and we can truly say that their feet are shod with the gospel of peace. Mrs. Emerson, formerly of the Bible Spiritualist Church of San Francisco, but now of Spokane, assisted in the ordination of our two sisters."

A Spiritualist writes from Maumee, Ohio: "Should I attend orthodox services, I would expect to hear set phrases and absurdities, but desiring that our lecturers (Spiritualistic) should afford no cause for ridicule, I request Moses Hull, as teacher in the Morris Pratt Institute, to instruct future lecturers regarding the pronunciation of the word 'realms'—not 'rel-lums,' as a word of two syllables—generally accompanied by a colicky glance upward, quite orthodox in expression. A correction as to the use of the pronoun I is in order, when several of our best lecturers and mediums use it in the objective case, e. g., 'for you and for I.' Recently one dear good woman told her hearers that 'we will disperse with the usual singing.' The 'spirit side of life' is another set phrase to offset 'Abraham's bosom,' and though more agreeable to contemplate in thought, has grown tiresome."

The Chicago Tribune says: "Would that every man, woman and child in this city could have heard or could read the words of Dr. Gunsaulus spoken yesterday in the auditorium. Would that all would ponder them and resolve, as this pastor has done, hereafter to do their full duty as citizens. 'Our pulpits —mine with the rest—have had too much to say about the New Jerusalem and not enough concerning the vital needs of Chicago,' said Dr. Gunsaulus. 'I have neglected my duty. Like the rest of you, I have been heedless. I have let things run on as they were without calling the attention of the nearest magistrate to broken laws.' In these sentences, wrung from a sorely afflicted heart, Dr. Gunsaulus struck the keynote not only of responsibility for existing conditions, but of the manner in which these conditions must be corrected. Each citizen must do his duty. He must feel that he is his brother's keeper. Where he sees a violation of law he must take steps to punish the offender and to uphold the integrity of law. Truly Dr. Gunsaulus says 'we are all to blame.' We may put the mayor, the aldermen, the building department, the theater managers and all the stage hands in prison, but 'without a permanent change in public sentiment' this would accomplish nothing. 'Don't blame the mayor and aldermen. Blame those that elect them.' In short, let us have a thoroughly practical Christianity, in which not only the pastors but the people do their full duty as citizens and accept without attempt at evasion all the responsibility which this duty implies."

Dr. H. E. Ballard, president, writes: "McCutcheon's Bird Center parties fall way behind the off-hand socials given by the Ladies' Auxiliary Club, according to the one given last Saturday night, at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Aitken. It would have gladdened the heart of an infidel to have looked in upon the sixty-eight happy animated forms gathered within those commodious parlors, all in accord with the one aim, progression. Great credit is due Mrs. Carey, its president, and her daughter, Mrs. Aitken, for the success these socials have attained. Their work being actuated by one motive only, makes them all the more enjoyable, that of developing the undeveloped truth through the laws laid down by Dame Nature, the dispensation of spiritual food in the form of messages, improvisations, crystal gazing, palmistry, vocal and instrumental music, and the augmentation of material angel food and its concomitants from their well filled pantry. The solo given by Bro. VanVlue is deserving of special mention, as was also the beautiful thoughts that dropped so easily from the lips of our inspired pastor. Considering the suggestions made us after our services Sunday night, we have decided to give an excellent program service on the night of the first, Sunday of every month, consisting of music, addresses, recitations, tests, etc. The children's progressive lyceum meets every Sunday at 2; conference at 3:30; evening service at 8; Hon. R. Gilray, pastor; Mrs. Grace Aitken, psychic. The dedicatory services for the Universal Occult Church new quarters, Hall C, 77 E. Thirty-first street, Sunday night, the 17th inst., was filled with a coterie of believers and investigators that would have done honor to any occasion. The accessibility of the hall makes it desirable for our purpose, and we shall in all probability retain it until we get ready to build."

W. H. Mitchell writes from St. Joseph, Mo.: "We spiritually inclined people of this city think we are very fortunate to have with us a trumpet medium second to none. I refer to Mrs. Hattie Tiffany, who came here from Alliance, Ohio, the first of last September. She is doing a wonderful amount of good in the cause. With her the results are always good. From the time her control opens the circles until she returns to close them, there seems to be no waning of the medium's power. In Mrs. Hattie Tiffany St. Joseph possesses a medium and healer of whom we feel justly proud, and we feel as though we would like to let the whole world know it."

La Porte, Ind.—Evidence of an unusual character was heard by the circuit court jury to-day in the trial of a will contest when Mrs. Offley Leeds, widow of a wealthy Michigan City man, produced two slates, an alleged message from her dead husband, and testified that she had constantly been guided by him in all business matters since his death. Mrs. Rhoda Benham, whose will is being attacked on the ground that she lacked testamentary capacity, was similarly guided by her husband, and, like Mrs. Leeds, whose intimate friend she was, met with remarkable business success. Several Spiritualists testified, one declaring that Mrs. Benham since her death had been lamenting the difficulty over her will and regretting that she did not make her dispositions in life instead of by will. Mrs. Leeds exhibited two slates bearing a picture of her husband drawn in several colors and a message written in three colors, all of which she said was executed in her presence in seven minutes under circumstances rendering imposition impossible. Later.—In the Benham case, which has been on trial at LaPorte, Ind., for ten days, the jury, after an all-night session, returned a verdict sustaining the will. The case has been remarkable because it was shown that Mrs. Benham, the testatrix, successfully managed a large estate left by her husband through guidance received from his spirit messages.

H. F. Coates, president, writes: "Spiritualism, What Does It Mean? If you are interested in the above subject come to Kenwood Hall, 4308 Cottage Grove avenue, any Sunday, summer or winter, at 3 or 8 p. m., and listen to the philosophy of a future life and the demonstration of spirit return. Our services consist of lecture, messages and good music. Our meetings have not just started, but have been conducted in the above hall, both afternoon and evening, for the past six years. Our church is known as the Church of the Spirit Communion. A collection of 10 cents will be taken at the door to help defray expenses. You will be welcome. A change of speakers each week."

WILL C. HODGE, our esteemed brother, writes from his Paradise—San Diego, Cal..; "With the glorious sunshine, ripening fruits and ever blooming flowers of this favored land, it is hard to realize that the eastern country is in the grip of an unusually cold winter. As yet we have little need of fires, though enough rain has fallen to remind us that there may be more in store, and for this we are all devoutly wishing, while some are praying. Spiritually considered, San Diego has nothing to complain of, as our meetings are well sustained both in quality and numbers. Dr. J. M. Peebles has, in a measure, recovered his health, and is now holding forth at the Temple to large and appreciative audiences. The twelve-page number of The Progressive Thinker was a 'hummer,' and contained for the up-to-date Spiritualist much food for thought, and to my mind was worth more than many of the leading magazines costing from ten to twenty-five cents. It seems that the controversy provoked by The Great Psychological Crime will not down, but continues to interest the people, while the great diversity of opinion concerning the topic gives evidence of the fact that Spiritualists do their own thinking and come to their own conclusions regardless of the opinions of the other fellow. The poem of Dr. T. Wilkins', on 'Ingersoll in Heaven' is, in my way of thinking, the best thing along these lines that has yet been written, and he should be elected poet laureate of the new dispensation."

A very pretty wedding ceremony was performed by Rev. Josie K. Folsom, at No. 2834 Olive street, St. Louis Mo., on Tuesday, Jan. 19, uniting in marriage Miss Vella Grissinger and Mr. Gus Schneider. Miss Grissinger's relatives are members of the Olive street Spiritualist congregation, and Mrs. Folsom was their choice to officiate at the wedding. The young couple start out under very favorable auspices, and their friends wish them bon voyage. A lady minister officiating at a wedding was such a novelty that the St. Louis Republic sent a special reporter to interview Mrs. Folsom, and gave it a write up, accompanied with Mrs. Folsom's picture, on the first column of the first page.

H. F. Coates writes: "I would like to correspond with speakers and mediums to fill engagements for the Church of the Spirit Communion. Address all communications to 233 East 32nd street, Chicago, Ill.

Mrs. G. Partridge has taken rooms at 43 Ashland Boulevard, fronting Union Park, where her friends and patrons will find her in nice quarters.

The Spiritual Union holds services every Sunday evening, 7:30, at Perl's Hall, 1546 Milwaukee avenue. For the present Dr. J. H. Randall has been engaged as lecturer. Mrs. Hansen will give readings.

Mrs. Effie Moss is still holding materializing circles at No. 3233 Wabash avenue, and will remain there for several weeks.

Dr. J. H. Randall will make engagements to lecture wherever his services may be required. Societies desiring him for dates in the future, address him at No. 1142 Washington Boulevard, Chicago, Ill.

Dr. Freedman, the Australian Healer, is still located at No. 513 West Adams street. The Doctor has been performing some remarkable cures.

C. W. Stewart, the eloquent advocate of our cause, writes from St. Louis, Mo.: "Our success here is becoming phenomenal, and everything doing finely."

The subject for Mrs. C. L. V. Richmond's discourse next Sunday, Jan. 31, will be "Souls in Other Worlds Besides the Earth." Masonic Temple, Room 309, 11 o'clock sharp.

The Band of Harmony euchre party will take place the fifth Thursday of the month, Jan. 28, at the residence of Mrs. Ellis, 289 Fremont street, near Belden avenue. Take Halsted street car, get off at Belden avenue. Afternoon, commence playing at 2 o'clock sharp, and at eight o'clock in the evening. Ladies bring their lunches. Come and bring your friends. We will be sure to have a jolly time. Score cards, twenty-five cents. Eight prizes.

C. W. Slayton, of Hart, Mich., wants the address of Mrs. Augusta Ferris, formerly of Flint, Mich.; last winter and spring of Los Angeles, Cal.

Rena Chapman writes: "When sending you the programme of our mid-winter meeting, I said it would be held in the lecture-room of Spiritualist's Society. It has since been arranged to hold the meeting in the Unitarian Church, Washington street, Jackson, Mich. Programs will be sent upon request."

Harry J. Moore has the last two Sundays of February and the month of March open for engagements with societies. Address Mr. Moore at 323 Garfield avenue, Battle Creek, Mich.

Mrs. M. B. Grunwald, president of the Ladies' Aid, and lecturer for the Speed Memorial Temple, writes, giving her opinion of Spiritualism in Louisville, Ky., and asserting that Mr. Arrowsmith does a great injustice in claiming its decline there. She admits that the status of the cause there is not what it ought to be, and that no lecturer besides home talent has appeared there for a year or two. The Spiritualists there, however, are cultivating home talent, and hope to develop speakers and mediums of note, and she speaks encouragingly in that direction, and anticipates good results. Two hundred and fifty dollars have been raised towards buying a lot, and from her standpoint everything looks bright in Louisville. Thus it is that different individuals see things in a different light, and thus it has ever been, and ever will be. We are glad to know that Mrs. Grunwald is taking an active part in promoting Spiritualism in Louisville, and she may be able to cause Mr. Arrowsmith to change his mind in reference to the cause there.

E. Wyman writes as to how he became a Spiritualist, desiring positive proof. A spirit came and controlled the medium with whom he was sitting and said: "I perceive you want evidence, and of a nature that cannot possibly admit of doubt; knowing you want positive proof, I have come to give it." She then said in substance, that she passed away at such an age, and at such a date and place. The spirit gave the name and address of her father to whom Mr. Wyman wrote, and in due time received verification of all that had been said.

Aug. Recht writes from Brooklyn, N. Y.: "You published my report in the issue of Dec. 26, about Mr. Rasmussen conducting a materializing seance at his home, Dec. 12, the medium being Mr. Thompson of Kingston, N. Y. Mr. Rasmussen conducted another by the same medium at his home on Dec. 21, and exposed him as a trickster. Mr. Rassmussen is the president of the Society of Spiritual Truth, and a public test medium who works for our society and other meetings without pay, and being an honest Spiritualist, he wishes to treat the public in a fair and truthful manner. And as we think it will do Spiritualism no good to detect fraud and not expose it, we will all work together for the purpose of weeding out all such wherever we may find them. The seance consisted of ten persons, and all are willing to give their names, as they all saw Mr. Rassmussen expose him."

THIS BOOK IS FREE

The Mysteries of Hypnotism and Personal Magnetism Revealed.

The American College of Sciences of Rochester, N. Y., has just published a remarkable book on Hypnotism, Personal Magnetism, Magnetic Healing, Self-Mastery, Self-Confidence, and the higher development of Will Power. It is by far the most wonderful and comprehensive treatise of the kind ever printed. The Directors have decided, for a limited time, to give a free copy to each person sincerely interested in these wonderful sciences. It is the result of the combined effort of thirty of the most famous hypnotic specialists in the world. You can now learn the secrets of these wonderful sciences at your own home, free.

Hypnotism strengthens your memory, and develops a will of iron. It overcomes bashfulness, revives hope, stimulates ambition and determination to succeed and gives you that self-confidence which enables you to convince people of your real worth. It gives you the key to the inner secrets of mind control. It enables you to absolutely control the thoughts and actions of whomsoever you will. When you understand this grand and mysterious science you can plant suggestions in human minds which will be carried out in a day or even a year hence. You can cure bad habits and diseases in yourself or others. You can cure yourself of insomnia, nervousness and business or domestic worry.

You can instantaneously hypnotize people with a mere glance of the eye, without their knowledge, and powerfully influence them to do as you desire. You can develop, to a marvelous degree, any musical or dramatic talent you may have; you can increase your salary; you can develop your telepathic or clairvoyant power; you can give thrilling and funny hypnotic entertainments; you can win the love and everlasting friendship of those you desire, you can protect yourself against the influence of others; you can become a financial success and be recognized as a power in your community.

The American College guarantees to teach you the secret of attaining all these things. It is the largest and most successful school of Hypnotism in the world. It is chartered by the State laws, and carries out every promise faithfully. If you want a copy of its free book, just send your name and address, no money, to the American College of Sciences, Dept. 242A, Rochester, N. Y., and you will receive it by return mail, postpaid.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin, Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

Q. Lawrence: Q. Is there a text in the Bible stating that Jesus Christ passed through regeneration, and did he call himself God?

A. If Christ was God, then there would seem to be great inconsistency in claiming that he must be regenerated like "fallen" and "corrupt" man. Yet he had by his birth become in part partaker of human sin, and thus a necessity for his setting the example of expiation and having his taint washed away. He met John tae Baptist, a wandering Essenean devotee of the Syrian desert, whose mission appears to be to perform this rite, and is baptized, which means that he received the symbol of regeneration. Had this not been necessary he would not have taken it, and having taken it, he was regenerated.

Christians would have it believed that this rite of baptism was something new, instituted by Christ. On the contrary it was a pagan rite, one of the most fundamental of the ancient faiths. The form, and the meaning were identical with those of the Greek mysteries. It meant being "regenerated," "born again," "purified." "Regenerationem et impunitatem perjuriorum soorum," were the words of the administering priest in the pagan rite of the Mysteries.

The rite of baptism was also practiced by the Jews when they admitted converts from paganism to their religion.

The story of Christ's baptism, proves that the rite already was established, and that it was necessary for him to receive it like all other men.

Although not directly declaring himself God, he encouraged the belief that he was. Thus after his crucifixion he appeared to Thomas, who, astonished, cried out, "My Lord and my God," but he did not correct him, thus tacitly acknowledging that he was God. (St. John 20:28.) Christ says: "I and my father are one," (John 10:30), which may be understood as being one in purpose, or one in person. Beginning with the idea of messiahship, his followers gradually came to the belief that he was God, in the strange confusion of thought which exists no where else than in the mysteries of the trinity. The terms by which he was called show the muddled condition of the minds of the writers of the New Testament. The Son of God, the Lamb, Morning Star, Prophet, King, Prince, Mediator, Lord, Lord God, Lord of All, Savior, Son of Man, Son of David, Great High Priest, Creator, Supporter and Preserver of all Things, His blood the blood of God, Eternal God and Creator, Judge and Savior, Everlasting Father, etc., are a few of the titles, contradictory and confusing, which show the imagination of hero worship far more than understanding. The "Son of God," the "Redeemer" and "Savior" becomes hopelessly enmeshed in the tangle of the trinity, and absorbed in the oneness of the Godhead. Christ was a reincarnation of God, and after this reincarnation was God again; was and is, God under another name.

It is the same old story, told of Buddha, and all the "Saviors," who had human mothers with divine fatherhood.

M. A. M., Port Angeles: Q. I wish to call your attention to an article in New Thought Magazine, for criticism, November number.

A. This article is on "Desire and Duty," and is especially copyrighted, being thought of such high and valuable character, that copying should be rigidly denied. It is really so precious, one would be inclined to think that so far from denying the privilege to copy, it would be urged on all to copy far and wide for the good of humanity.

Truly, in style and method, it is representative of the "New Thought" literature: It is bizarre in expression; befogged and befogging in style; repeats very old ideas in its cant way, and boasts of its travail of thoughts unknown to earth before. To give an idea of this screed, we must quote, although the copyright is held threateningly over us.

It is held by the ethics of all time, that Duty should be the first, great and unanswerable rule in the conduct of life. It is the motive which has made the hero, martyr, saint and sage. It placed Leonidas in the pass of Thermopolae; Florence Nightingale with the wounded on the field of battle; Joan d'Arc at the head of the army of her suffering country; Clara Barton with the Red Cross Band where need exists; Washington at Valley Forge, and strengthens the endeavor of every man and woman, to oppose wrong and do the work, however distasteful, that is for them to do.

Not so, says "New Thought."

"Desire" must be the master!

To quote: "Desire has urged us so long and so hard, we have persistently cuffed it into the corner and gone after new gods," (That is after Duty.) "But despised Desire we try to coax out of the corner. The only way to find peace is to follow Desire. Desire is the only guide to heaven, and its road lies through hell."

"But keep your eyes on Desire and follow her every time you can. 'Lay for' Desire and follow her every time you can. Keep in mind that Desire is God. Duty is a sham. Duty is a desire in a goggle-eyed domino which scares you stiff."

Then the subject is reduced to mathematical certainty: "Desire is the drawing power of 95 per cent of you; will is the drawing power of 5 per cent of you—your little 5-per-cent thinker has conjured up Duty as a guide, whilst your 95 per cent mind sticks to Desire. Unmask Duty and you will find yourself one and invincible. The 5-per-cent tail will lose its job of wagging the 95-per-cent dog, and you will reach the Transfiguration Mount."

At the risk of being classed with the "little 5-per-cent thinkers," we unqualifiedly affirm that the Will should be master of Desire. We do not question that the desires go far to the make-up of the majority of individuals, though not probably to the "95 per cent limit," except in the most villainous and criminal.

The appetites and passions, the base brain, which are held in common with animals, know no other law than Desire. Above them are the moral and intellectual faculties and the will. While the animal is a creature of desire and held responsible to no higher motive, in man these appetites, passions and desires that spring therefrom, for his highest good must be under the government of intelligence, the reason and conscientiousness, the sum of which is the will.

Pause for a moment and see where this "New Thought" proposition leads. If Desire is the guide and is God, then one desire is as sacred as another and man becomes subject to no law higher than holds with the brute. The libertine is as holy in his debasing deception, as the chaste vestal; the robber as the honest toiler; the red-handed murderer as his victim.

Verily, this exponent of "New Thought" truly says: "The road lies through hell," and we ask, is it not better for the "5-per-cent tail" of Duty, that is the sum of the moral principles, reason and the will, to wag the "95-per-cent dog" of Desire, the sum of the brute appetites and passions, than to allow this dog unlimited freedom? Does not this freedom mean passing over the "road through hell," that by the fiery ordeal the will may at last gain mastery? Why pass through this experience to learn what we already know?

To return to the text, we find this exponent of "New Thought" hedges against this criticism. By making Desire and God one, then when man progresses to oneness with God, Duty and Desire will melt into each other and everything become one and the same. Then we reach "Transfiguration Mount."

Plainly the writer has gone round the circle and returned to the starting point. After startling sentences and display of coruscations of rockets and pin-wheel fireworks, we are told that Desire must be in line of Duty, in harmony with it, at harmony with God!

But the reader for whom this is written, may not apply this saving clause, and it is not intended that he should. It is intended that he accept Desire as his guide and as his God, and let it lead him "through hell," that he may reach heaven. It is ingeniously expressed as the only way, for the world has "tried everything else for a satisfaction, for a God to guide us and we have come back again to poor, neglected Desire."

As a specimen of "New Thought" literature, over which Ella Wheeler Wilcox presides as high priestess, we commend this effusion.

Mrs. Isa Wilson Kayner in Texas.

Mrs. Isa Wilson Kayner has been giving a series of lectures and test seances at Grace Chapel, with large attendance, and growing at each meeting. She has awakened quite an interest in the cause of Spiritualism, drawing many of the best citizens of the town into that line of thought and interest that is awakening the world.

The description of departed friends was so accurately given that near all were recognized. Many times the date of incident was given, even the day of the month and day of the week. She gave the description of a little freckle-face boy about three feet high, with a long cut on his forehead, a burn on his elbow, and a cut below the knee. No one seemed to recognize him. Then she said. he tells me he fell against a grate and cut his forehead, and fell in the fire and burned his arm or elbow, and was hit with an axe below the knee and departed this life at Nacona (a town 26 miles from this place). No one yet recognized him; then she said, "he tells me there is one in the congregation that knows him." After the congregation was dismissed, a gentleman was approaching Mrs. Kayner when she cried out, "You are the one this boy belongs to; I see him standing by your side." Said he, "No, he does not belong to me, but I know him well. He died at Nacona, but his parents are now living in this city." She gave the details of travel from foreign countries to this, and the encounter with storms, and the burial at sea of a relative, and described the articles or relics that have been received, and what kind of a box it was in; and many other things too numerous to mention.

She is making an effort to reorganize the Spiritualist society here, and to organize a lyceum for the children.

She has made a trip to Vashti, a little town about fourteen miles in the country and has created quite an interest out there. She is now on her way out there to hold her second meeting.

CARLO'S LECTURE.

Let us see if we're entitled to a heaven or a hell;
I have heard men speak with wisdom of a Great Eternal whole,
That surrounds and guides all beings through the channel of the soul,
But who paused to pass our species as without a soul to save,
And would give us not a future out beyond the earthly grave.

While they claim that naught created e'er is lost in Nature's law,
Yet with wisdom and assumption they the fine conclusion draw,
That a dog can have no future, just because he is a dog,
And among the beings soulless they omit the human hog;
So let's see about this future and the ones who stand above
In the traits that make all beings fit for any father's love.

We may often take to growling, we may snarl and growl and bite,
But our "wise and soulful" masters also do it—must be right.
And we couldn't chew tobacco—couldn't smoke it should we choose.
We could never use profanity, could never tell a lie,
Hence, we have no soul immortal and no intellect so high.

We can fight and quarrel lovely, as our masters do sometime,
And we surely ought to do so, for to them it seems sublime.
We have passion, greed, affection, and can learn what we are taught;
We are faithful to our masters and can almost read their thought;
We can trace them by their footsteps often trackless on the ground,
Yet they say there is no spirit in the animal yet found.

Yet, in their evolving wisdom and their scientific search,
They have found they pass up through us ere they reach their present perch.
They could not have been a human in this "Great Eternal Whole."
If they hadn't evoluted through our species, form and soul;
They would not have had the wisdom and the "dogged will" to do,
If they had no doggish faculties to scent out and pursue.

Now, my comrades, let's be faithful, though we're kicked and poorly fed,
For our masters will be angels when we dogs are dumb and dead;
Let us all be patient servants, and though suffering, not whine,
In the bright and golden sometime we may all have souls divine,
For if masters coarse and brutal, can inherit future bliss,
'Tis but just that we, too, find it in a "fairer land" than this.

Let us lick the hand that smites us, and be honest, kind and true;
If our masters find a heaven we can surely find it too.
No, we cannot build fine churches and pretend that we are pure,
But we can be true and faithful, and their "soulful kicks" endure,
For it seems to be just human and the human spirit's way,
And we all shall once be human and have souls divine some day.

We must follow them to heaven, and if they are welcomed there,
We must smile up at St. Peter, and put on a Christian air;
We must hand in our own records with our faces long drawn out;
We must lick God's hand and caper till we conquer every doubt,
Then perhaps the gates will open and our masters we can love,
In the land that is eternal, in the home in heaven above.

DR. T. WILKINS.

THE CHRIST QUESTION.

Though Settled Oft, Like Banquo's Ghost It Still Remains Unsettled.

About ten years ago "La Vie Inconnu de Jesus Christ" was published in Paris, and it is said to have never been translated into English. Its author, Nicholas Notovitch, spent several weeks in Ladak, a dependence of the Maharajah of Kashmere, formerly a part of Tibet. The Ladakians are mostly Buddhists, and polyandry has prevailed among them from time immemorial. The country is mountainous, its climate bleak and its summer short. It is not uncommon for half a dozen men to share the same wife. The men are much inferior physically to the women—stoop-shouldered, ugly, degenerate.

In 1887 Notovitch, while journeying to the east of Kashmere, visited a Buddhist monastery and there got traces of the legend current among the monks relative to the journey of Jesus in the Orient. He succeeded in getting sight of scrolls in which the sayings and doings of Jesus while in the East were supposed to be recorded. But when he sought to learn their contents the monks at once became dumb and urgent for his departure. He started on his return journey, but had not gone far when a fall from his horse broke his leg, necessitating his return to the monastery. The monks received him with kindness, and while he was thus helpless in their charge, he won their confidence to such a degree that one of them read to him the sacred scrolls recounting the life of Jesus in India, Tibet and Persia. An interpreter translated the words of the monk and Notovitch jotted down the translation.

Such is the statement of a writer in the Washington Post of Jan. 3. Query: Was this the Isa Sahib, called "Prince Prophet," whose tomb in the upper Punjab has been recently discovered, as announced by the Mohammedan Review, which falsely translates the name Isa Sahib, "Jesus Christ?" I adverted to this in The Progressive Thinker of Dec. 13, when paralleling the story of "Isa the Prophet and Jesus the God," and claimed that the Arabian legend was the earlier of record.

My contention is that though the name Jesus may have been derived from the Arabec Isa, or better, perhaps, from the Greek IES, one of the names of the god Bacchus, the adjunct CHRISTUS was never a proper name, nor even a Latin word until the monks of the renaissance coined it. In this contention I am compelled to date the composition of the New Testament after the revival of learning.

In Matthew xxiii:8 we read: "Be not ye called Rabbi, for one is your Master, even Christ," and the same expression is repeated in verse 10. What was the word spoken answering to Christ? The vernacular of Judea and Galilee nineteen hundred years ago was Aramaic. Its written alphabet was the same phonetically as the Chaldean or Hebrew, but the writing was cursive. In the ancient Syriac version of the New Testament, called the Peshito, claiming to have been written in the language spoken by Jesus and his disciples, the word is spelled with four letters, namely, Mim Shin, Cheth, Olaph (equivalent to M, SH, CH or HH, and a "spiritus lenis"), which word the Rev. Dr. James Murdoch, in the preface to the "Syriac Peshito Version," tells us is sounded "meshihha," and which he translates "Messiah and not Christ."

Presumably the word meant the same as the Hebrew "mashiach" or mashich," or the Greek "christos," translated "anointed." But in the Moslem story of Isa, whose life and ministry answer to that of the gospel Jesus, he is called "the masich," which means "healer," wherefore I suspect that the Aramaic and Hebrew word may have had a like meaning; and I further suspect that the monks of the Renaissance, who fabricated the gospels, changed "Isa the masich," to "Ieshu ha-meshiha" in the Syriac, and "Ieous ho christos" in the Greek, but, in making the Latin version, instead of translating meshiha or christos into the Latin "unctus" or "delibutus," they audaciously coined the word "christus." Nor do I believe that the Syriac or Greek version antedated the Latin vulgate, but that all were fabricated about the same time.

The first instance in which Jesus confessed himself to be the meshiha was when, in answer to the question addressed by him to his disciples, "Whom say ye that I am?" Simon Kepha said, "Thou art the meshiha." The reply of Jesus was, "Flesh and blood have not revealed it to thee, but my Father who is in heaven." So, then, it was a divine revelation to Simon only, whom Jesus surnamed Kepha.

The next disclosure of his so-called "Messiahship" is recorded in Mark ix:41: "For whoever shall give you to drink a cup of water on the ground that ye are Messiah's [followers], verily I say to you, he will not lose his reward." The word "followers" is inserted by the translator, Dr. Murdock. The Greek version reads: "hoti christou esti," literally, because ye are of anointed."

Again, when pressed by the high priest to answer whether he was "the meshiha, the Son of God," Jesus replied, "Thou hast said," Matt. xxvi:64.

Further than in the texts above cited I find no instance in which Jesus declared himself the meshiha, save in a prayer to his Father recorded in John xvii:3: "And this is life eternal, that they may know thee, that thou art the only true God, and whom thou hast sent, Jesus meshiha." I quote Murdock's translation, changing "Messiah" to "meshiha." The absurdity of thus calling himself in an address to God must be apparent to the rational mind.

The answer to the question of the high priest was reluctantly given; and, if meshiha meant anointed, there was reason for the reluctance, for Jesus was never anointed except by a woman, who is said by one evangelist to have anointed his feet and by another that she poured the ointment on his head.

The death of Jesus is variously dated A. D. 29 to 35. When he said to the Pharisees that they would persecute and kill the prophets he would send unto them, that upon them might come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of the righteous Abel unto the blood of Zacharias, son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar." What Zacharias did he mean? Josephus tells us that Zacharias, the son of Baruch, was slain in the middle of the temple about A. D. 67 (War. IV, v. 4). Much of the four Gospels and book of Acts seems to have been based on the writings of Josephus, with inaccurate chronology.

In II. Chronicles xxiv: 20, 21, Zachariah, the son of Jehoida the priest, assumed the role of prophet, and was stoned to death at the command of Joash the king—marginal date 840 B. C. Smith's Bible Dictionary says: "We may suppose that the name Barachias crept into the text of Matthew from a marginal gloss." But the writer of Chronicles says nothing about the prophet being slain "between the temple and the altar," while Josephus describes the murder as occurring "in the middle of the temple." And did not the writer of the Gospel intend to bring the accusation down to his own time instead of 840 years B. C?

"Many of the Greek Fathers," says Smith's Bible Dictionary, "have maintained that the father of John the Baptist is the person to whom our Lord alluded; but there can be little or no doubt that the allusion is to Zechariah the son of Jehoida." The Moslem story tells us that Zachariah, the temple priest, and father of Yahya, who answers to John the Baptist, was slain for alleged adultery with Mariam, the mother of Isa. So this Zachariah might answer to the one alluded to by Jesus, but for the designation "son of Barachias," which points to Zacharias, the son of Baruch, whose death occurred A. D. 67.

Was the gospel of Matthew written as early as A. D. 67? Rational critics assign its composition to the second century or later, the evidence being based on the writings of the so-called Fathers, all fabricated after the revival of learning. The Latin vulgate New Testament is doubtless the oldest version, but no good Latinist of the early centuries would have written "christus" or "christianus;" these words are monkish and modern.

We can speak of Jesus without calling him Christ, but the words "Christian" and "Christianity" cannot well be avoided. The Catholic order of Jesuits is properly named, and Jesuitism would better express the worship of Jesus.

WM. HENRY BURR.

Unjust Medical Laws.

The American Medical Union, at its fifth annual meeting, held in Chicago, Jan. 12, revised the language of the third article of its constitution relating to members, so as to make it clear that osteopaths, electropaths, vitapaths, and adherents of all other systems of therapeutics are admitted to membership on equality with drug dispensers.

It is charged by the Union, that the monopoly medical laws we now have were lobbied through the various legislatures by doctors who expected to hold office under them, and that they are often administered, not only despotically, but corruptly. Resolutions were adopted by this meeting, calling upon the Attorney General of Illinois, and the States Attorney of Cook county to prosecute the State Board of Health for malfeasance in office, and fraudulent practices.

The report of the secretary showed substantial growth in membership during the past year, and widely increasing recognition of, and sympathy with its purpose and method. This is evidenced by the large correspondence from all parts of the country, from representative physicians and laymen, and by the enthusiastic indorsement and support of the ablest and most popular medical and progressive secular and religious journals.

This organization gives promise of being able ere long to force the repeal of all unjust and un-American medical laws and restore freedom to the physicians and the people. It surely will, if all who believe in freedom will join it and work to that end. The membership fee is only one dollar, which should be forwarded to

A GREAT QUESTION.

Whence Are We, Whither Are We Going?

In these latter days this inquiry is more frequently and fervently made by mortals than ever before. This is due, in part, to the fact that there are more avenues of learning open to all mortals, and the acquiring of knowledge can be be accomplished in so many ways. Yet this very fact that truth is presented in various ways and in all her relations to man's destiny as an immortal being, causes confusion.

This must be attributed to the struggle for the proper assimilation of that which is imparted to the world's brain from higher realms, with that which is sufficiently refined for such assimilation. This hastens progress. Now ideas constantly have birth. This heavenly light is pervading all minds, and all conditions, and the old things pass away.

When seen in this clearer light, man realizes as he never did before, that every privilege enjoyed entails a responsibility, and every necessity implies a duty, a service to be rendered by which the soul is brought in contact with new conditions and forces for experience and the widening of her circuits to thus draw wisdom and force for man's information and for the weaving of a substantial web of flife.

All life's adverse, complex, as well as pleasant experiences constitute the soul's drama. Man learns by all these exercises that he is immortal here and now, and that he certainly does return to the realms immortal when his earth tour is ended. He learns that he is here to gather knowledge and substance which conduce to his eternal welfare and give him stability as an individual entity to endure thus forever.

Man, an heir and offspring of God, should at all times seek to show honor and respect to his Heavenly Father, by being pure, true, upright and serving and learning in all ways, where self and general improvement depend on the united efforts of each member of the human family in the rendering of their specific parts.

The way is clear, the march from time here on Earth to eternity, is no longer one of mystery or uncertainty. Life and death vie with each other in the company of mortal man. Side by side they journey with him. They are his guardians on this mortal journey, also the sentinels, therefore, nothing man does, or thinks even, is unobserved. Oh, that this fact would be ever borne in mind. It would serve a good purpose by prohibiting impure acts and thoughts and make man's pathway brghter and his burdens lighter. There is a great amount of useless conjecture in the minds of mortals, about what might have been. If they could but see as the angels see, they would discover that the might-have-beens were not at all intended to be, but were only prodding forks so to say, which destiny makes use of to spur mortals on to different thought and action.

Failures in business, yea; all unpleasant experiences, are not without their uses, there are force connections to be made and substances to be drawn which, only through such experiences, are made possible. It is not always the best good that mortals call so, for they seem to think it good luck to have worldly prosperity. Nay; it is not best unless it serves the soul in its expansion and labors for true immortal improvement. So, in answering the query, Whence and whither? we positively say, man is from above and thither does he journey. He is but a sojourner on earth, and none of this world's goods are or can be his real possessions. He has what he acquires only as a loan for a short season and well it is for him, if he exercises just stewardship over these things entrusted to his care.

MEDICAL MONOPOLY.

How It Works in Indiana, as Exemplified.

Anderson, Ind.—As a result of an alleged agreement between the physicians of this place not to answer any calls to treat persons who owe other physicians for former professional services, or people of doubtful financial standing, without pay in advance, the infant child of Albert Graham will probably die.

Three days ago the child was badly burned and Mr. and Mrs. Graham claim that they have been unable to secure a physician to dress the child's injuries because she could not pay in advance for the services. She claims to have called on 16 physicians in vain. The child is in a precarious condition.

Curing Disease a Crime.

The above is only a small part of the results of class legislation in medical laws. Citizens of Indiana, how do you like it? Let the little helpless children of the poor die like rats because their parents are not in financial standing to pay the price set by the legalized guardians of the public health.

It is simply plain legalized murder. Could that poor mother call in another physician outside the regular trust doctor? Or some sympathetic old lady who knows the many simple remedies required in cases of that kind? No, indeed! Witness the law railroaded through by these same gentlemen(?) also decided valid by the supreme court:

"To open an office—or to announce to the public in any way, a readiness to practice medicine in any county in the state, or to prescribe for, or to give surgical assistance to, or to heal, cure or relieve, or to attempt to heal or relieve those suffering from injury or deformity or disease of body or mind or to advertise, or to announce to the public in any manner a readiness or ability to heal, cure or relieve those who may be suffering from injury or deformity, or disease of mind or body, shall be to engage in the practice of medicine within the meaning of this act." Penalty upon conviction is not less than $25, nor more than $200 each offence.

The entire statute on this subject will make interesting reading to the general public in view of the facts that the medical laws are controlled entirely in the interests of the allopath and homeopath schools of medicine—baring out all other schools of medicine and classes of healers, many of whom use no drugs whatever in their practice.

Nor is this all! Only a few weeks ago the startling headlines announced almost a panic in another Indiana city: "Children dying of lockjaw caused by compulsory vaccination." Another monstrous iniquity forced upon the people by this same medical monopoly.

Voters of Indiana, abolish the Medical Monopoly. It is a menace to every home, rich or poor, high or low; none are exempt from their legalized tyranny. W. ESPANTO.

TWO IN ONE

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 462 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

LAKE HELEN, FLA.

Notes of the Southern Cassadaga Camp.

The arrivals since my last letter, at the camp have been Mrs. M. J. Stephens, of Washington, D. C., who is welcomed as an old camper and excellent medium; Wm. Jones, of Leroy, Ind., who are stopping at Hotel Cassadaga.

G. W. Rouse, of Kent, Ohio, president of Lake Brady Camp, Ohio.

Mr. Johnson, of Middlefield, Ohio, who expects to build a cottage here very soon. Mrs. Haviland, Marshalltown, Iowa, stopping at the Spencer House.

Mrs. A. Cole, of Mich., is now at her cottage.

Mr. and Mrs. Skeels, of Cleveland, O., who will very soon move into their new cottage.

Mr. and Mrs. Smith Baker, of Kansas City, Mo., are stopping at The Webster, a short walk from camp.

J. Clegg Wright, wife and maid, are at their place outside the camp.

A great improvement has been made by having our streets well lighted. J. D. Palmer, of Willoughby, Ohio, was fortunate enough to secure a number of lamps in the North, for the association, and has himself prepared the posts and put them in their places, also painted them, so they are a great addition to the looks and convenience of our little city amongst the pines.

Geo. P. Colby visited the camp for a few days and while here gave a lecture in the dining-room of the Spencer House, which was well attended.

It takes the Maine people to hustle. Only a few weeks ago Mr. Littlefield and Mr. Lower came upon the grounds and now they are both in cottages of their own, mostly builded by themselves; neither of them carpenters, one a merchant and the other an upholsterer.

Dr. Hilligoss and wife are at Jacksonville, and will arrive at their cottage on Saturday eve.

The meeting on Jan 3, at 2 p. m., was well attended. Mrs. McDonnell, a very talented woman, and an author, of Toronto, Canada, led the meeting, upon the subject of Sowing and Reaping. Several speakers followed her. The interest was so great that it was again taken up in the evening. The evening leader was Mrs. Eva Carrigue of Pawtucket, R. I. She called it "her first speech in meeting," but it was a good one.

Sunday, the 10th, the subject of the afternoon was "What Shall We Do to Promote Spiritualism?" The consensus of opinion was that right living was the key-note of all progressive movements, and that Spiritualism was linked with all reforms, and had gathered to itself the best in all ideas of religion, had clasped hands with Science, and that whoever professed to understand its beautiful truths, and brought it down to a low level by lack of integrity, were wolves in the sheep-fold, and should be taught better or call themselves by some other name.

The evening service was conducted by Mrs. Thatcher, of Jamestown. Subject, "Pulling the Weeds in Our Own Garden." The evening passed very pleasantly.

Friday, the 8th, a large party assembled in the dancing pavilion. The music was furnished by Mr. Littlefield, of Maine, as violinist, Miss Marguerite Webster as pianist, and Mr. Leroy Libby accompanied them with the cornet. Charles Meyers, of Lake Helen, is floor manager. The camp parties are very popular and bring people from Lake Helen, Orange City, and frequently from Deland, and the old folks are not barred out. It isn't all "two step," but the Virginia reel and some of the old-fashioned square dances. The most graceful set of dancers I've seen in many a day, was a party of elderly people who went through with the Spanish waltz. One remarked that he did not really think he could go through with it "but his heels remembered better than his head."

Mrs. Brown and Mrs. Agnes Perry, of Danbury, Conn., were called home by the very serious illness of Mrs. Brown's husband, who is also the father of Mrs. Perry. We regret the necessity of their going very much.

Will the friends who have promised me something for our bazaar, please send their contributions as soon as possible. A sewing machine has been donated to the Ladies' Auxiliary by G. W. Whitney, of Boston, who is one of a firm for manufacturing sewing machine. It was hailed with delight by the ladies who are taking orders for aprons and other sewing. Any gifts will be thankfully received, and gifts that may seem small to the donors are a great help to us. We would like our bazaar well stocked at the beginning of the meeting.

So Easy to Forget.

In 999 cases out of every thousand, the directions which accompany a physician's prescription or proprietory medicine, tell you to take a dose three or four times a day, either before or after meals, and on going to bed. In 999 cases out a thousand, this rule is never strictly followed. You start in to observe it religiously and succeed pretty well at first, but soon you'll begin to skip doses, then the medicine fails in its intended effect. It's so easy to forget.

If the remedy is in liquid form, the business man loses a dose in the middle of the day unless some thoughtful wife, mother or sister gives him a spoon and makes him take an extra bottle to the office. Most men hate to do this. If the medicine is in tablet form, the chances are that he will never think of it until he reaches for car fare on his way home. It's so easy to forget. This applies to men and women alike.

The proprietors of Vernal Palmettona (formerly known as Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine) had sense and foresight enough to make their remedy so that only one dose a day is necessary. It is easy to remember to take it after the last meal or on going to bed. It stands in a class by itself. If you are pestered with indigestion, constipation, liver trouble, bowel trouble or any skin affliction resulting from bad blood, Vernal Palmettona is what you need. Try it at our expense. Write for a free sample bottle. It will do you good. Address, Vernal Remedy Co., 452 Seneca Building, Buffalo, N. Y. Sold at all druggists.

BOOK REVIEW.

A Spray of Cosmos. By Augusta Cooper Bristol. Boston: Richard G. Badger.

This fine sample of printer's and binder's art is a volume of selections from the poems of this author, many of which have been copied and recopied by the press for their uplifting thoughts and sweetness of rhythm. The impress of a poet is on every one; we may say on every line, and the versification is perfect. This delightful clearness of presentation with no halting measure is well represented in "A Summer Morning Hour With Nature."

The night has gathered up her moonlit fringes
And curtains gray,
And Orient gates, that turn on silver hinges,
Let in the day.

The following we commend to those who desire spirit communion, as a means of preparation:

Come to me, angels! The room of my spirit
Is garnished and swept for a season by prayer;
I have cast out, just to win you a-near it,
All the earth-vanities brooding in there:
Come to me angels!
Lift for a moment my curtain of care!

"Evening," closes with this suggestion of life's great transition:

Then pass in peace my soul. Though earth recedeth,
Heaven orbs the way,
And the starred shadow of the night precedeth
Life's larger day.

There are many poems of which the theme is love; passionate, intense, yet refined, purifying, exalting love. In fact the themes are about equally divided between nature and love. The influence of this exaltation is sweetly expressed in "Victory," which is its triumph:

And said in self-forgetful plea,
"I'll make the narrow place that's given
The very vestibule of heaven,
Because of him who loveth me."
And then, (oh, wondrous to rehearse!)
The humble walls began to rise,
And towering upward to the skies,
They widened to the universe.

What is poetry? It has never been, nor can it be defined. It is a great deal more than rhyme and measure. A doggerel may be perfect in structure. There is a subtile aroma that suggests far more than is expressed; a spiritual symbolism and imagery which when one finds he knows it is poetry. Thus it may be said of this collection, they are poetry, and the author a poet. In these days of machine magazine rhyme, no higher praise can be bestowed by the critic.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

This volume, like all of Dr. Babbitt's works, is not of merely passing interest, but of solid, enduring, practical value. A perusal of these solidly packed pages will show that the author is not only a capable and thoroughly intelligent physician, but an earnest humanitarian as well. He has no use nor excuses for the cruelties of vivisection. In this respect he stands forth in sharp contrast to many self-styled great lights of the medical profession. He maintains there is a better way to ascertain the processes of life than that of vivisection.

In the same line is his emphatic condemnation of the abuses of surgery, which has such fascination for many physicians.

Journeys to Mars, or Our Mission to Ento. By Sara Weiss.

This book is worthy of careful notice because of its inherent depth of thought, gracefulness of style, and comprehensive philosophy. Whether it be looked upon as a romance or work of imagination, or as a record of actual experiences, as claimed by the author, it is full of interest.

Mrs. Weiss announces these as actual visits to Mars, and her descriptions are intended to give the reader her impressions, just as if she had made a journey to a foreign country on our own planet.

She tells us that life in Mars is not so different from our own as we had been led to expect. While in mechanical and scientific fields the people there excel us, in religious and spiritual matters they were far behind, until the visit of the band of spiritual beings with whom she made her journeys. It was the mission of this band to enlighten the people of Mars, who dwelt in the darkness of a profound materialism, believing that physical existence was the only possible condition. This mission was accomplished, and its accomplishment gives the book its moral aspect and enables the author to convey the philosophical and ethical lessons to be found in its chapters.

F. Anlauf writes from Oklahoma City, Okla.: "My last communication in The Progressive Thinker has brought me many letters. At a meeting to-day we organized temporarily under the name, The First Spiritualist Society of Oklahoma City. Mrs. Alice Baker, of Dallas, Texas, will hold three public lectures for us Jan. 23 and 24. Prospects for a good organization here are fine."

Mrs. Isa W. Kayner lectured last Sunday evening with fine attendance, after which she gave the names of two well-known townsmen who lately departed this life. On Tuesday and Thursday nights she held test meetings with fine success, giving descriptions of departed friends, scars, burns and cuts, and incidents of their cause, and sometimes the dates, and most of them recognized at once. She also gave reading from old relics, with wonderful accuracy. Come out and see her in these wonderful gifts.—Bowie (Tex.) Blade.

We leave the race problem, "The Negro," to be discussed in the secular press. We give, however, an extract from an article by Mrs. S. G. Colleen, of Jacksonville, Fla.: "The curse of the negro is laziness, with the strong desire to get all he can for nothing without working for it. If the colored race could be taught to be industrious the problem would soon be settled, but the young negro will not work, but will steal first. Strange to say, nearly all the criminals among the colored population, according to our court of police report, range in age from 8 or 10 years up to 30 or 35 years of age. After that they generally become very religious. They have a terrible fear of death, and knowing as a rule that the average colored man does not live as long as the white man, he naturally begins his religious career at about the ages stated above."

Mrs. Maggie Waite writes; "On Sunday, Jan. 17, I celebrated my sixteenth anniversary of mediumship. The hall was crowded, having over four hundred persons present. A splendid lecture was delivered, followed by tests by Dr. C. H. Burgess, and your humble servant. The music part of the programme was given by Miss Ariel Nichols, celebrated soprano soloist; Miss Briggs also rendered a beautiful solo. Dr. Freedman's fine baritone voice was heard again, and greatly appreciated. Little Florence Daniels pleased the audience very much with her charming little songs. Miss Smith, a sweet young lady also sang a song, which pleased the people very much. Mr. Byron Stillman gave a recitation and some of his original sayings. A great many beautiful flowers were given to my guide in whose honor these services were given. Also a number of very beautiful presents were given to your humble servant. The Progressive Thinker was greatly in demand, every copy being sold before the meeting was over. The meeting closed at 11 p. m., with the audience expressing themselves greatly pleased."

Mrs. Bushnell Donnelly writes from San Francisco, Cal., detailing some remarkable experiences: "I wrote you not long since of a spiritual manifestation that occurred in my own house. Our kind spirit friend came again, and informed us the outcome of a case in the Federal Court, of which we were the plaintiff, the case involving many thousands. He told us how to proceed and what would be the result. Not one prophecy did he give but has been verified. He informed me of a matter, the truth of which I would have traveled to Europe for. He answered a question that has long puzzled my mind, a question that I have defended with my tongue and pen. He came unexpectedly as before, dressed in purple, his ring lighting up his grand and splendid figure. He has promised to come again. He told us of the signs of the times. He gave his name as 'Friend,' saying there was nothing in a name. He informed me that he would visit the circle, should I go, as I desire, to Kansas City, when I can speak to Professor Denton face to face. The glorious news that death is life, is reaching around the world."

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Mrs. Harriette Wyckoff died at her home east of Woodland, Col. She was 79 years, 5 months and 23 days old, and her passing was peaceful and painless as a tired child goes to sleep. It was the climax of a long and useful life, the result of age rather than disease.

Mrs. Wyckoff was an active and influential member of the Eastern Star. She lived a plain, simple, unostentatious life, and her mind and heart were animated and stirred by noble purposes, generous impulses and the kindliest feelings for all mankind. She was a devoted Spiritualist.

Col. W. W. Robinson, Sr., father of Maj. W. W. Robinson, a well-known army officer and for several years in charge of the quartermaster department in this city, died at the home of his son, on Salmon bay, near Fort Lawton, aged 84 years. The cause of his death was a complication of liver and bladder troubles, from which he has been a sufferer for sceveral years.—Seattle (Wash.) Post.

Passed to spirit life on the evening of Dec. 31, 1903, in San Jose, Cal., Eliza K. Wilson, in the 65th year of her age; a conscientious Spiritualist; a respected member of the board of Directors of the First Spiritual Union; a member of J. A. Dix Relief Corps. Mrs. Cowell, of Oakland, gave the funeral address to large audience; exercises at the grave by relief corps. H. L. B.

Mrs. Anna M. Hartnack Roberts passed to spirit life, from her home in Jacksonville, Fla., Jan. 2, 1904, just eight months after her husband, Wm. F. Roberts. Mrs. Roberts formerly resided in Norwich, Conn., and has been a true Spiritualist for nearly fifty years.

BAD STOMACHS CURED.

We Can Positively Cure Any Case of Stomach Trouble Not Caused by Cancer. We Do Not Take Our Word. TEST IT YOURSELF.

FREE TEST TREATMENT

Do you suffer from indigestion, dyspepsia, or stomach trouble in any form? If you do why not let us cure you? We do not mean that by giving you a Soda Compound Tablet or some of the other patent "Dyspepsia Cures." We will positively and permanently cure you. We will go to the very foundation of your trouble; will remove the causes, strengthen and tone up the stomach, and make you strong and healthy as you ever were. We could give you testimonials by the thousands of those we have cured of stomach trouble in all its forms and stages; but they would not be facts or proof to you—only words of thanks and praise. The only absolute proof is in the treatment itself. And believing that a practical test would be more convincing to sufferers than all the testimonials we could print and absolutely prove its great merits, we will send anyone desiring it a full two weeks' trial treatment absolutely free.

If you have stomach trouble and have failed to get relief, write us at once and learn by practical test what we can do for you. Address Dr. Peebles Institute of Health, Ltd., 23 Main Street, Battle Creek, Mich.

VOLNEY'S RUINS —AND— THE LAW OF NATURE, TO WHICH IS ADDED Volney's Answer to Dr. Priestly, a Biographical Notice by Count Darn, and the Zodiacal Signs and Constellations by the Editor; Also, a Map of the Astrological Heavens o the Ancients.

This is undoubtedly one of the best and most useful books ever published. It eloquently advocates the best interests of mankind, and clearly points out the sources of human ignorance and misery. The author is supposed to meet in the ruins of Palmyra an apparition or phantom, which explains the true principles of society, and the causes of both the prosperity and the ruin of ancient states. A general assembly of the nations is at length convened, a legislative body formed, the source and origin of religion, of government, and of laws discussed, and the Law of Nature—founded on justice and equity—is finally proclaimed the expectant world.

THE GREAT MYSTERY OF SPIRIT FORMS

NUMBER SIX.

The most tremendous problems of life and death cannot be solved in five newspaper articles.

Upon the psychological proof—comparative and experimental—that my own personal spirit possesses a personal form; indirectly rests the scientific proof of my own personal survival of what is called death.

Hence it is as important for me to know whether my own spirit has a personal form; and for me to know the exact nature of that personal form, viz.,—the substance of which it is composed—as it is for me to know the psychological nature of the Spirit Forms who have passed out.

For I believe that my personal Spirit has its own form; and, that my Soul possesses its own form.

And; in order for me to be just to the forms of discarnate spirits, it is necessary for me to scientifically and precisely know the exact nature of the forms of my own personal Spirit and Soul, in order to distinguish them from the Spirit Forms which appear to us from the other side.

Then again, our own Spirits, and Souls, not only possess their own forms, but are also, in some sense, creators of elements of human forms, viz., as images.

My treatise on this, viz., that the human passions of the Soul—considered as creative—psychic—forces—were actual creators of elements of human form, was kindly referred to; and, in fact, accepted by many of the following thinkers, and journals, at the following dates.

First, by the illustrious philosopher, Lombroso, Sept. 20, 1901; Prof. Albion T. Small of the University of Chicago, Aug. 6, 1901; Prof. Oscar Lovell Triggs of the University of Chicago, Sept. 22, 1901; Prof. Edward A. Ross of the University of Nebraska, Oct. 17, 1901; The Academy of France, F. E. Thomas, Jan. 1902; Prof Elmer Gates, Smithsonian Institution, Sept. 11, 1901; Prof. Lester F. Ward, LL. D., Columbian University; Prof. William James, LL. D., Harvard University, Feb. 25, 1903; Dr. Egbert Guernsey, Editor Medical Times, New York, Jan. 1902; Dr. Lyman Abbott, Editor Outlook, New York, Jan. 21, 1902; Boston Transcript, Oct. 26, 1901; Boston Globe, July 26, 1901; New York Journal, Nov. 3, 1901; Boston Higher Law, Jan. 1902; Public Opinion, New York, Nov. 29, 1901; The Biological Magazine, Nov. 1901; Boston Post, Nov. 3, 1901; Mind, New York, Dec. 1901; Arena, New York, Dec. 1901; Zion's Herald, Nov. 20, 1901; Universalist Leader, Dec. 7, 1901; Boston Ideas, Nov. 30, 1901; Boston Gazette, Jan 4, 1902; Boston Times, Jan. 11, 1902; The Watchman, Jan. 23, 1902; Christian Register, Aug. 28, 1902; Health Culture, New York, Feb. 27, 1903; Banner of Light, Dec. 28, 1901; and many others.

The philosophy and religion of Spiritualism, and the New Thought, is evolutionary.

If the knowledge of these two great branches of modern popular Spiritual feeling and aspiration is therefore evolutionary, then it implies our possibility of progress in ideas, and a better change in our conception, viz., a possibility of a better revision of some of our old interpretations of the New Thought, and of Spiritualism.

Human knowledge (in a religious and philosophical sense) can only be of two sorts.

Dogmatic, after the manner of an unalterable verbal (a) oral, or printed creed; as with the books of organizations, i. e., the Koran, Science and Health, the Book of Mormon, Confession of Faith, or Discipline, or Secret Doctrine.

(b) Experimental. The experimental form of knowledge is gained according to the methods, and plans of modern comparative and experimental science. In religious matters, therefore, the spiritual concepts of the new thought and of Spiritualism, must (to be scientifically intelligible, and scientific) be based in part upon the methods of experimental and comparative psychology.

But the path of comparative psychology though more certain than dogma, is not as easy to learn.

Religious Spiritualism—in the loftiness of its sublime aspiration—is quickly thrown into irritability, and anger, when attempts are made to modify its concepts, and ideas.

Its wings are plumed for the infinite.

It is impatient with earth, and earth's conditions.

Hence it is very uneasy, hasty, eager and often full of unjust anger, when confronted with new scientific facts.

Thus; in human history, scientific Spiritualism has always had the unpleasant task of teaching religious Spiritualism, a more profound and saintly patience, and humility.

Thus; that great lamented saint of modern scientific Spiritualism, Frederic W. H. Myers, M. A., Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, England, and author of "Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death," was often sneered at, and silently scorned with a malignant cruelty because of his unflinching scientific attitude; and, because, he was an evolutionary Spiritualist; not a dogmatic one.

The fact is; that if Frederic W. H. Myers (in the face of the opposition of those well-meaning Spiritualists who should have helped him) had not sustained, his own, strictly scientific enthusiasm, in Spiritualism, from about the year 1873, when he talked the matter over with the late Lord Mount Temple; and nearly on to 1903, when his posthumous work appeared; it is obvious that his great learned book would never have led the respectable world—in the face of so much ghastly imposture and unavoidable ignorance—to have looked into the claims of Spiritualism.

And; whatever of good these personal articles of mine may or may not do, in the direction of awakening an interest in Spiritualism, and its philosophy, it is obvious that they would never have been written, but for the stray spark of strictly scientific interest in the subject, first awakened in me in the early winter of 1875-1876, by Lord Mount Temple, at his town residence, Stanhope street, Hyde Park, London, Eng., and which, in my own case, was subsequently developed in experience, which Prof. William James of Harvard, edited, and gave to the world some years ago.

Hence, my foregoing articles on this subject, desired to make clear two points?

(a) That the dignity and lofty mental and moral worth of the medium's own spirit was deserving of as much study, as that of the medium's spirit guide; and particularly in the matter of the unconscious, self-creation of mental and physical forms, by the medium's own mighty form-creating spirit.

(b) That; in attempting to solve the great mystery of spirit forms, that the great question of spirit identity, must ultimately, and absolutely depend upon the more profound question of one's own unchanging psychological identity.

Thus; among the primary questions to be answered, by a medium desiring to see the form of her own mother, or father, who have passed out, is this one, viz., What psychological relation of identity does the image of my mother—in myself—bear to my own spirit?

For; upon the fact, that the image, of the medium's mother, remains absolutely correct, and exact within the medium; and, also, upon the fact that the medium's own Spirit also has the power to get, keep, and reproduce the image of her mother, at will, rests the only possibility, whereby the medium could identify her mother at a seance.

An irreparable injury, either to the image of the medium's mother, within the medium; or, to the medium's own spirit, would render the medium absolutely incapable of recognizing her own mother; should her mother appear to her at any time after her transition.

This is because the medium's power of identifying her mother, depends upon the power of the medium's own spirit, to get, keep, and recall, or reproduce, from within herself, the image of her mother who has passed out. This image was first created in the medium by her sense experiences; before her mother's transition.

Thus; if my senses, i. e., if I had never in my life touched, heard, and seen, such men (as Garibaldi; Sir Henry Bessemer; General William Booth; Presidents Harrison, Hayes and Cleveland; Phillips Brooks; Blaine; Beecher; Talmage; Monsignor Capel; Edward Everett Hale; Lord Mount Temple; Sully; or Ingalls) I should never have possessed within myself, an identifying image, by the means of which my spirit could identify them; either before, or after they pass out.

Utterly destroy the images of these men (which exist within myself, as the image of the medium's mother is within the medium so that no form of them is left in me, which I can compare with their own real selves, forms, shapes, or figures) and I could no longer say that I had ever seen, touched, or heard, such men.

It is the business of my Soul to create the nerve-conditions possible for the getting, keeping, and reproducing of these images.

And, it is the business of my spirit to interpret the meaning of the images after they have been obtained by experience.

The definitions of Soul, and Spirit, I will give further on.

The five foregoing chapters were intended therefore to also prove three points.

(a) That in attempting to solve the Great Mystery of Spirit Forms, profound scientific and analytical study should first of all be given to the psychological and neurological conditions of the medium.

The dignity of the medium's own Spirit demand that this study and philosophical attention should first be given to it; and, particularly in the direction of the medium's own unconscious Spiritual capacity to create spirit forms.

After this has been done, and the medium's own spirit has been treated with becoming dignity, profound study, and scientific reverence, it will then be time to treat with equal delicacy and dignity the nature of the great mystery of the spirit form of the medium's guide.

By following this patient method, we do not incur the chagrin of having to go back to the effete ideas of medieval necromancy, rather than forward to the constantly widening concepts of a grander, comparative, and experimental modern, evolutionary science.

AT FIRST.

If I should fall asleep one day,
All overworn,
And should my spirit, from the clay,
Go dreaming out the heavenward way,
Or thence be softly borne,

I pray you, angels, do not first
Assail mine ear
With that blest anthem, oft rehearst,
"Behold, the bonds of Death are burst!"
Lest I should faint with fear.

But let some happy bird, at hand,
The silence break;
So I shall dimly understand
That dawn has touched a blossoming land,
And sigh myself awake.

From that deep rest emerging so,
To lift the head
And see the bath-flower's bell of snow,
The pink arbutus, and the low
Spring beauty streaked with red,

Will all suffice. No otherwhere
Impelled to roam,
Till some blithe wanderer, passing fair,
Will, smiling, pause—of me aware—
And murmur, "Welcome home!"

So sweetly greeted I shall rise
To kiss her cheek;
Then lightly soar in lovely guise,
As one familiar with the skies,
Who finds and need not seek.

The Light Among the Hills.

A Charming Narrative.

Most Beautifully Suggestive is "The Light Among the Hills," by Mrs. I. L. Lewis, of Bethel, Vt. It is a narrative founded on facts alone, and every Spiritualist should read it.

(Concluded from No. 740.)

While these scenes were being enacted in the Daley home, something of a different nature was occurring in Martha Weston's home among the mountains. One morning as Mr. and Mrs. Weston sat at the breakfast table eating the usual morning meal of boiled potatoes and corn cake, Mrs. Weston suddenly exclaimed: "I am goin' ter send for Martha ter come home. The doctor says 'twill be two weeks now before Charlie can get about, and I can have that for an excuse."

"What do you want an excuse to send for her for? Why ain't she wall enough where she is?"

"I've been readin' in the paper that them Spiritualists up there are goin' to hold a big meetin' next week, and I wouldn't wonder a mite if Laury went and took Martha with her."

"Wall, I guess you needn't worry about Laury's takin' Martha to any place where she hadn't orter go."

"Huh! I don't know about that. I b'lieve from what Laury told me herself that she has gone over to Spiritualism and Marthy seems to have a natural bent that way and always did—she don't get it from me nuther."

Mr. Weston helped himself to another piece of johnny-cake but vouchsafed no reply. After eyeing him critically for a minute, his wife continued, "I won't have any Spiritualism brought inter this house while I'm in it, now I tell ye. It's the devil's own doctrine, and if Marthy goes to meddlin' with it, I'll thrash her if she's as big as the side of the house. I won't have any spirits in this house or any such works er goin' on."

Whang! bang!! thump!!!

"What's that?" exclaimed Mrs. Weston, looking about her wildly.

"I dunno—something tumbled down stairs I guess—perhaps it's spirits."

"Spirits!" said Mrs. Weston in a tone of intense scorn. "I should think you'd be ashamed of yourself, Silas Weston. It's that plaguey cat, and I'll have her killed right off."

"Go to the door, Silas, and see who it is?"

Mr. Weston threw open the door—no one there! His wife seeing Mr. Weston's look of surprise, came and looked out.

"I know," she said snappishly, "it's that miserable Dutton boy a cuttin' up capers with us."

"Wall, I guess not, for he has gone to K——, to work in a mill."

"Well, what is it, then?"

"That's just what I want to know," was the curt reply.

"Mother!" called Charley from his bed in the next room, "Mother, something has been rapping on the headboard for a good while."

"Oh, fudge!" said Mrs. Weston, scornfully. "It is a rat in the wall. Don't get scairt over a few raps."

"I'm not afraid—raps never hurt anyone yet, unless they hit him, but they were not in the wall, but upon the headboard, for I felt the bed jar, as well as heard them."

"I will get you a paper—The Coming Conflagration, that came last night and it's got a nice piece in it about the devil and the battle of Armageddon," and Mrs. Weston hurried away. As she entered the kitchen a strange sight greeted her eyes for every chair was turned upside down and the room was filled with a yellowish smoke and a very peculiar odor. In considerable alarm Mrs. Weston righted the furniture and began clearing the table but one after another the various necessary utensils disappeared and she spent the larger part of the forenoon in a vain search for them. There were loud blows upon the walls and floor for which she could find no explanation, and when noon came and brought Mr. Weston, his wife greeted him with genuine joy and excitedly poured into his ears a history of her trials.

"You are sure there was no one around?" asked he, as his wife concluded her story for the second time.

"I know there warn't," was the decided answer, "and what I want to know is, what did do it?"

"I dunno, unless it was spirits."

"I don't b'lieve in spirits," said Mrs. Weston, angrily, "and I won't nuther—it's the devil, that's what 'tis."

"Wall, if you knew who did it, what did you ask me for?"

"The devil is a mighty handy feller to lay things off onter," said a cheery voice at the open door, and Uncle Ezra stepped in. "If a feller is mentally lazy he wants ter keep a pocket devil; 'twill save him all the trouble of searchin' for the truth."

For a moment Mrs. Weston looked at her husband in dismay, then throwing aside her reserve she poured into Uncle Ezra's ears the story of the day's happenings. At the conclusion of her account she demanded sternly, "Now what does it all mean, I wanter know?"

"Wall," said Uncle Ezra, after due deliberation, "I rather guess it means ye're goin' to learn a lesson ye don't wanter."

"Wall, I heard ye say as I come in, that 'twas the devil, and I judged by yer tone that ye would b'lieve it anyway, so I shan't dispute ye," with which remark he followed Mr. Weston out doors where they held a long conversation behind a friendly wood-pile.

"But, why," said Mr. Weston, as they parted, "should such things be done? It looks ter me like goin' inter pretty mean, tricky business."

"Wall," I dunno 'bout that. You know, Silas, better'n I do, that 'twill take a good many hard knocks ter get Sary mellered up. I wouldn't wonder a mite if it went against the grain of them that's cuttin' these capers, but they probbly think that the end to be gained justifies the means and pothin' else could do the work. If Sary Weston ever b'lieves any different than she has done, the new ideas will have ter be pounded inter her."

"Wall, I guess you are right there," laughed Mr. Weston. "Come over again to-morrer, won't ye?"

As night drew near the noises in the old farm house increased. The sounds suggested the idea of tin pails and pans being thrown upon the house roof where they rolled noisily down, falling upon the ground with a clatter. So real did it all seem that both Mr. and Mrs. Weston went out and watched several times. The noises continued, but nothing unusual was seen. There were also sharp whacks as if stones were being thrown violently against the house; something metallic and heavy seemed to be constantly rolling down the chamber stairs, small articles were thrown about the rooms, shadowy forms glided here and there and the house was filled with strange pungent odors.

Mrs. Weston took her Bible from its accustomed place and sat down to read—the light went out, and continued to go out as often as it was lighted provided she tried to read. At last she went to her room and began to pray. She was dead in earnest—there was no mistaking that fact, but the Lord was apparently deaf to her entreaties for the tumult kept on. At last she gave up and went to bed. An hour later she was in a different frame of mind, for when her husband appeared ready for bed she exclaimed vehemently, "Silas Weston, are you goin' ter bed with all this racket goin' on?"

"Wall, I dunno as there's anything I can do about it," was the somewhat testy answer.

"Wall, if I was a man, I'd not go ter bed till I'd hunted 'round—ye haint done anything."

"I haint, have I? I haint chased all around this house three times with a pitchfork, have I? If you think it's folks a doin' it you better get up and catch 'em yourself. I'm tired, and I'm goin' ter sleep, devil or no devil," and he went.

The next day as Mrs. Weston was washing the dinner dishes—as many of them as she could find—she was surprised to see Elder Drake drive into the door yard. While Mr. Weston took care of the horse, Mrs. Weston gathered the best food the house afforded, and placed it upon the table before the elder who had grown older and stouter during the time that had elapsed since he last visited the Westons. There were stern, hard lines around his mouth and his countenance looked more forbidding than ever. As Uncle Ezra told his sister, the Elder had thought and talked so much about the vengeance of the Lord and the awful fate of the ungodly, that his soul was getting quite God-like—judging by appearances. As soon as the Elder had finished his dinner, Mr. Weston came in and the three sat down to visit. After some talk about meetings here and there the Elder asked, "Who is working on your house, Brother Weston."

"Who—what—I—there ain't anybody," stammered Mr. Weston.

"What's all the pounding down suller, then?"

Mr. Weston looked at his wife appealingly, but as she was mute, he answered truthfully, "I don't know."

"What!" said the Elder, sharply; "I should think you'd better find out, then."

"All right," said Mr. Weston, springing to his feet, "you come with me and we will find out if we can," and followed by his guest he disappeared down the cellar stairway. Some time later the two men returned, Mr. Weston flushed and triumphant, the Elder pale and shaky, for Mr. Weston's account of the recent disturbances and the mysterious rappings going on about him had proved too much for the Elder's nerves. He sank helplessly into a chair and sat in silence for some time. At last he asked abruptly, "Where's that boy?"

"He's sick abed and has been for quite a spell," said Mrs. Weston.

"Can't he get up?"

"Where's Marthy?"

"She's gone up North with her Aunt Laury, and I've been tryin' to make Silas write to her and make her come home. The last letter we had from her she had been to a Spiritualist meetin' the night afore and I think that's a smart piece of business for——"

"That's jest it," said the Elder, triumphantly, "that's the cause of all this trouble. It's all the devil's doin's! Marthy has forsaken her God and the faith once delivered to the saints and has gone over to the powers of darkness and joined hands with the devil."

"By thunder!" exclaimed Mr. Weston as he sprang to his feet and confronted the astonished parson, "I will not set still and hear anybody say such a thing as that about Marthy. She's the purest, kindest, best girl that ever was, and I'll not hear one word against her from anybody. As for this devil business, I've thought it all over and I've made up my mind to a few things. In the first place if God made the devil he either made him mortal or immortal. If he made him mortal he would have died long ago unless God preserved his life on purpose to let him cut up, in which case God is as bad as the devil. If God made the devil immortal then he can't kill him and the chances are that some day, if he isn't now, he will be as powerful as God himself."

Mr. Weston paused for breath and his wife burst out: "Silas Weston, if you give up the devil you'll have ter give up the Bible, and God, and everything—they all go together!"

"Wall, I dunno about that; you and I don't know everything, Sarah Weston. Better folks and a deal smarter ones have disagreed over this devil business. But I can't stop to argue, them pertater bugs have gotter be 'tended to," saying which he left the house.

After he had gone the parson got slowly up and extended a hand to Mrs. Weston and said: "I am sorry for you, Sister Weston; I am afraid the Lord has delivered you over to Satan to be tried. Cling fast to your faith and you shall yet sit down with Abram, Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of God."

"Are you goin', Elder?" asked Mrs. Weston tearfully.

"Yes, I feel that I cannot longer remain now. Brother Weston has got entangled in the wiles of the tempter and given heed to seducing spirits. A person who gives up the devil gives up everything, as you said," saying which Elder Drake departed to return no more.

Several days after these events took place Mr. Weston entered the house one afternoon and found his wife sitting in an easy chair with her hands folded helplessly in her lap. Her countenance bore a martyr-like expression, and her whole attitude suggested passive endurance.

"Silas," she called appealingly, "I'm just about tuckered out. I've prayed and prayed, but the Lord don't pay no 'tention to me as I can see. I want Marthy—seems as if I could stand it better if she was here. I shan't say anything to her about Spiritualism if she holds her tongue to me. She can b'lieve what she has a mind ter, I 'spose, but I won't believe it, I can tell ye, and you needn't think I will. I wouldn't b'lieve it if I knew 'twas true."

"Very well," said Mr. Weston, laughing, "I'll write to Marthy now, and send the letter to the office by Uncle Ezry."

It was Martha Weston's last night with her aunt Laura and Mrs. Austin. The white muslin curtains were drawn and the lamp was burning brightly upon the little table in the center of the neat and pleasant sitting-room, and the air was sweet with the odor of many flowers, for Mrs. Austin seemed to possess a peculiar faculty for gathering flowers wherever she went. The three women were sitting up late, and the little country village was quiet and its streets deserted. The monotonous roar of the little river as it fell over the dam where its waters were made to move the machinery of the gristmill and the few shops the town boasted, the occasional yelp of a stray dog, and the buzzing of night-flying insects were the only sounds that broke the stillness of the night. The friends had been for some time wrapped in that congenial silence which testifies to true friendship so much better than words. At last Martha spoke and her tone was low and intensely earnest: "I have done my best, I have done all I know how to do and I can't see why the power does not come to me. I have hoped, and prayed, and waited, and I will not give up. I can almost see the forms I long to see, almost hear the voices I long to hear, but something is lacking—only one little touch I fancy and the line of communication will be established. Oh, how can I ever go back home and endure what I shall have to until I am sure that I can receive communications from our spirit friends. I want to be able to comfort those who have no hope of ever seeing their lost ones again. I want to spread this blessed truth among my fellow-beings. I will not shrink from the way, however hard it may prove, if I can only feel that I am making some lives brighter and better."

As Martha ceased speaking there came three distinct raps upon the wall near her. The light flared up and went out, and there over against the wall appeared a hand of light and it wrote upon the wall in letters of light: "Peace to thee, O troubled spirit. Never count the battle lost. Find this hour thy hour of triumph, and this day thy pentecost."

The hand was gone and a low strain of music broke the stillness of the room. So clear and sweet was it that the listeners felt themselves strangely moved by its power. Louder and clearer and stronger it rose until the whole room seemed to vibrate and thrill with the strange wild melody until it gradually died away in a note of triumph. Several times this was repeated while the listeners sat spell bound. Then Martha suddenly cried out, "The power has come to me—the light has come and I can see. A voice says to me, 'Write.'"

Mrs. Gray hastened to relight the lamp and then found paper and a pencil which she brought and placed in Martha's hands. Instantly the hand of the unconscious girl began to move rapidly over the paper and when at last the pencil rolled from her fingers, Martha looked into the face of her aunt and smiled joyously. Mrs. Gray took the paper to the light and read aloud: "God is love. Love conquers all things. Love is mighty. Strongest he whose love is strongest. Living or dying, here or hereafter the strongest power is love. Therefore keep your soul full of love, the love which is pure and peaceable, and kind, merciful, helpful, and tender to every living creature. With your soul full of love you will be a magnet and draw to yourself all things desirable. Love your fellow-beings with a love that gives no place to jealousy, anger, evil surmising and speaking, no selfish greed for position or gain, then you will be able to help them to higher and better things than they have yet attained; then you will be able to show them the way of living it. Remember that every act of your daily life will testify for or against the cause you advocate. Remember that whatever you sow, that you shall also reap. This is Nature's law and from it there is no possible escape. Never shrink from receiving a truth because it is disagreeable to you—it would not be disagreeable if you did not need it. Do not deceive yourself; you cannot sow discord and reap peace, you cannot sow hatred and reap love, you cannot be harsh and uncharitable and find mercy and tenderness. If you sow seeds of sorrow and trouble you must reap the harvest. Speak not ill of your neighbor and require him to speak good of you—measure for measure shall you receive. Your future destiny lies in your own hands and your choices will determine what it shall be. If you want to find a heaven hereafter make for yourself a heaven here, now. Again I entreat you to be loving and lovable, forgiving and helpful, and kind and just to every living creature. With a pure soul abhor the sin but be merciful unto the sinner. These things I have told you for your own good and the good of many. Be not afraid to speak the truth and always remember love will win."

For several minutes the friends sat in deep thought and then Mrs. Gray, glancing at the clock, said smiling, "We have had our prayer and our sermon, and now before we say good-night I propose we have our hymn." Mrs. Austin arose and went to the organ and soon three clear voices sent forth upon the midnight air a glad triumphant song:

No more I sit in darkness, the light of heaven I see,
The veil is rent asunder, my lost have come to me.
Their love has proved triumphant o'er
death and time and space,
I've heard their voices calling, I've seen them face to face.

In hours of pain and sorrow they bid me nothing fear,
In ev'ry hour of trouble I know that they are near,
My doubts and fears have vanished, exultant now I sing,
O grave where is thy triumph? O death, where is thy sting?

[The End.]

Bethel, Vt. MRS. I. L. LEWIS.

A Prominent Spiritualist Passed to the Realm of Souls.

Suddenly, Jan. 13, 1904, of heart failure, the veteran Spiritualist, Thomas Lees, of 1021 First avenue, Cleveland, Ohio. Brother Lees was born in London, Eng., May 21, 1831. Came to America in 1853, residing for a time in Chicago, and while there married Miss Annie E. Bainbridge; from Chicago he moved to St. Louis, Mo.; from thence to Toledo, Ohio, where he first began to investigate the spiritual philosophy. From Toledo he came to Cleveland where he has resided for nearly forty years. In early life Brother Lees was a member of the Church of England, and until his investigation into the philosophy of Spiritualism was a thorough believer in the creeds of orthodoxy.

About the time Brother Lees came to Cleveland, A. J. Davis came to Cleveland and started what has ever since been known as Children's Spiritual Progressive Lyceum of Cleveland." Its first conductor was a Mr. Jewett, long since passed on. At his retirement, Brother Lees, then one of the foremost workers in the Lyceum, took the conductorship and no more worthy brother has filled that honorable position.

Some time ago Brother Lees and his old friend and co-worker, Mr. Hudson Tuttle made a compact between them that when one of them should pass on, the remaining one should officiate at the funeral of the one gone before, but owing to illness in the family of Mr. Tuttle, and circumstances over which he had no control, Mr. Tuttle could not carry out his part of the compact, so by request of the family, Mr. I. W. Pope, a life-long friend of both parties, officiated in Mr. Tuttle's stead.

In part he said: "Our brother, Thomas Lees, of whom I am to speak, was one of my earliest acquaintances. We have been co-workers in the cause of Spiritualism for nearly forty years. In the early days it cost much socially and financially from a business standpoint to acknowledge and live the beautiful truths of Spiritualism, but to-day we can say of our Brother Lees that he was ever faithful to what appealed to him as truth, and had the strong moral courage to live the best he knew. His pen in hand ever ready to aid in spreading the spiritual work. Our arisen Brother, Thomas Lees, was one of the foremost pillars in the Children's Progressive Spiritual Lyceum and during his years of labor in it between three and four thousand children received their early religious teachings along the lines of Spiritualism, and from that number we have yet to hear of one who has become a criminal or been arrested for any crime. But among them we find poets, philosophers, teachers, artists, doctors, lawyers, and all useful, law-abiding citizens. This history alone is a monument of itself to any man, far more enduring than any of metal or stone. It is true he was assisted by many noble, earnest souls in his work, and while many others have been prominent in the foreground, the systematic guiding hand of Brother Lees could be seen in the background.

"In the earlier days of his work he counted among his friends and assistants, such men as Judge Paine, Judge O. R. Tilden, Judge R. P. Spalding, Hon. J. H. Wade, and many others of prominence.

"Brother Lees was a quiet, unassuming, dignified gentleman, kind and thoughtful toward all. If he was reviled, he reviled not again; his soul was the soul of peace, his life a benediction. He followed the requests of the Nazarene. He visited the sick, aided the needy. He has lifted the spirit in darkness to the light and to eternal truth. He has pronounced the blessings upon the marriage vow. He has pronounced the benediction at the grave of loved ones, and left the sorrowing with the consolation of a greater truth on earth, no death but life eternal. He has christened the babies with the eternal spirit of love. He has ordained many servants of the gospel of love and truth. His influence has been like the rays of the sun, dispelling the clouds and warming the hearts of mankind.

"He was one of nature's students, studying her laws from all standpoints, the physical as well as the spiritual. The slow process of Mother Earth and the grave were revolting to his sensitive nature, so he chose the retort rather than the grave.

"Such has been the life of our arisen brother, his influence has gone out in loving kindness to all mankind as the perfume from the beautiful flowers which cover his casket, and may still be felt by all who may seek."

As the clouds lifted, the soft, gentle rays of the setting sun crept in through the windows of the little chapel and rested on the face of the tenantless clay. The speaker closed by reading a poem entitled "The Release," the last verse of which is as follows:

"For me the present thought is that I live;
And whatsoe'er the future hath to give
I will accept with thankful, trusting heart,
Asking but this: That I may still bear part
In deeds of love to thwart each human ill—
Of earth's great family be a member still!"

SPIRIT MESSAGE.

In 1870 the writer lived at Glen Easton, and as he and his two little boys were on their way to a literary society at Fork Ridge, they saw a wonderful phenomenon, i. e., a literal cross on the full moon, expanding in all four directions to the hill tops coving the whole of the horizon.

Some time later the writer visited a prominent citizen of Moundsville, Mr. L., who wife was a medium, but the visit was in no way connected with Spiritualism, and while talking to said medium the writer related to her the wonderful phenomenon he saw on the moon, when he was very suddenly interrupted by an Indian guide, who said, "Can you remember where you were when you first saw the cross on the moon?" to which I answered yes, when he proceeded to describe the rail fence alongside the road, the pasture field inside, the ravine at the east side of the field, the old rotten log lying across the ravine, not far from the log an upright stone projecting two feet above the ground, and so many paces from the stone to the east, the Indians buried a rich treasure in the times prior to abandoning Virginia to the white man. When the control departed I told Mrs. L. what had happened and we finally agreed to go confidentially and locate the treasure. On the following Sunday I took with me my oldest son and we went to the spot above described and found everything tallied with the description given by the Indian, even to the diameter of the rotten log, and honest like, I went and reported to Mrs. L. what I had found and was about ready to propose when we both would visit the place, when to my utter astonishment the medium laughed in my face and called me a fool for so easily believing what an Indian would tell, so with much disgust I dropped the matter.

Later on I moved to Wheeling, and Mrs. L. with her family moved into the neighborhood of the treasure, having rented a small piece of land to serve as a blind, the following year the same family moved to California. I always imagined it looked very much like the medium had got the treasure. Thirty-two years later, on the 28th of December, 1903, the spirit of Mrs. L. came to me and said she had departed this life just seven hours previous, and had come to confess to me that she had defrauded me, and that the treasure was not near as large as she had expected, being only $3,000 in gold and silver. I asked her what made her do so treacherous an act. She answered, "My husband said I would be a fool if I did not keep it all." I then asked her why she came to confess and she answered that she was unhappy because my spirit friends accused her on her arrival and called her a fraud, having cheated their father out of the treasure. I asked who brought her to me and she answered, the spirit of Mr. H., who was a prominent business man in Wheeling for sixty years, he having told her she must go to the one she had cheated and make the confession with all speed.

This narrative of facts can be verified. S. HARTMAN.

A Noted Case in Court. — The Transfiguration of Jesus, and His Seance with Moses and Elias, Were Not Historical Facts.

"God hath chosen things that are not to bring to naught things that are."—I. Corinthians, 1:28.

The divine method for evangelizing mankind, as set forth in the above text, appears to have been satisfactory to Paul and early Christianity, but is not adapted to the civilization of the twentieth century. Thinkers to-day rely upon truth—things that are, and repudiate as evidence things that are not.

I propose in this article to expose a leading falsehood which has long been treated as fact, and has been employed with prodigal liberality by our teachers, in advocacy of Spiritualism. I refer to the alleged transfiguration of Christ and his interview with Moses and Elias in the presence of Peter, James and John.

The story is told by the writers, respectively, of the books accredited to Matthew, Mark, and Luke, and briefly stated, is as follows:

One day Jesus took with him Peter, James and John, to a mountain, and there was transfigured before them (whatever that may mean) and Moses who had been dead and buried about fourteen hundred and fifty years, and Elias, who about six hundred years previously had disappeared in a chariot of fire, came and talked with him in the presence of those witnesses.

Those writers do not agree upon all details but in substance there is uniformity in their statements.

Before proceeding to an examination of the story, it is proper and just to state that modern research tends to show that none of the biographies of Jesus were written until from one to two centuries after his death, and probably not until a much later date. I premise further that none of them are signed by the names they bear, and each has the caption, "The gospel according to" [not by] Matthew, etc. I understand this word "according" to mean: A relation of events in accordance with their respective statements. I premise also the well known snow ball tendencies of aggregation and enlargement, by all stories that are rolled down through several generations; and finally that during the first centuries of Christianity men in general were both ignorant and credulous.

I seek no advantage from the tendency of modern thought to assign Jesus and his disciples to the realm of fiction, but for the purposes of this argument will assume that Jesus, Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Peter, James and Paul were historical characters. I will assume further that they were all honest, sincere men, that each portion of the Bible was written by the men whose names they bear, and that each believed he wrote nothing untruthful.

The case is now ready for trial. We will therefore organize a court. Editor Francis shall preside. We will have no lawyers to badger witnesses and make the worst appear the better reason, but will allow the court itself to conduct the examination.

THE WITNESS MATTHEW IS CALLED.

Question.—Please state whether or not you were acquainted with Jesus of Nazareth?

Answer.—I was well acquainted with him and was one of his twelve disciples.

Q.—State whether or not you were present at an interview between Jesus, Moses and Elias, mentioned in your Gospel?

A.—I was not.

Q.—Who if any persons were present on that occasion?

A.—Peter, James and John. I so stated in my narration.

Q.—Have you in your book stated that either Peter, James or John told you about that event?

A.—I have not.

Q.—From whom did you obtain the information you mentioned regarding that event?

No answer.

MARK IS CALLED.

Question.—Are you or not the author of the New Testament book that bears your name?

Answer.—I am.

Q.—Were you one of the twelve disciples?

A.—I was not. I was converted to Christianity after the death of Jesus.

Q.—Have you any knowledge—personal knowledge—regarding an interview between Jesus, Moses and Elias, mentioned in your book?

A.—I have not. I know nothing about it personally.

Q.—From whom did you obtain the story?

No answer.

LUKE CALLED.

Question.—State what, if anything, you know about the life and acts of Jesus of Nazareth?

Answer.—I know nothing about them personally. I was not one of his disciples, but became a Christian after his death.

Q.—From whom did you obtain the story mentioned in your book regarding a seance before Peter, James and John, at which Moses and Elias were materialized?

No answer.

JOHN CALLED.

Q.—State your connection with the life of Jesus of Nazareth,

Q.—Did you write a biography of him?

A.—I did, a very elaborate one.

Q.—State whether in that biography you made any mention of being called with Peter and James to a mountain and there witnessing a seance between Jesus and Moses and Elias.

A.—My biography makes no mention of any such event.

Q.—How many books of the New Testament did you write?

A.—Five.

Q.—In all those books is there any statement whatever regarding that story?

A.—There is none.

PETER CALLED.

Question.—State your connection with the life and acts of Jesus, and the number of books written by you?

Answer.—I was a leading disciple and wrote two of those books.

Q.—State what part, if any, was taken by you aside from your writings regarding the spread of Christianity?

Q.—Have any of your speeches or sermons been preserved?

A.—Several of them were reported and are found in the book called "Acts of the Apostles."

Q.—State whether or not in those writings and speeches any mention is made of a seance between Jesus, Moses and Elias, in your presence?

A.—There is none whatever. Some people have imagined that I referred to that event in the 17th and 18th verses of the first chapter of my second epistle, but that is an error. I wrote in those verses about a voice I, with others, heard from heaven, but nothing about Moses and Elias.

JAMES CALLED.

Question.—State your connection with the life and works of Jesus?

Answer.—I was one of the twelve disciples and an ardent follower. I wrote one book of the New Testament.

Q.—In that book did you make any mention of being called with Peter and John and witnessing an interview with Moses and Elias?

A.—I did not!

PAUL CALLED.

Question.—How many books of the New Testament did you write?

A.—Fourteen?

Q.—State whether or not you were acquainted with the disciples of Jesus of Nazareth?

A.—I was well acquainted with them. I met them at a general council in Jerusalem, and lived with them a "long time" at Antioch (Acts 14:28).

Q.—Have any of your productions in favor of Christianity, aside your fourteen books, been preserved?

Q.—In all those books and speeches is there mention made of a seance between Jesus and Moses and Elias?

A.—There is none.

JUDE CALLED.

Question.—Did you, or not not, write one of the books of the New Testament?

Answer.—I did.

Q.—Is there any reference made in that book of yours, to a meeting on a mountain between Jesus, Moses and Elias?

A.—There is none.

JUDGE FRANCIS' CHARGE.

The jury in this case consists of the readers of The Progressive Thinker. To all such I say:

Ladies and Gentlemen:— The transfiguration and interview with Moses and Elias in the presence of three witnesses, if founded in fact, is one of the leading events in man's history, a landmark of time, toward which all eyes should be turned with gladness unmingled, and all hearts throb with satisfaction and joy. Up to that date our race had groped in darkness along the line of existence, sometimes dazzled by hope—which is a combination of desire and expectation, and sometimes lost in the Sarbonian bog of doubt and apprehension. Thus generation succeeded generation, age followed age, but the lights and shadows continued in alternative activity. Man possessed no prior knowledge that he should live after his body was laid away in the cemetery.

But if Moses and Elijah who had been dead many hundred years, were still living, others must live also who have passed through the experience called death, and in the absence of negative testimony, the proof became absolute that a future life is the destiny of all.

This interview, however, established another most important fact, namely, that under favorable circumstances, discarnate man can visit men incarnate and converse with them. It establishes still another fact, discarnate man can appear in a body that is real, tangible and apparently permanent? A materialized body resembling the one he occupied on earth, so closely that he can be recognized.

This was the first materialization mentioned in authentic history. Possibly the experience of Jesus himself may be an exception, but that is in dispute. Nothing in Modern Spiritualism can parallel that event. Here, in presumably daylight, were recognized two men long since dead, and so real and tangible were they, and so plainly did they converse that one witness, Peter, believed they had come to stay permanently, and proposed to build residences for them. Certainly no other event in the life of Jesus equals it in importance.

Now to establish the reality of any event the rule of law is, the best testimony procurable must be introduced and ordinarily no other will be received, and even when admitted through inadvertance or otherwise, little if any consideration is given it. This has been the rule and practice since Alfred, in all civilized courts even when the matter in dispute has no more than a nickel of value.

In the case under consideration I can find no reason for relaxing this rule, but many for enforcing it.

The statements of Matthew, Mark and Luke are clearly what is termed in law "hearsay" in all particulars. They have not the merit even of second-hand evidence, for none of them claim to have heard the story from either of the real witnesses, Peter, James or John. They were doubtless honest men, and told the story as they heard it, but their informants are unknown.

Now where shall we look for the best testimony procurable, and thereby observe the rule of evidence I have stated? Manifestly to Peter, James and John. They were the witnesses especially chosen to be such; and so far as alleged were the only persons who saw it. I charge, therefore, that those three men who were easily procurable, were the only persons on earth by whom the story can be proven truthful.

Peter, James and John have appeared, but upon this subject are as silent as mummies in an Egyptian crypt. They wrote eight books of the Bible, but in them all not a word of this interview can be found. Peter and James also made speeches that are preserved, but they contain nothing upon the question. Paul wrote fourteen books and was on intimate terms with the disciples, but apparently never heard of the event. He believed in a future life and cited the resurrection of Christ in proof of its existence. Had he known of this appearance of Moses and Elias he was too good a logician to omit all reference to it, for that would go farther than a score of resurrections to establish the reality of a life beyond the grave. The resurrection of one man and he a God, proves nothing with regard to all mankind.

Jude wrote also but says nothing.

You will consider carefully the testimony of John, the beloved disciple, the successor of Jesus as son to Mary, the most intimate friend and admirer Jesus had. Can you for a moment believe that if he had witnessed that wonderful transaction—the most far-reaching and startling occurrence of his life-time, he would not have mentioned it? So painstaking was he in his history that he mentioned the crowing of a chicken (John 18:27). I would as soon believe that Napoleon could have written a history of his wars and omitted the mention of Austerlitz. Why, the idea is absolutely preposterous.

Every witness of the New Testament has given his testimony, and none of them, except Matthew, Mark and Luke, has said a word in favor of the truthfulness of the story. All rests, therefore, upon the hearsay statements of those persons.

I charge that all the circumstances considered, the silence of Peter, James and John upon this subject, is tantamount to and the legal equivalent of, a denial, which is rendered doubly forcible by the silence of Paul, and the added fact that the phenomenon has never been duplicated either by ancient or modern manifestations.

Mr. Editor, I believe my undertaking has been fully accomplished. Let me hope that the practice of citing falsehoods on behalf of Spiritualism may cease. We can always rely on truth, for that is intellectual wealth, and is found in abundance among our own mediums. There is no necessity for poring over ancient writings to prove that spirits commune with men. The old can give little, if any, light at all. Why, a man can learn more of Spiritualism in one hour, with a medium of 1904, than is possible in a lifetime among the myths and traditions of barbarians living in the olden time.

IOWA.

Annual Convention of Iowa State Spiritualists Association.

The third annual convention at Clear Lake, Iowa, was called to order at 10:30 a. m., Jan. 21, 1904 by the president, John D. Vail, of Marshalltown.

There was a fair attendance for first day. After the usual forms of opening the convention, the president appointed the following committees, viz., on credentials, on finance, on resolutions, on president's report.

After a few remarks by Bro. Moses Hull, Mattie Hull, Will J. Erwood and others, the convention adjourned until 2 o'clock p. m.

After opening exercises in the afternoon, President John D. Vail read his report, which was full of the past year's work, and many recommendations for the future work.

The report tells of over 200 meetings being held, under the auspices of the state association during the year, at an outlay to the state association of less than $25 for speakers and mediums, and that there were six local societies organized to which charters were given, and two local societies that had not received their charters yet, making a total of eleven chartered societies and three without charters.

President Vail reported an increased interest in Spiritualism and also in organization, many now were in favor of organization who a few years ago, were opposed to it.

President Vail also reported favorably on the circuit plan of work, which was recommended by him at the last annual convention, and asked for permission to give the plan a trial, which he did in two instances, one of which was a complete success; the other failed in a measure for the reason that the local societies which were selected would not guarantee the amount necessary regularly, but thinks that the local societies will become more in harmony with the plan, if persisted in for a few years, and it will grow in favor the longer it is used, but it has to be managed by one capable and willing to accept many rebuffs, many discouragements, but if the plan is once adopted by a few local societies, it will not be abandoned until the local is able to keep a speaker all the time.

President Vail reported that since the first year there had virtually been no subscriptions to the state association. That the first year a private subscription was given in monthly payments, amounting to nearly if not quite $500. The second year did not exceed $60 and the third year $40, and that this convention must raise as large an amount as they did the first year or no work could be expected. Hence, on Friday, under the head, "Good of the Association," President Vail secured seven subscriptions of $60 each to be paid monthly, besides several other smaller subscriptions to be paid monthly, amounting in all to over $500. This amount is to be used entirely in missionary work, in pushing the work into new fields and strengthening the old societies. The largest portion of the previous subscriptions have been expended in sending delegates to the N. S. A. convention. Hereafter the delegate will be required to pay his or her own expenses or it will have to be paid by the N. S. A., as the convention voted against the paying of deogates expenses.

Recommendations of the president, which were adopted, were as follows:

1. That towns or cities where the local society was able to do so, that they employ a regular speaker and have meetings twice every Sunday.

2. If not able to keep a speaker continually, that they apply to the state secretary to be placed on a circuit and agree to pay $15 per week for speaker and entertainment, the speaker to give two lectures on Sunday and one during the week.

3. That home circles be maintained in every family.

4. That lyceums should be organized and recommended them to write to John W. Ring for his paper and rules, etc.

5. That every society organize a choir, and always have music and singing.

6. That in the organization of a local society it be done under strict rules and usages; that it is better to have 10 members who feel their responsibility, than 50 who do not have any.

7. That a manager of speakers and the circuit work be secured if possible, one who can speak and do good test work in the field until they can build up a circuit for a speaker. Then place one on that circuit and they will go and work up another, etc.

8. That the secretary be paid a small salary. The convention voted to pay the secretary for actual time and expenses.

9. That the Morris Pratt School was worthy of our support and ought to be better supported. The convention passed a resolution, That the State Spiritualist Association of Iowa will not ordain any one who has not first obtained either a certificate or diploma showing them to be equipped for such work, from the Morris Pratt School faculty, or from some other institution of learning, of like character. The certificate or diploma must show that said candidate is prepared to logically address and use good language in their work in such a manner that the educated public will not be shocked to hear them.

10. The president's recommendation to assist the magnetic healers' association to get a law passed for their protection, was laid on the table.

11. The president recommended that ladies auxiliaries to the local societies be organized, even before the local society of the place is in shape to work.

12. That the per capita tax be increased, which was laid on the table.

The committee on resolutions reported the following which were passed without opposition:

Your committee, to whom was entrusted the work of forming and presenting a series of resolutions expressing our opinions on the issues of the day, our determinations, as a State Spiritualist Association, has tried to do its duty, and submits the following as the result of its deliberations:

1. Resolved, That fully believing in the loyalty to Spiritualism; and the intelligence and the integrity of the National Association of Spiritualists of America, we fully endorse its efforts to properly present Spiritualism before the world, and that even though some of us may not endorse all of its methods, we fully believe in and second its every movement.

2. Resolved, That while we do not think forms and ceremonies the most essential parts of Spiritualism, we believe that a modest system of usages would unify and otherwise improve our work; especially would we recommend the adoption of a general form of admission of members into our societies and churches; of services for those who have passed away; of christening or dedication of our children; of the ordination, or setting apart of our public workers, and of marriage and other such ceremonies as usually devolve on the clergy.

3. Resolved, That we, the Spiritualists of Iowa, are thoroughly tired of ignorant platitudes on our platforms; that we see the necessity of an education of our workers which will at least make them the peers of the average lawyers, doctors and ministers.

4. Resolved, That for the purpose of carrying out this systematic education of our workers, we endorse, recommend and assist with our influence and means the Morris Pratt School, located at Whitewater, Wis.

5. Resolved, That as we regard our religion as the best with which we are acquainted, it is our duty to live it, and to teach it to our children; and, that we therefore urge that wherever a half-dozen or more of our children can be assembled together and interested, we should establish Sunday-schools after the general system of what is commonly called the children's progressive lyceums.

6. Resolved, That as vaccination is a filthy, disease-breeding and health-destroying operation, and, perhaps, no preventative of small-pox, we are utterly opposed to all laws compelling an otherwise free people to submit to having matter from dead or diseased men and animals injected into their persons.

7. Resolved, That as civilized people do not kill each other, either legally or illegally, and that as we fondly hope we are approaching civilization, we are opposed to the system of legalized murder called capital punishment.

8. Resolved, That war is only murder, arson and plunder on a large scale, and as it always results in the triumph of might, and never in the triumph of right only when it happens that right is on the side of might, and that as national difficulties generally have to be settled by compromise even at the close of war, and that as differences can be settled as well by arbitration before war as after, we regard war as murder on an immense scale and much worse than individual murder, as nations are larger and more important than individuals.

9. Resolved, That the armies of the nations should be converted into armies for producing what nations and individuals need, and that the navies should be used to transport useful and needful articles as needed.

10. Resolved, That as the present rules adopted by the N. S. A. in regard to proxies are generally unsatisfactory, and tend to promote dissatisfaction, and, in many instances discord, we are absolutely opposed to any kind of proxy system.

11. Resolved, That the thanks of this convention are due, and are hereby tendered to the railroads and the hotels for courtesies extended; to the newspapers which have advertised and noticed these meetings; to the Clear Lake Spiritualist Society for the many favors and courtesies extended, and to the officers of this association for the efficient and impartial manner in which they have done their duties.

Respectfully submitted,

MOSES HULL,
W. A. WILLING,
MRS. E. L. KIRK.

Officers elected: John D. Vail, president, Marshalltown; J. N. Randall, vice-president, Ottumwa; Dora C. Crosby, secretary, DesMoines; W. T. Hamilton, treasurer, Wellman.

Trustees: Mrs. Jennie V. Shaffer, Ottumwa; Mrs. Tenna Lovell, Union; Mr. E. H. Vandenburg, Clear Lake; Mr. W. A. Willing, Northwood; Mr. J. R. Robinson, Otranto.

Delegates to the N. S. A., 1904: John D. Vail, Marshalltown; J. N. Randall, Ottumwa; W. A. Willing, Northwood. Alternates: Alma Hauser, Liscomb; Dora C. Crosby, DesMoines; Mrs. A. H. Gale, Mason City.

There was much educational work done by lectures and tests. Lectures by Will J. Erwood, Moses Hull and Mattie Hull; tests by Mrs. Eva McCoy and Will J. Erwood.

The annual meeting closed on Sunday evening at 10 o'clock in peace and harmony, it being the most beneficial annual meeting ever held in Iowa, and the most harmonious. If we are not mistaken the cause of Spiritualism has been greatly benefited and raised to a higher plane in Iowa.

JOHN D. VAIL, President.

Additional Report by Moses Hull.

The third annual convention of the Iowa State Association of Spiritualists was held at Clear Lake, in the northern part of the state, Jan. 21-24, inclusive. It might be said that the meetings began on the 20th, as there was a public reception at the Elks Hotel on the evening of that day. The reception was an enjoyable affair. Besides the entertainment given by the little folks and some of the older ones, encouraging speeches were made by Mrs. Hull, Rev. Will J. Erwood, President John D. Vail, Mr. Randal, who is now vice-president of the association, myself, and others.

The weather was against us from first to last; I do not think the mercury got up as high as zero once during the whole convention. At one time the government thermometer registered as low as 34 below zero. The result was that the attendance was not so large from different parts of the state, nor from the city as it would have been under other circumstances, but bees were never more industrious nor more cooperative than were the delegates assembled. As for the citizens, those that could of them came and enjoyed the evening sessions.

I never attended a convention of more intelligent nor of more harmonious workers. The evening and Sunday speeches were made by Rev. Will J. Erwood, Mrs. Hull and myself, and were all well received by the audiences. Tests and readings were given by W. J. Erwood and Mrs. Eva McCoy, of Marshalltown, Iowa.

As a medium or speaker, Mr. Erwood needs no word of commendation from me. He is well and favorably known throughout the West. Mr. Erwood is not only an excellent speaker and medium, but he cannot be excelled as an all-around worker. As secretary of the Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association he has won golden opinions.

As for Mrs. McCoy, of Marshalltown, she was a good medium when I first met her, one year since; but when I saw her at the Waukesha, Wis., camp-meeting, she had greatly improved. Since that her improvement has been marvelous. If she continues to improve during the curent year as she has in the past, she will be the equal of any medium in America. Besides that her life has been such that everybody believes in her integrity and honor. She is "not without honor" even "in her own country"—the town and country where she was born and still lives.

The president in his report, argued that the only way for Spiritualism to rid itself of fraudulent mediums and other barnacles, was by a thorough and close organization.

The president had made an effort to establish the circuit plan of propaganda, which had been only partially successful. The plan was not easily inaugurated on account of the tardiness, and in some instances the failure of certain societies to co-operate. They had, however, employed several speakers, prominent among the missionaries employed was Jennie Hagan-Brown, who did her work well; collected money enough to pay herself and to place quite a sum of money in the treasury.

George H. Brooks, Harry J. Moore, George W. Kates and wife, and other speakers had done good and efficient work in the state.

During the year several new societies had been organized and obtained charters; others were now ready to send in their applications for charters.

The association had, during the year issued missionary certificates to George H. Brooks, T. W. Woodrow, Jennie Hagan-Brown, and J. P. Johnson. And mediums' certificates to Mrs. Eva McCoy and Mrs. Rena Hoeck.

On organization he recommended about the same as was recommended by the N. S. A. The report contained pointed words on the persecution of mediums and healers in this state. It was urged that Spiritualist speakers should atend more closely to Spiritualism in their administrations, and let side issues—issues on which we are liable to differ, take care of themselves.

In conclusion the president urged the local organizations of societies and lyceums wherever practical. He also urged more harmony and a more thorough consecration to the cause; more philanthropy and more practical charity.

All in all this was a grand convention, and all went away with renewed courage, and more than ever determined to do a co-operative work for the good of the cause.

MOSES HULL.

SEND ME FLOWERS WHILE I'M LIVING.

Send me flowers while I'm living,
Nature's choicest sweet perfume,
That I may sense their mode of giving,
From Mother Earth their charmed exhume,
Do not wait until this mortal
Shall have passed from earthly view;
When my spirit's passed the portal
I'll not need them then, 'tis true.

Send me flowers while I'm living,
Place them not upon my bier,
Do not wait until that sad time
To remember friendship dear.
Give me now some sweetest token
Of your kindly love for me,
That I may know of ties unbroken,
Ere I pass the mystic sea.

Send your gentle, loving sweet-thoughts,
Let them vibrate soul to soul—
Let me grasp those heart vibrations
Springing from the living goal.
These enrich my mental being,
Bring mortal blessings yet untold,
Send them now while I am seeking
My mental vision to unfold.

When I've passed into sweet dreamland,
When my spirit's fled away,
When I've reached the heights immortal,
When I've left this earthly clay
Send the flowers of your heart-thoughts
Out to me—I'll grasp their theme,
And return those kindly tokens
Of life immortal which we dream.

BY THE WINDOW.

I was sitting by the window,
The sky was all agleam
With the lovely glow of splendor
That ofttimes glints a dream;
The glorious hand of an angel
Flung heaven's gateway wide;
And I caught the dome of wonder
From a glimpse on the other side.

I knew when I sat there thinking
Of those I loved the best,
A freed soul passed the portal
For a long and longed-for rest;
Passed through the pearly archway
To that land where flowers enfold;
Passed into bliss immortal,
No longer to be old.

Oh, joy! when sunrise opens,
And the light it does inclose,
Will lead me through the portal
To a glad and sweet repose;
I know that I shall find him
In that world so pure and fair,
My own beloved darling
With a kiss on the ambient air.

Days of grief forever ended,
Freed from woes and bitter ills
To wander 'mid the sunbeams
That deck the Emerald hills;
I feel each soul remembers
And whisper oft the same old words
It whispered long ago.

A Drop of Blood

Taken from a person who has for a few months used Vernal Palmettona (formerly known as Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine) is pure and free from taint.

We say a few months, because it takes time to overcome the effect of years of careless living in the matter of diet, sleep and dissipation. This great one dose a day remedy gives quick relief from indigestion, constipation, dyspepsia, headache and all kinds of kidney, liver and stomach trouble, but as the impurities entered the system slowly, so they must be gotten rid of.

Poisons and disease germs creep into the blood through the retention of impure waste matter in the stomach and bowels and through inactive kidneys and a lazy liver. Vernal Palmettona gives gentle aid to the weakened digestive organs. Gradually they gain strength and are finally able to perform their natural functions without any help. When this stage is reached, use a little judgment in what you eat and drink and you will have no more trouble. You'll be able to do twice as much work as before, whether it is done with your hands or brain.

Perhaps you have read this kind of talk before and have found the remedy talked about to be a flat failure in your case. If so, you are prejudiced. Knowing that such a prejudice often exists, we give every one a chance to try Vernal Palmettona before they buy. It is on sale at all leading drug stores, but you can try it free of expense. Write us for a free sample bottle to-day. It will be promptly sent postpaid. If it does you good, it is easy to step into a drug store and get a full size bottle. The druggist will not try to sell you something else. If he does he is an exception, for druggists know that Vernal Palmettona is the best remedy of its kind in existence. ECHOES OF THE SYMPOSIUM

LYMAN C. HOWE. MRS. FLORENCE HUNTLEY.

The Great Psychological Crime

A Comparison of Views and the Reasons Therefor.

Lyman C. Howe, the veteran Spiritualist Lecturer and Medium, a man well and favorably known as one of the foremost thinkers and writers in our ranks, will Champion the Cause of Truth as reflected in Spiritualism, while Mrs Florence Huntley, the well-known Author and Journalist, will defend all the statements in The Great Psychological Crime, which Mr. Howe will dare to assail, making a series of articles instructive, suggestive and inspiring, and which every Spiritualist should most carefully read.

Mrs Florence Huntley:—

My Dear Instructor:—Your last letter was anticipated and answered before it was written! But a few points were overlooked, for I sensed the proposition to limit our correspondence to one or two columns somewhere on its way to my consciousness. Still I may trespass a little more, if I find the case demands it. You very kindly help me out by leaving some points in question to our readers to settle, and I am agreed to all you say on that point. Neither do I challenge any of the witnesses you have put on the stand. I accept your word for all you relate of those ugly experiences. But they do not change my view at all. In fact, though mediums have not taken me into their confidence, and rehearsed to me in detail their darkest pages and most secret sorrows, I have known something of their complaints of the mischievous, lying, meddlesome, and annoying pranks of certain Diakka who are permitted to torment their victims. I have heard some accounts of trials which appeared like genuine cases of obsession, apparently by evil disposed, and even malicious spirits, who delight in human misery.

That such spirits exist, and, for a period, longer or shorter, indulge their perverted instincts, and abuse negative sensitives, who have not yet developed the superior conditions of mediumship, I do not dispute. I think nearly all Spiritualists believe in such wicked meddlers, and pity their victims. It is also quite likely that many dark deeds and sad experiences, never come to the knowledge of even confidential friends. The same may be said of thousands of families who have "skeletons in the closet," and live in the world with the sanction of law, and Christian approval, where "holy matrimony" ordains the authority that murders love, prostitutes helpless sensitive woman, and covers conditions that would cause all good people to shudder with horror, if the veil were lifted and facts laid bare. But this does not prove that love is an evil and matrimony a blight upon the civilization of the world; nor that all married people abuse themselves and their privileges, and that marriage is an unmitigated evil.

The testimony of your witnesses who have suffered in silence reminds me of a witness in the long ago, who said: "Come and see the man who told me all I ever did." But the prophet had only told her a very few of all her life-acts and experiences. They tell you that the "Book is true from beginning to end, and that they have proven it." Have they proven that a hypnotized subject remains a victim after the death of the body, and that both the subject and the operator are bound by a fatal tie that neither can break without the consent and co-operation of the other? and that even then it sometimes requires years of struggle before they can free themselves from the bondage created by a hypnotic experience that both may have forgotten? Have they proven that the average life of mediums is but a fraction over seven years?

Have they proven that mediumship in all of its phases, and in every degree of development, progressively paralyzes the brain, and destroys the intellect?

It seems to me that these witnesses have proven but a very small part of the statements contained in the book. So far as it appears from your account of their experiences, they do not even prove that mediumship is destructive in its essential nature and influence, or that there is any destructive process that even approximately destroys the individual life of any human soul.

You still insist that I do not correctly represent the author's meaning as to what science knows of ultimates. It seems to me you must have failed to grasp and analyze my expressions. I do not insist that he dogmatizes on the ULTIMATE DESTINY OF THE HUMAN SOUL. Neither do I. But he talks of ULTIMATES, as if he did "contemplate" that THERE ARE ULTIMATES, and that science is after them with all the means within its reach; and that it has traced the individual life into. If not beyond, the "second death." This is even further than my suggestion as to the ultimate bearings of the temporary factors in the evolution of individuality.

The repeated expression, "So far as science knows," indicates that science does know something, and then what follows; "Total individual extinction," is manifestly "contemplated" by the author as the probable ULTIMATE OF THE HUMAN SOUL. I do not see that my interpretation of the author's language is in any way disturbed by your latest exegesis. Eternity, immortality, ultimate destiny, and the totality of all things, seem to be out of the reach of science, and all human knowledge; and so far as I can see must forever remain so. But when we look over a period of a million years and find the testimony of nature invariably sustaining one consistent relation of cause and effect, and a continuous advancement of individualization, as the most definite expression of progress, and such individualization steadily rising from the mechanisms of physical nature, to the orderly expression of intellect, and moral and spiritual consciousness, it seems decidedly probable that the next million years will continue the same order, and advance along similar lines, towards the same conclusions. If this order continues forever, we must infer that the ultimate, though never to be reached, since there is no end to eternity, must be if it were possible to be obtained, in the same direction that all the antecedents of the ages have continuously pointed.

In one of the quotations you make, the author says: "The exact and scientific significance or meaning of this spiritual or second death IS NOT YET KNOWN WITH ABSOLUTE CERTAINTY." Now this and other quotations show that the author holds that SCIENCE DOES KNOW that this SPIRITUAL OR SECOND DEATH is a reality; that it does occur; and it seems to me his language clearly indicates that science knows that this spiritual death is complete extinction of the individual life. But the inference seems to be that possibly there may be something still left over that may sometime and somewhere, rise again, and continue the original process of individual evolution in progressive immortality.

If the author means to be understood that science is not quite sure that there is any such SPIRITUAL OR SECOND DEATH, I shall be glad to be corrected, and rejoice that it "has turned out" that, after all, the "Destructive principle of nature in individual life" may be limited, and not a fundamental and eternal reality. That science after all DOES NOT KNOW that it reaches the ultimate destiny of the soul. Then there is hope for us poor sinners who have trusted in the righteousness of nature and the blessings of mediumship.

Nevertheless, if this destructive principle, has continuously acted in ONE WAY in all that is known of human life and individual evolution, and that way downward toward spiritual death, and has got out of the reach of science only by GETTING BEYOND THE SECOND DEATH, and total individual extinction, I would rather be on the "SAFE SIDE," and not get into "the last ditch," to take my chances of picking myself out of the mysterious depths of INFINITE NOTHING, and without help building an individuality that may defy the agents of destruction, and live on forever.

You claim that "It is a similar HYPOTHESIS" to that presented by the author, upon which I base my conclusion that there is no such thing as a "destructive principle of nature in individual life." And again you say, as to my denial of the destructive principle, etc., "You base this conclusion upon the HYPOTHESIS or theory, that there is no such thing as ULTIMATE destruction of individual life."

This is a radical mistake. It is true that in my first denial, I spoke of life and death as factors in a common process of evolution. I referred to the "ultimate bearings of these factors" as all tending in one direction, but I did not predicate this upon any HYPOTHESIS of the ultimate of the soul. In a later letter I undertook to show that in your illustrations of the "destructive process of nature in individual life," there was no indication that any harm had happened to the spiritual individual. All of the destructive processes referred to were simply and only DESTRUCTION OF PHYSICAL ENVIRONMENTS that had become OBSTRUCTIVE to individual advancement, and nature employed her destructive agencies AGAINST THESE OBSTRUCTIONS, and NOT AGAINST THE INDIVIDUAL LIFE AT ALL. The destruction was to PROTECT, CONSERVE, AND ASSIST THE INDIVIDUAL LIFE in its continuous course of PROGRESSIVE EVOLUTION. It required no hypothesis or theory, of the ULTIMATE DESTINY OF THE SOUL. It had reference to the IMMEDIATE, PRESENT, effect upon the individual life. If there is no evidence that the destruction of physical environments, ultimating in death of the body, is destructive to the individual life, there is no need of any HYPOTHESIS of the ultimate destiny of the soul to impeach the testimony of the book. Since in this life the destructive principle seems to act as a help to the development of individual life, by removing obstacles in its way, it would seem probable that the same is true of the individual after the death of the body, and that all of the destruction that "science knows" is in the interest of the soul, to assist it in clearing the way for its own advancement, and this WITHOUT ANY REFERENCE TO ULTIMATES.

It is true that I have a theory, or belief, that all human souls are immortal; but I do not predicate my reasoning, or argument upon that, or any other theory, but upon PROVEN FACTS. The author declares that it is a scientific demonstration that death does not change the individual life. Then all of the destructive processes that ultimate in physical dissolution, must be counted out. They are natural, inevitable, and conservative of the individual life. If that life is a continuation of this as the author teaches, it seems to me the same law holds good all along the line. This is no HYPOTHESIS, or theory, having no proof behind it. It is a statement of FACTS, as attested by the author of the book and the "School of science." Until some new light is thrown upon these facts, my claim that IT HAS TURNED OUT that there is no such principle in nature as the author represents, holds good.

I must omit several important points in your very interesting letter, and recall them at another time. I want to offer more testimony. It should be borne in mind by readers that I endeavor to accept the author's definitions, as far as he has given them, and that his definition of mediumship covers three specifications. "CONTROL of the WILL, VOLUNTARY POWERS AND SENSORY ORGANISM. That he classes trance, automatic writing, inspirational speaking, impressional mediumship, clairvoyance, clairaudience, emotional insanity, delusional insanity, materializing, independent writing, trumpet speaking, etc., all as MEDIUMSHIP.

Hence, all of these phases must be taken as destructive to health, paralyzing the brain, demoralizing the intellect, and ruinous to body and soul. How, then, can one practice mediumship daily for ten, twenty, thirty, and even forty years, without developing a single symptom of intellectual, moral, or physical injury?

A single exception might not disturb the rule; but hundreds of them do. In my last I presented two cases that seem to show that mediumship DOES NOT necessarily injure body or mind. Abuses of it, like all other abuses, of course are harmful. I will now offer more testimony!

In answer to a series of questions to Clara Watson, of Jamestown, N. Y., the following are her answers:

Question.—How long have you been a medium?

Answer.—Thirty years.

Q.—How frequently have you been under spirit control or impression?

Q.—Have you ever realized any injury to your physical health as a result of mediumship?

A.—No. Have always been healthy.

Q.—Has mediumship weakened your memory?

A—No. But on the contrary, strengthened it.

Q.—Have you realized any influence from mediumship that weakened your power of intellectual concentration and logical thinking?

A.—No. But have been greatly aided therein.

Q.—Has mediumship weakened your power to do business of any kind in your normal state?

A.—No, but been a helper.

Q.—Have you ever been troubled with evil or obsessing spirits?

A.—No. All influences have been of the most exalting nature.

I have known Clara Watson over thirty years. She is a vigorous writer, as readers of The Progressive Thinker realize, and she has her own opinions and declares them as freely and independently as any Theosophist could desire. Her testimony does not support the destructive principle credited to all mediumship.

E. W. Sprague testifies:

Question.—How long have you been a medium?

Answer.—Since September, 1881. Was controlled the first time I sat in a circle.

Q.—Are you ever entranced?

A.—I always spoke in a trance when I began; sometimes unconscious; but oftener conscious, but helpless. These three phases are often manifested in one lecture, viz., Inspiration, conscious trance, unconscious trance.

Q.—How often have you submitted to spirit control?

A.—The first six years, once, at least, every day. Since that time there have been years in which I have been controlled from once to nine times in a day. There is hardly a day now that I do not commit the "Great Psychological Crime."

Q.—Have you ever realized injury to your health as a result of mediumship?

A.—My health has been much better. It improved at once, when I began to practice my mediumship. I have been in perfect health ever since.

Q.—Have you ever experienced harm to your intellect as a result of mediumship?

A.—Not to my knowledge. I think it has greatly increased my mental powers in every way.

Q.—Has mediumship injured your memory?

A.—Not in the least?

Q.—Has mediumship weakened your ability to think clearly and to concentrate your thoughts at will?

A.—No sir. It has greatly assisted me to do both.

Q.—Have you realized any tendency of spirit control toward any immorality?

A.—My mediumship has been helpful and uplifting. My spirit friends have always taught morals, and the sad consequences of immorality. I have never realized any tendency of spirit controls toward any immorality.

Mrs. A. Atcheson testifies:

Question.—How long have you been a medium?

Answer.—Fourteen years.

Q.—Are you ever entranced?

A.—Yes.

Q.—How often have you been controlled by spirits?

A.—Whenever I give up to it.

Q.—Have you ever experienced injury to health from the exercise of mediumship?

A.—No, never. But have gained health.

Q.—Has mediumship injured your memory?

A.—No.

Q.—Has mediumship weakened your intellectual powers?

A.—No. It has helped me.

Q.—Have you experienced any disability to think consecutively and concentrate your mind at will when in the normal condition?

A.—It has never affected my mind when in the normal condition.

Q.—Have you ever been troubled with mischievous or evil spirit?

A.—No, never.

Q.—Have spirits ever tried to allure or impel you against your own moral judgment?

A.—No, never.

I have known Mrs. Atcheson ten years or more, and I think I can safely vouch for the integrity of her intentions and the truthfulness of her answers. She gives her time and talent to the cause, working in and for the spiritual society, giving private sittings and public lessons in her parlors, and lecturing and giving tests for the society at Niagara Falls every Sunday evening, and shows no signs of mental or physical decay, or moral devolution.

E. W. Sprague is too well known to need my endorsement. I have known him thirty years or more, as a man of solid qualities and reliable character.

Mary T. Longley testifies:

Mrs. Longley's splendid letter in the Symposium leaves little to be said of her mediumship. But I wrote her for a few points in answer to my questions as follows:

Question.—How long have you been a medium?

Answer.—Thirty-five years. Nearly all the years in continuous work as a medium.

Q.—Are you ever entranced?

A.—Thousands of times.

Q.—Have you ever realized any injury to physical health that you could reasonably charge to mediumship?

A.—As one in any continued and exacting business, or profession, must of necessity feel a tax on the physical system, demanding rest and time for recuperation, so I have at times felt tired, and in need of rest—had a spell of nervous prostration eighteen years ago, and rallied with greater ability for work.

Q.—Have you ever experienced any mental deterioration, such as loss of memory, inability to think consecutively, loss of power to concentrate your mind at will, or inability to assert your reason and individuality as a consequence of the exercise of your mediumship?

A.—I have been mentally stimulated, educated, blessed in my mediumship. Never had school education after 12 years of age. My spirit guides have been my helpful teachers—especially John Pierpont and John Warren. They have been educational and spiritual guides in the highest interpretation of the word guidance. I think my reasoning powers are fairly good. As for my will it is not and never has weakened. My family know me as a strong-willed individualized entity. Have had splendid memory. Hence at Banner circles spirits could use my brain to give names, dates and other facts for identification. I am naturally skeptical. Never very credulous or easily led. Want logic and fact.

In the letter accompanying these answers Mrs. Longley says: "I have been a trance, personating, test, talking, writing medium since Feb. 16, 1868. When 14 years old first entranced. Have been in deep trance condition so as to appear lifeless—or very nearly so for periods lasting from 2 to 48 hours, in my early years of mediumship, never fully unconscious of mortal surroundings however. Was message medium for Banner of Light 14 years; for Voice of Angels 3 years, for Light of Truth about a year. Have given sittings and circles for many years during my mediumship."

The nervous prostration in Mrs. Longley's case does not count as a witness for the destructive process in mediumship. It is quite a common experience among overworked professional men; and the fact that it was 18 years ago, and that she rallied from it with greater ability for work, and has continued to work AS A MEDIUM, and also in secular pursuits, and is still at work, as the efficient secretary of the N. S. A., and giving trance lectures as her time permits, and shows no decline of intellectual vigor, is pretty conclusive evidence that in her case, at least, MEDIUMSHIP IS NOT A DESTRUCTIVE PROCESS.

Although this letter is already too long, there is one more point that I feel ought to be considered without delay. It illustrates the tendency to misunderstand and misconstrue expressions, when the writer is entirely sincere, and possessed of a brilliant intellect. If we fail to correctly interpret each other's language, how can we expect our readers to understand our meanings? I will quote verbatim from your words:

"One of the most interesting statements contained in your last letter is this: 'In the fifty years that I have been associated with mediums in a large variety of phases, and under many varying conditions I HAVE NEVER MET WITH ONE SUCH CASE.' You are here referring to cases which illustrate the destructive effect of the subjective process." After quoting my words 'you proceed to relate several cases of distress that have come to your knowledge, and offer them as testimony against my statement, and giving me credit for truthfulness, you assume that the reason for my ignorance is that these suffering mediums have not given me their confidence. Your quotation of my words is accurate; and the statement that I was "referring to cases which illustrate the destructive effect of the subjective process" is also correct. But your application of it is entirely INCORRECT AND MISLEADING. I was NOT referring to any cases of obsession, or vicious controls, or the secret sufferings of mediums from the influence of wicked spirits. The cases to which I referred were distinctly stated in my letter. It was specified that the two cases I referred to were those related in the book at pages 218-19, one a man, the other a woman, both splendid types of intellectual manhood and womanhood; and in less than two years from the time they began the development, each was ruined, each was reduced to "maundering mental wrecks more pitiful than language can picture." These two cases as illustrating the destructive effects of mediumship, are what I wrote of when I said I HAVE NEVER MET WITH ONE SUCH CASE. Yet as you quote and apply it, there is scarcely a resemblance between them. But I have not the least doubt that you intended to correctly report my language. In this case it was not because my language was "subtle" or "vague," that you could not understand it. But your mind was on the destructive process, and you regarded any and every experience that seemed unfavorable to mediumship, as applicable to the case in question. Did these mediums that gave you their confidence show the "maundering" idiocy that these two cases are represented to show, as a result of two years of mediumship?

I repeat, I HAVE NEVER MET WITH SUCH A CASE; nor do I recall of ever hearing of one, until I read the book.

"What I will not that I cannot do."

You seem to think you have turned my words against my argument, in that I said I COULD NOT TRY. But I COULD HAVE TRIED IF I HAD WANTED TO.

DESIRE IS NOT A CREATURE OF THE WILL, but its CREATOR. It, in turn, is created by antecedents and circumstances over which the will has had no control.

Definitions: I. Personal Accountability. Individual dependence upon, and responsiveness to, all the causes in the Cosmos that reach the individual through antecedent and environment.

This includes rewards and punishments.

2. It depends upon cause and effect perpetually relating the individual to Nature and Society.

Question. "Is crime a necessary factor in, or aid to, the evolution of man as an intelligent soul?"

Answer. I think not. But it represents a condition from which SOME SOULS cannot escape without the experience of the reaction, the discipline of pain and repentance. With increasing interest in the problems of two world relations and admiration of your genius, and generous spirit and fraternal good will, I remain your dull pupil in search of knowledge.

Letter From Parkland, Pa.

To the Editor:—As many of the readers of The Progressive Thinker knew Parkland in the days of yore when it was a prosperous camp-meeting ground, and from its rostrum many of the best speakers in the land sent forth inspired utterances of the grand truth of Spiritualism to large and appreciative audiences, a few thoughts from this beautiful rural spot may not come amiss.

As to why it failed to continue as such, into the details I will not enter; suffice it to say, it was turned into an excursion ground; amusement made the first consideration; the meetings secondary, the latter growing less and less until Parkland finally ceased to be a camp-meeting place.

Yet a few earnest souls ever believed in its resurrection on a higher spiritual basis. And we feel sure the thought of, these went out on waves of light, and met the thought of those who also felt the need of a Spiritualist camp-meeting in this section.

On July 5, 1903, a grove meeting was held here under the auspices of the First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia, Pa., followed that evening by services in the hall. After that two meetings on each Sunday were held here during the summer, with Richard F. Adams as chairman. The following speakers and mediums willingly gave their services: Captain F. J. Keffer, Mrs. Minnie Brown, Mrs. Elizabeth T. Alloway, Richard F. Adams, Prof. A. Stevens, Mrs. S. Snyder, Mrs. Elizabeth Cutler, Mrs. Mary J. Jennings, Hon. Thomas M. Locke, Mrs. Sarah E. Phillips, Arthur Groom, Stanton Metlin, C. H. Barry, William Grosseck, Mrs. Luce, Mrs. Sarah Anthony and W. Rawson.

These meetings had the desired effect of arousing a greater interest in the re-establishment of a camp-meeting at this place, culminating in the organization of a society for that purpose, on Sunday, August 30, 1903, when a little band of earnest Spiritualists and friends of the cause convened in the hall. And though King Sol did not show his face during the whole day, yet we knew he was shining behind the clouds, and those who did attend felt no depression of spirit from the dampness outside, nor lack of a large assembly, for they came with the thought of a great purpose.

Beautiful flowers adorned the rostrum, adding grace and beauty to the scene—among these a vase of great golden double sunflowers occupied a prominent position.

A membership of 42 names was formed, and the following officers were elected: President, Richard F. Adams; vice-president, Prof. A. Stevens; secretary, Miss Elizabeth M. Fish; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Thomas M. Locke; treasurer, William R. McGlenn, all of Philadelphia, Pa., except the secretary, whose summer and winter home is here.

Since the organization of our baby society, a business meeting has been held in the city of Philadelphia on the third Saturday in each month, to look after important matters in reference to our coming camp, which we propose to start next summer on the Heights, instead of on the lower grounds, south of railroad, where the old camp was held. For this purpose four lots have been donated, with the promise of others. There are in the grove near "Pioneer Cottage"—known to all the first residents of Parkland, as the home of Mr. and Mrs. John B. M. Fifield, ardent Spiritualists, who have since found another home in the higher realm; and this beautiful residence is now the summer home of Mrs. Mary J. Jennings.

At the first business meeting held in the city, our society was named Parkland Heights Spiritualist Camp-meeting Association. Since then it has been decided to add the name of Home, as it is the wish and design of Mr. Adams to also establish in connection with our camp-meeting an orphanage and home for needy Spiritualists. As this meets the approval of the members, it will be chartered under one name: Parkland Heights Spiritualists Home and Camp-meeting Association.

Various committees have been appointed by the president. The most important being one on charter, one on constitution and by-laws, another on land, and still another on entertainment and benefit.

A fee of two dollars for membership was fixed upon; this to include dues for the first year.

At each business meeting more new names are added until our list now has enrolled upon it the names of 83 members. We are also very glad to say that these represent several different societies.

Several mediums have offered to give seances; entertainments are being held for the purpose of raising necessary funds, and we feel that all things are working toward final success.

With its hills and valleys, its wooded land with many beautiful streams running through; with the historic Neshaming creek gently flowing at its feet, Parkland offers many natural advantages for a spiritual camp-meeting ground.

It is on the direct line of the Philadelphia and Reading railroad, some twenty miles from the former city, with several trains stopping daily; this same railroad dividing the lower grounds from the Heights.

On the lower grounds there is a hotel, store, hall, auditorium, and a large pavilion, beside some 70 cottages—the latter built on ground rent and occupied during the summer by families mainly from Philadelphia, representing many denominations of belief.

On the Heights larger and more substantial houses are being built, each one building on his own ground. These now number 23, while at the present time two more are under way; and some eight or ten are planning to build this coming spring. Many of these are permanent homes. This winter ten of these are occupied, and also four of those on the lower grounds.

It was deemed advisable to accept an offer from the owners, and lease the lower grounds, with all privileges except hotel and ground rents—for in order to bring our camp up to the high standard we earnestly desire, it is positively necessary to first eliminate some objectionable features which have crept in.

Richard F. Adams, who was elected to preside over this new organization, is a member and trustee of the First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia, Pa., and during the past summer won many friends here by his earnest, sincere devotion to the cause; and we feel that the right man, at the right time, has been called to fill the right place; that powers will be unfolded to nobly meet the requirements of this responsible position.

In this work we desire the co-operation of all friends of the cause, and those desiring further information may communicate with the corresponding secretary, Mrs. Thomas M. Locke, whose, whose city address is 605 North Seventh street, Philadelphia, Pa., or with the secretary, whose address is given below, and all questions will be cheerfully answered.

Other places have their grand camp-meetings, and now we aspire to have one. And we feel that the angel world is now with us; and the name of Parkland shall yet resound with honor and glory throughout the length and breadth of this whole land.

And now, friends, I feel that we have begun a great work, a sacred work! And if we are but true to ourselves, we will be true to it; and being true to a just cause we will attract from both the seen and the unseen side of life all the help we need; and from this apparently small beginning a mighty spiritual force shall go forth to enrich the world.

HOW ROSE VALENTE ACHIEVED A FORTUNE

An Interesting Story of How a Young Woman Succeeded in Business—A Chance for Others To Do So Too.

A young lady of Medina, N. Y., has recently had an experience which has made her envied by all her friends. She is Miss Rose Valente, of 142 Center Street. A reporter to-day asked her for the facts. She modestly refused to discuss the matter, and simply handed him the following letter which she wrote to a prominent educator and which fully explains the story.

"I write you this letter as a statement of my success after taking your instruction in bookkeeping and to inform you how pleased I am with the position you secured for me.

"When I first wrote you, I had no idea that bookkeeping could be learned so thoroughly and so easily by correspondence. My friends laughed at the idea, and I had always thought it necessary to attend a business college to learn bookkeeping, but such is positively not the case. I devoted from one-half hour to an hour to the study each evening, and in three weeks' time, I had a much better knowledge of bookkeeping than the average student who attends a business college during the same period. I know this to be true because I questioned a young man who was taking a course in a first-class business college, and he did not begin to have the practical information I had.

"As soon as I finished the course, I accepted a position that you gave me. I went to work with a great deal of nervousness. After the first day this passed away because I quickly found out that the practical hints which you taught me enabled me to take hold at once, and by the second week I had charge of a set of books which would stagger many experienced bookkeepers. The fact that my employer has raised my salary twice within the past three months is the best proof that my work has been satisfactory. I advise any one who anticipates taking a course in bookkeeping, to take your course. It would be impossible for any one to attend a business college and get the same attention that you give your students. I have learned that if one attends a business college, he is filled full of a lot of fancy theories that amount to nothing when he begins practical work. Your course covers the entire field. When I accepted this position I seemed to have just exactly the knowledge I required.

"The advantage in taking a course by correspondence is that when you wish to refer to it, you always have it handy, while in taking a personal course you must depend upon memory. During the first few days, I was compelled to refer to the course. After I did this a few times, I had no trouble.

"I enclose an express money order to pay my tuition. Your offer is certainly a fair one. I should like to know the business college that will allow its students to pay their tuition after the college places them in a position. They do not do this.

"You must pardon me if I appear too enthusiastic, but several of my friends treated this matter as a joke when I decided to take it up, and the joke is now on them. Had I gone to a business college I would not be through yet, and would have spent a great deal. As it now stands, I have a nice position and did not have to pay a cent for instruction until you placed me in a position.

"Again thanking you for what you have done for me, I am very gratefully yours,

"ROSE R. VALENTE."

Our free book, "How to Succeed in Business," started Miss Valente on the road to success. It tells you how you can learn bookkeeping and pay your tuition after we place you in a position. It tells you about the most wonderful system of accounting ever discovered. It contains information that, more than anything else will help you succeed in life.

We have a limited number of these books that will be sent absolutely free to ambitious persons who sincerely desire to better their position and add to their income. Send us your name and address on a postal card to-day and receive the book by return post. Address Commercial Correspondence Schools, 242 Schools Bldgs., Rochester, N. Y.

9—The Religion of Man and Ethics of Science.
10—Seers of the Ages, or Spiritualism Past and Present.

Read This Carefully Before Remitting.

When you send in your subscription to The Progressive Thinker, carefully look over the books which you desire in this list, and their price, and send for them. They are very valuable. They are intensely interesting. They are elevating in tone and will do you good. In remitting do not fail to enclose a dollar for The Progressive Thinker.

These ten books, substantially and elegantly bound, and printed in the neatest style of the printer's art, will be furnished to our subscribers for $3.10, a price which modern machinery and enterprise has rendered possible in The Progressive Thinker office only. Sending out these books, however, at the prices we do, does not reduce the price of the subscription of the paper, apparently or otherwise, a single cent, for that cannot be afforded for less than one dollar per year, in view of the fact that we publish such a vast amount of reading matter.

In conclusion, bear in mind that the postage on these ten premium books is about ONE DOLLAR, leaving this office only $2.10, illustrating the great bargain you are getting—a bargain the like of which was never known before on this material plane.

CLUBS! CLUBS! CLUBS! CLUBS!

To Clubs of ten or more we offer the following terms to each one: The Progressive Thinker one year, and ONE of the following books, $1.15: "The Religion of Man and Ethics of Science"; "Seers of the Ages, or Spiritualism Past and Present"; "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands"; "The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World," Vol. 3. The one who gets up the Club will be entitled to the paper one year free, and any two of the books he may select among our list of premiums.

Man and the Spirit World as Disclosed in the Bible." By Rev. Arthur Chambers, Associate of King's College, London. An excellent book for Christian people who would investigate and learn the facts of Bible teachings as well as modern spirit phenomena. Price, cloth, $1.10.

Bible and Church Degrade Woman. By Elizabeth Cady Stanton. Comprises three essays on "The Effect of Woman Suffrage on Questions of Morals and Religion." Price, 10c.

Father Tom and the Pope, Or a Night at the Vatican. Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Mag zine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "potoen," and an Irish recipe for "conwounding" the same. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

Angels at Earlville Heard by a Minister.

HEAVENLY CHORUS FALLS ON HUMAN EARS—CLERYGYMAN FURNISHES MUSIC FROM MEMORY TO HIS ORGANIST, WHO TRANSCRIBES IT FOR PUBLIC SERVICE.

According to the Post-Standard, of Syracuse, N. Y., angels at Earlville have been discovered by Rev. J. C. Smylie, rector of St. Edmunds' Protestant Episcopal Church of New York, who has startled his congregation by an announcement that on the occasion of a trip to Syracuse he had at the Madison county village listened with human hearing to the heavenly music of an angel choir.

The celestial music produced such an impression on the clergyman, he says, that he has been able to retain the harmonious strains in his memory, and in reply to doubters he has sung the notes to the church organist, who has put them on paper for use in public service.

"I heard it one night near Earlville, a place near Syracuse," said the clergyman, in explaining the miraculous occurrence. "The singing lasted fully fifteen minutes. Then it slowly died out, and I fell into sleep. I began to dream, and suddenly there stood at the bottom of my bed a figure robed in white, like that of Christ.

"Don't you believe?" said the voice of the white-robed man. I confessed that I did believe, and from that moment I have been a believer in such Spiritualistic phenomena.

"When I awoke on Christmas morning last the strains of music suddenly burst into my room. I called Mrs. Smylie's attention to it. At first the music was low and sweet. It was like a heavenly chorus singing sweet anthems.

"By degrees the voices rose and seemed to come nearer to us. We were enchanted, enthralled with ecstatic rapture. We could see no one, but there was no mistaking the character of the voices. The voices were the sweetest I have ever heard. They were female voices, my wife thought. The singing continued for ten minutes and then slowly died away in sweet cadence.

"Now, how do you explain it? Mrs. Smylie and I simply must have subjective minds to rise above that which is objective. The nearest house is twenty feet away. The voices were circulating over our heads and all about us."

Mr. Smylie's church is at One Hundred and Seventh street and Morris avenue.

Convent Life and Experience.

Some light on the inner workings of convent life is shed by the following account as given in the daily press. It shows that not all is peace and heavenly devotion in the experience of inmates of these institutions. The account reads:

Omaha, Neb.—Annie Connell, who entered suit against the Convent of Mercy, of this city, for $30,000 alleging her health was broken as a result of hardships imposed upon her while she was a sister of mercy in the place, tonight said: "I served two years' novitiate in the convent and was admitted as a full sister in 1891. At that time I took the vows of chastity, obedience and poverty. I turned over a small amount of property and was assigned to the duties of teacher and cook.

"The rules governing the convent provide that sisters shall receive food and clothing and proper medical attention during illness, but the vow of obedience annuls all this. The will of the Mother Superior is law. This was taken advantage of and I was made to work at arduous labor eighteen and twenty hours daily.

"In 1898 my health gave out and I was forced to go to Hot Springs. The convent would not pay my expenses and I had to procure my living from the sisters down there, my parents paying my transportation. When I returned to the convent in 1899, the Mother Superior adopted the same tactics. Of course I became ill, and proper medical attendance was refused. They would not follow the physician's instructions, and even neglected to bring me food and water.

"When I became a nervous wreck from the treatment I applied to the late Pope Leo for release from my vows of poverty and obedience. The release was granted in 1903. I then left the convent, and since have been dependent upon charity and have spent most of the time in the hospital in Council Bluffs. I am still a member in good standing of the Catholic church, and many Catholics sympathize with me and say I have done right.

"I have sued for what is due me as wages during the twelve years I taught in the convent and also for damages resulting from the loss of my health."

Orthodoxy Run Mad.

An instructive example of the spiteful, misrepresenting, and obstinately vicious nature of a mind miscultured in orthodox sentiments, is afforded by a crank anti-socialist editorial writer in a recent issue of the Chicago Chronicle. In his petty religious spite and prejudice, he (or she) gives vent to the following, anent the celebration announced by Hull House, this city, in honor of the birthday of Thomas Paine:

The celebration is in complete harmony with the teachings and practices of that socialistic institution. The exaltation of the infidel as a person most worthy of emulation is a primary and fundamental lesson in discontent and disbelief. From disbelief in divine law and authority to disbelief in the laws of man and the authority of organized government is a quick and short step. The most active and malevolent enemies of law and social order are infidels, for the doctrine of infidelity is the doctrine of religious anarchy. It aims to destroy belief in and reverence for the source of all authority.

The infidel is an anarchist at heart, whether he is known by that title or masquerades as a socialist. The individual who has no respect for divine authority will not be subordinate voluntarily to the authority of human beings who are mere creatures of divine will.

Infidelity and its hideous offspring anarchy find their disciples among the degenerate, the weak-minded, the hare-brained and the intellectual dependents who rely upon others to think for them. The unfortunates who seek the protection of Hull House under the impression that it is an eleemosynary institution are excellent material from which to make converts. Having given the public this exhibition of the apotheosis of Thomas Paine, it is now in order for Hull House to follow it with a celebration "in honor" of the birthdays of those "martyrs to the cause," commonly known as Haymarket anarchists.

Many Christian people are Socialists. Jesus himself, were he on earth to-day, would by this writer be anathematized as a socialist, an anarchist, etc., etc.

Texas Stepping to the Front.

Mrs. Isa Wilson Kayner is engaged by the Texas State National Association of Spiritualists as State Missionary, and all places in the state desiring her services should communicate with Secretary LeRoy Hutchings, Spiritualist Temple, Galveston, Texas, as to terms and dates. Mrs. Kayner's work in Bowie, Texas was pleasing and successful. Sunday, Jan. 24, she took part in a special meeting in Galveston, at the Temple where Mr. John W. Ring, publisher of the Progressive Lyceum, a lesson paper for lyceums, presides regularly. Services were held in the afternoon and at night. Mrs. Maud Lord Drake, the well-known medium of Kansas City, Mo., Mrs. Isa Wilson Kayner and Dr. J. M. Temple, of St. Augustine, Florida, assisted in the meeting, and each proved the standard of their mediumship which is well known to the Spiritualist public everywhere. The crowds that thronged the Temple Sunday felt that they were spiritually feasted.

Mrs. Alice Baker and her son Milton are holding successful meetings in Dallas and the surrounding towns.

Mrs. Laura B. Payne is carrying on the good work in San Antonio.

Miss McCarty, of Colorado, is located for the winter in Houston, where her work is well spoken of.

Dr. J. M. Temple is in Galveston, doing a fine work. There seems a general look-up in Spiritualism in Texas.

The Bench and the Bar.

The woman's legislative committee of Illinois have issued a neat little booklet on the "Bench and the Bar on Woman's Suffrage." To many this little book will be a surprise, with its 175 favorable opinions by the best and brightest minds in our state on the enfranchisement of woman.

We can give the best idea of the book by a few quotations:

E. H. Gary, Chicago, former County Judge of DuPage County, Chairman Board of Directors United Steel Corporation, says: "I am strongly in favor of extending to woman the right of suffrage."

Richard S. Tuthill, Chicago, Circuit Judge Cook county, says: "There are many strong arguments against universal suffrage for men or women, but in my judgment none against the latter which do not equally apply to the former. I believe that the suffrage ought to be at once, and as a matter of common right, extended to all property-owning women who have reached the age of 21 years, and with a proper educational requirement to all others."

Robert G. Ingersoll says: "No government ought to exist for a moment that rests on the crushed right of one human being."

Geo. H. Monro, Joliet, says: "No taxation without representation, I believe to be a good motto. Equal rights is justice to all."

MATERIALIZATIONS.

To the Editor:—By invitation of Mrs. Helen Fairchilds and Mr. L. B. Tilley, the writer attended a private materializing seance at her residence, 32 W. Ellsworth street, Denver, on Sunday evening, January 10. It lasted from about 7 to 8:30 o'clock p. m.

In that time thirty full forms were completed so as to speak to us, and more than half that number came out of the cabinet into the room and some walked ten feet from it. Two Indian girls danced with ease and naturalness, as if they were very happy. There was a joyous disposition shown by all and an inclination to give kind and helpful advice and thoughts and also many promises to aid us to advance in the knowledge of truth. Some were desirous to instruct mortals in the great truths of the life beyond and of Spirit Communion, and thus prepare their minds to accept the cold facts of the real conditions of the deceased people in the ethereal realm. They spoke with evident desire to observe truthfulness, in kindness, and "with malice towards none."

The manifestations were those of grown people except one boy, the son of Mr. Tilley, who came out and as he returned into the cabinet he whistled a tune fairly well, following the melody of the music box. The apparel of all was very different; no two being exactly the same in appearance, and the colors were very diverse. The majority of the forms showed spirit lights gleaming every conceivable shape, and the sizes of them varied from a very small circle to long bands around the turbans and also crescents and stars from one inch across to four or more inches in breadth. The color of the lights seemed to me to be very similar in all and about the tint or strength of that of the full moon, as seen from the time of its rise in the evening to that when it reaches the zenith at midnight.

The influences, psychically and mentally speaking, of all who appeared, differed very much, so one could readily discern or sense the varying degrees of mental and spiritual progress which each had attained, from that of the playful Indian girl and whistling youth to that of the far advanced entity who had been in the spirit realms for centuries. The desolate planes of thought in which some had lived in the past and also in the present were apparent, and their need of loving attendance and instruction inspires one with a great desire to be about the Masters work of loving ministry. They were certainly "spirits in prison," the prison-house of an unenlightened mind. Others had seen much of the spirit realm and were very wise, affectionate and evidently desired to aid us to learn more of light and of truth. They loved to observe our progress in the awakening to truth, love and wisdom.

Two of the forms were those of far advanced spirits who gave the names of "Night" and "Morning," and said they came from another planet. They expressed delight at meeting us, and gave us much encouragement in our search for truth. They came across the room, bringing many bright lights, and spoke quite audibly. Three others gave us the names of Moses, Elijah and Elisha. They all appeared at once in much strength, were clothed in ancient apparel, gleamed with many bright lights, kept their distance and spoke to us very kindly and encouragingly.

One gave us the name of "Yolanda," came out to the writer's table and told him that she had been about 1800 years in the spirit realms. She appeared and disappeared three times. The second time she came out of the cabinet, she stood by the sensitive, two or three feet from her where she could be plainly seen, sang two stanzas of the song, "Waunita," in clear tones which could be heard in all parts of the house. She is one of Mr. Tilley's guides, and when she first came to these seances she could not speak our language. She now uses it quite well.

Another one could not now speak our language, excepting a few words, but he spoke German quite fluently and one who came with him interpreted for me. The latter could speak several languages, and his tones indicated that he also was of foreign nativity.

Starlight, the Indian girl, was dressed like those whom we have seen of her native people, and when the writer asked her to shake hands, she replied that she could not, for if she did she "would fall to pieces."

Utina, the ancient guide of the medium, was ablaze with gleaming jewels whose white light scintillated so as to fill the room with a soft radiance. She often addresses the seances with words of love and wisdom.

During the evening the writer had light enough in the room to see his pencil and paper weight, and make notes of all of the separate manifestations but not enough to see the written words distinctly. The seance was commenced by singing, "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," and other spiritual songs followed, and the solemn and impressive acts and influences were elevating and opened to an inquiring mind vast fields of knowledge.

The evidences of the reality and genuineness of these wonderful manifestations, were undoubted. It has been the privilege of the writer to see similar materializations on nine other occasions, in all of which his son came and talked to him so that he felt that there could be no mistake. The grand truth that our loved ones do continue to live and do come to us with every possible opportunity, is thus shown to be indisputable.

This brief description but faintly outlines the impressions made in the seance, and inadequate justice is done to the subject.

Hoping that many doubting ones may receive assurance of life after death, that all of their fears will be resolved into confidence of a happy reunion with their loved ones in the summer land of the ethereal realms, and that their future may be much brighter and their lives filled with greater joy by this description of these manifestations, I am, sincerely, JOHN T. McCLURE.

ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS.

The manifestations given above are most marvelous, and Mrs. Fairchilds must be a most wonderful medium. We suggest that she start at once for Los Angeles, Cal., and capture the ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS offered by Robert Hale, 831 Wall street, of that city.

Words of Appreciation.

The following words of appreciation of the premium book, Religion of Man, are by Augusta Cooper Bristol, the brilliant lecturer and poet:

"It is an important book that I have received—'Religion of Man and Ethics of Science.' It can not fail to greatly instruct and enlighten all who read it. It is admirably arranged and systematized. Of course it is the Ethics of Science that claims my attention, rather than the 'Religion of Man,' when I open the book. But that is because I happen to have the first half of the book pigeon-holed mentally, and do not need it in order to appreciate the statements and conclusions of the second part of the book. But it will not be so with most readers, and the book is admirably arranged for its purpose; and a marked equilibrium of spirit characterizes the author in his treatment of his theme."

AN ANTIDOTE

TO THE EXPOSURE OF FAKE MEDIUMS.

Remarkable Manifestations of a Washington Medium.

To the Editor:—I have read in The Progressive Thinker a communication from Mr. Robert Hale, of Los Angeles, Cal., in which he offers to "give one thousand dollars to any person who will produce one materialized spirit." He seems to think that because he was fooled by one fraud materializing medium, all are frauds.

Now if he will come to Washington, D. C., I think he can be convinced that there is one materializing medium who is not a fraud, and that at her seances spirits materialize in full form, write notes, talk, and some of them sing. The medium is Mrs. Mary A. Keeler, who is strictly honest.

I will give some of the happenings at her seances: The seance is opened by Eliza Plum, the daughter of a former member of Congress, who passed to spirit life while residing here. She blesses the circle. The next one is Dr. Charles Holland, who passed to spirit life from Boston a good many years ago. He is master of the materializations. The two children of Dr. Theodore Hansmann, an intelligent and reputable physician, come to him one just after the other, and talk to him in the most loving manner. His spirit wife comes to him and they talk together in German. (The medium does not speak German.) Col. D. W. Wood, a practicing lawyer of this city, and who was Colonel of the 20th Ohio Regiment during the civil war, gets remarkable materializations. His father, wife, sister, daughter and two sons come to him and talk with him and his two sons, sing with him beautifully, and the youngest one besides singing, plays on a mouth organ which his father hands him. Mrs. Pool, a clerk in the postoffice, sings with her spirit husband who comes to her in materialized form and they talk to each other. My father and mother sometimes come to me together, and my oldest son and his spirit wife, accompanied sometimes by their spirit daughter, making three materialized forms that are with me at the same time. My wife materializes, talks to me lovingly, and writes beautiful and loving notes. I have three other sons who materialize, talk to me and write loving messages. Nearly all who attend get similar demonstrations.

Dr. William Keeler, husband of the above-named medium, is a spirit photographer—said to be the best in the world. Col. Wood has received some very fine photos that can be readily recognized. He does not sit in front of the camera, but to one side and near it. The camera is pointed to a dark screen, and the photos are thus taken. He has a photo of Wm. McKinley that is as good as any he ever had taken while in earth life, and one of John A. Logan, also a good likeness. The photos of his own relatives on the spirit side are all recognizable.

On Christmas night a party of six—three ladies and three gentlmen—met at the Keeler residence to try the experiment of photographing materialized spirit forms as they might appear in the opening of the cabinet. Mr. Keeler had his doubts about being able to photograph them, but would try. The materializing medium, Mrs. Keeler, went into the cabinet and became entranced. Mr. Keeler turned his camera on the opening when the curtains parted and a spirit form appeared. He succeeded beyond his expectations. All present got photos of many of their loved ones. One gentleman got a photo of his wife that was so perfect a likeness he told me he would not take five dollars for it. The medium's photo was taken three times unintentionally as she sat on her chair, eyes closed as in a deep sleep. The photo of her messenger or cabinet control, Clara Collingwood, was also taken.

Now, Mr. Hale, if you want the truth about materialization, come to Washington City, D. C., and you can get it and it won't cost you a thousand dollars. RUFUS SUMERLIN.

READ! REFLECT!

THE FACT THAT SPIRITS CAN AND DO COMMUNICATE WITH THE MORTALS OF EARTH IS ILLUSTRATED IN AN ENDLESS VARIETY OF WAYS.

To the Editor:—I enclose you clipping, which I wish you would publish in The Progressive Thinker.

J. A BAIR.

Macon, Ga.—A story that reads like the wildest fiction came to light in Macon upon the arrival of Janie Parsons from 22 Adelaide street, Indianapolis, Ind. She is a negro woman; was born in the south just at the close of the civil war, and her mother on her deathbed gave her away. The child was taken to the north and was transferred from white people to colored people and from colored people to white people, until she grew up and married Charlie Porter, an upholsterer in Indianapolis. She never heard anything about her relatives, and only knew from hearsay that she ever had a mother, as she was too small to remember the occasion when she was given into the custody of strangers.

About one year ago she was invited to attend a Spiritualist meeting in Indianapolis. When she heard of the many marvelous things that they said and did, she laughed at them, but was finally persuaded to attend their meeting. She did so, and then for the first time, she heard her mother's name, and was told that her mother at that moment was standing by her side with her hands on her shoulders. Her mother's name was given as Marie Harrison. The Spiritualist delivered this message to her from her mother: "You have a sister residing in Middle Georgia. Her name is Drucilla Parsons. She cannot remain much longer upon this earth, and if you wish to see her, you must go to her at once."

Janie says that she was so much impressed by the solemnity of the occasion that she immediately wrote a number of letters to authorities in the various towns and citizens of Middle Georgia, asking them if such a person as Drucilla Parsons resided there. She learned that there was such a woman living on Hawthorne street in Macon. She wrote to Drucilla Parsons and asked her many questions about her mother and herself.

The correspondence satisfied Janie that Drucilla was her older and only sister, and that she was in very poor health and not expected to live much longer. Janie immediately closed out her interests in Indianapolis, her husband having died, and came to Macon. She is now cooking for a family at 207 Appleton avenue, and declares that she will not again be separated from her sister.

A SPIRIT VOICE.

How It Prevented a Terrible Disaster.

To the Editor:—During the past five years I have visited the Ozark Uplift, which lies in three states and Indian Territory, every part yielding grand results in geographical and geological facts, and fruitful ideas in social life. The 'Frisco railroad lands you near around it all.

One morning wishing to make a certain elevation in the distance, after going a quarter of a mile from town on the common road, I heard a voice clairaudiently, urging me not to go farther that way, but to go up around on the railroad. "We have work for you to do," it said.

Now that was a reasonable proposition, and I joyfully retraced my steps back to town, west on the railroad, expecting that something of interest would be presented to me. After going two miles out I found my work—an iron on the track, placed skillfully at the curve, and the picture, too, of "death" for me. Had I ever faltered with military generals? No! Now, with an unseen one, with a train past due, full of people, what could I not do? How full of thought and feeling for a few seconds at this trysting place. What if the physical body went down, that would be no loss or sacrifice to me in this duty, and when I lifted the obstruction a beautiful strength came to me.

When I received this spirit message these trains—there were two—must have been more than 25 miles distant from me, and there were no minutes to spare.

See what fine knowledge was displayed. In two minutes later I met one of the would-be robbers on the track and with a "good morning" to him, I got a low grunt in reply. I saw others who were avoiding me on my new route to town, as I did not dare to take the track back.

How often have our lives been in jeopardy, and some kind spirit hand has saved us. I well know that mine has thus been saved several times.

The universe is a unit. Eternity fills every day. Spiritualism is just as practical as we wish to make it. Recently the 'Frisco company manager generously gave me passes enough for my present needs. D. P. BOND.

A Valuable Testimony.

Professor Flournoy, of the University of Geneva, after due consideration, thus declares his convictions:

"The question of immortality and intervention of spirits maintains its scientific importance, and deserves to be discussed with calm serenity, with the independence, and with the analytical rigor which are proper to the experimental method."

Spiritualists ask no more than this. It is what they have contended for for the past fifty years. They have said to all opposers: Investigate before you condemn. Those who have been the most bitter in opposition have been those who knew the least, while those who have honestly and impartially investigated, without exception have become convinced of the genuineness of the manifestations, if they have not accepted its philosophy.

A Man's a Man, for a' That!

I speak to those who were born at the base of Mount Use. My words are to encourage the ones who feel that there is enough in them to achieve some of life's desirable victories—and who does not feel so?—but who are so hedged with environments that the struggles of the climb up the mountain, to the sunlight which floods its top, seem at times overpowering, and the soul too often crouches, face to face with the skeleton of Defeat, instead of looking hopefully into the dream-face of a well-rounded life—a life full of usefulness, beauty, truth—sometimes crowned with the blossom-wreath of a world's appreciation. As an inspiration I will paint a few word pictures of some of the royal human products of this world, who cleared their way to the top of the mountain:

"A man's a man for a' that!" I seem to hear a voice—a weird voice, uttering a truth which should be written in letters of gold. It breathes the hope and triumph of a burdened, but not crushed soul.

It is tender with love and musical with the rhythm of poetry, seeming to come from a spirit endowed with rare gifts, but struggling in the bonds of unremunerative labor.

It is the voice of a soul walking on the wings of the wind, while the body to which it is chained must wrestle with material things for bread. Sometimes it is "jollying" humanity; giving it a song and dance tonic to brighten up its face, and again it bursts into the tremulous pathos of sorrow which only heaven can cure. Listen to the voice!

"No fear more, no tear more
To stain my vanished face."

Again the dream of early death departs and the external part of the young Scotchman again turns to the material part of life; to bread-winning—to the muck of soil, tools and weariness.

Hark to the voice! You are charmed with the sweet Scotch idiom. It comes winding down the years of more than a century, warming our hearts with its resonant sublimity and making our eyes rain tears for the singer whose name is now fondly cherished in all lands.

It is the voice of Burns—the poet of Ayr. We hear it afar off, faintly mingling with the singing river in the land of bluebells and heather. It swells in volume as its notes roll into the present new century; we hear, clear and distinct, as if trumpeted by an angel, for the encouragement of the oppressed, these words:

"What tho' on homely fare we dine,
Wear hodden gray, and a' that;
Gie fools their silks, and knaves their wine,
A man's a man for a' that,—
For a' that, and a' that,
Their tinsel shows and a' that;—
The honest man, though e'er sae poor
Is king of men for a' that."

Not always was the voice of hope a buoy to the spirit. At one time, before this great Scottish singer had published a volume of poems he gave expression to despondency in a letter to his father. It was when he was learning the business of flax dresser. He says: "I am quite transported with the thought that ere long, perhaps very soon, I shall bid an eternal adieu to all the pains, and uneasiness, and disquietude of this weary life, for I assure you I am heartily tired of it. * * * I am not formed for the bustle of the busy, nor the flutter of the gay. I shall never again be capable of entering into such scenes. I foresee that poverty and obscurity, probably, await me and I am in some measure prepared, and daily preparing, to meet them."

He adds, in a postscript: "My meal is nearly out, but I shall borrow till I get more." He had not yet discovered himself. But he sang on at his work. A genius, with thousands of unsung songs thrilling his whole being!—one destined to voice them, and set them flying adown the years, singing to millions of hungry hearts, so cruelly chained to the wheels of poverty and want, yet demonstrating the golden thought which afterwards fell from his lips, "A man's a man for a' that!"

What genius, struggling against the barriers of unfavorable environments, has not felt the truth that the man is the gold, externals are but tinsel.

Washington Irving—what a beautiful name our literary bachelor was graced with, once visited Stratford-on-Avon on a poetical pilgrimage. He writes, "My first visit was to the house where Shakspeare was born, and where, according to tradition, he was brought up to his father's craft of wool-combing. It is a small, mean-looking edifice of wood and plaster—a true nesting place of Genius, who seems to delight in hatching her offspring in by-corners."

We can imagine the pretty little Willie emerging from the unpretending dwelling in common garb, frolicing with the other lads in the meadows bordering the Avon, with no indication of the intellectual god, growing in the start, like the common run. An oak is not larger than a violet when it is a few weeks old, and who could guess, seeing them for the first time, that one would bloom for a few days and then disappear, while the other would grow for centuries, towering an hundred feet above the sweet blue blossom.

Did not Franklin feel the supremacy of man over externals in his early struggles to free the intellectual giant within him? The fifteenth child in a family of seventeen! What chance could there be for him in such a nestfull?

There was the chance that is given by nature that superiority will assert itself. And it did assert itself magnificently from the time he, at the age of seventeen, ran away from his brother's printing office to escape his tyranny, going first to New York, and thence to Philadelphia, where the lad made a comic show of himself trying to appease hunger, and lose no time, by eating from a loaf in hand and carrying two more—one under each arm for another meal! He was climbing up Mount Use. He could not go ahead hungry. He knew his own business at that tender age. There is not one within the sound of my voice whose heart will not say, "Three cheers for the brave young giant! Never mind his poverty! Never mind his oddity! 'A man's a man for a' that!'"

When the stunted child-laborer, who grew into the English poet Gerald Massey, was in his poverty-steeped childhood, what but faith in the prevailing power of good could have kept him up? At eight years of age he worked in a factory; it was destroyed by fire and that threw the little fellow out of a job. Then he tried to earn his living by straw plaiting. After that he was errand boy in London, and when out of a situation often went without a meal to buy something good to read.

He knew, even then, that the great city was teeming with an aristocracy brutalized by opulence. The poor starved that the rich might surfeit, and yet, with his face sunward, he sang in after years:

"Hope on, hope ever; yet the time shall come
When man to man shall be a friend and brother,
And this old world shall be a happy home
Where all earth's family love one another;
Hope on, hope ever."

Nothing but the consciousness of the truth which the bard of Ayr uttered could have floated him triumphantly over the sloughy lowlands to a sure footing on the sunlit mountain of Mount Use.

He knew full well—

"The rank is but the guinea stamp,
The man's the gold, for a' that."

In truth, we are born to our destinies, and when nature plans a genius she will not be repressed. Poverty cannot thwart her more than the mud around the lily bulb can stain its starry blossom when it hangs high above it on its strong stem.

The chances, to human eyes, were against young Abraham Lincoln, when, in the log cabin he laid himself down to rest on the poll bed, built in the corner of the room, to sleep, and dream, and wonder how he could ever be anybody—a man among men. Poor? Yes! Awkward? Yes! But there was royal material in the lad. We query if the spirit of the poet of Ayr ever whispered in his ear, "Keep heart, laddie! A man's a man for a' that! An honest man's the king of men, laddie! Work away! work away!"

When Garfield was struggling out of his sombre boyhood, half orphaned, willing to do anything to help his mother along with the family, what could have kept the heart of the child-man buoyant? What kept up his courage when trudging on the tow-path? When doing chores for his board?

He wanted better clothes, and better food; but he did not have them because he wanted an education more. He, too caught the winged hope which the poet of Ayr set flying among the echoing hills of Scotland more than a century ago, "A man's a man for a' that!" It grows sweeter with age and will continue to cheer the strugglers against cruel odds as long as human souls aspire to climb sunward and Godward.

The world wheels onward with its freight of souls. Some are oppressors—some are oppressed. Some are brutalized by want. Some are cruel and miserly—some are kind and just. We catch the gleam of weapons and the groans of the dying while we hear, almost in the same breath, the shouts of victory, and the clanging bells of joy. We wonder if all worlds roll onward with such a pandemonium on their surfaces.

Is there any one within the sound of my voice who feels that the world is against him? Any one who says, "If I had been born with better chances I might have been somebody; but it is no use struggling against such odds!"

Listen! I hear the voice of our poet ringing down from the highlands of heaven with a message to every doubting heart: "Keep heart, laddie! —lady, keep heart! A man's a man for a' that, laddie, and an honest man's the king of men, now and forever!"

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE BIBLE TELL IT.

JOHN E. REMSBURG'S GREAT WORK

The late R. G. Ingersoll stated in one of his famous lectures on the Bible: "Somebody ought to tell the truth about the Bible." John E. Remsburg, former President of the American Secular Union, has taken this obligation upon himself, and the fruits of his studies on the subject are now published in the shape of nearly 500 pages. The "higher criticism" has already plowed this field over quite deeply, but it has reached the ear of the public only in a fragmentary way, and even at that has found a very reluctant echo in the press. So much the more reason for rejoicing that this comprehensive work, got up in simple and popular language, is all contained in a single synoptically arranged book. The separate chapters of the work appeared in consecutive order in an uninterrupted series of articles in the New York Truth Seeker.

The facts set forth in this book about the Bible, its origin, its compilation, its preservation, its falsehoods, its credibility, and the morality it inculcates, are only partially known to the majority of ministers and priests, and it is earnestly to be desired that well-to-do Freethinkers may take it upon themselves to make energetic propaganda of the modern "higher" elucidation of the Bible by gratuitous distribution of this book to public libraries, or to Messrs. the pastors. The enormous expenditure of time and labor which the author imposed upon himself, the astonishingly low price of the book as compared with the attractive form in which it is gotten up, as well as the unanswerable logic of the composer—he lets the holy book for the most part speak for itself—are indeed worthy of the highest praise.

Ingersoll's desire that somebody should at last tell the whole truth about the Bible has been brilliantly fulfilled. No Freethinker worthy of the name can afford to pass over Remsburg's book in silence. Like Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," may it, let us hope, find admirers and translators in other languages. And again, like Paine's book, may this brilliant work bring to its author the praise of posterity.—Der Freidenker (Milwaukee).

This great work on the Bible by Mr. Remsburg is most valuable—it is an encyclopedia of information in regard to the Bible, and surpasses in importance all other works of the kind now published. It is up-to-date in every particular. Price $1. For sale at this office.

The Life of the Soul.

The subject selected for our discourse at this time was chosen with a desire to teach you something concerning the soul, and, therefore, we have phrased it, "The Life of the Soul."

Numerous definitions have been given of the word "soul" by different schools of thought and various teachers in our own ranks of the spiritual philosophy, and the interpretation we shall give may differ somewhat from that with which you have become familiar, because many of our public teachers—and perhaps many of those who are unseen by mortal eye but who inspire those teachers from time to time—have interpreted the word soul to mean the human entity as it is under the conditions and processes of developed intelligence, activity and consciousness. Personally we do not accept this definition, and will explain why.

THE MEANING OF SOUL.

What these teachers claim to be the soul, in the development and perfection of the principles of life as manifested through intelligence, consciousness and activity, we personally claim to be a spiritual entity; and the soul we interpret as something independent in a measure, yet entirely and always permeating, infiltrating and animating this body or the form of spirit life. To our mind, soul is the essential principle, the essence of all life that animates this aggregation of elements, forces and activities which you call the human being.

As we have learned in our studies upon the spirit side of life and now understand it, the soul may be likened to A FLAME OF LIGHT, brilliant and beautiful in appearance, if you could behold it—potential in its power—and that principle which, coming in contact with the universe of activity, gathers to itself the elements, forces, particles and atoms which are necessary for the building up of form. The soul-flame attracts to itself these magnetic forces and elements, and is the electrifying force which permeates all life. This is our conclusion, after giving close study to the subject for many years.

VIVIFYING LIGHT.

We are taught that the great source of all life and being is itself light—glorifying, vivifying light—that permeates all being—the entire universe—and makes its power felt. That the soul of humanity is the offspring of that central fount and source of all light; that this great central sun—if we may so call it—contains the potency of all intelligence and activity and all the various principles which we understand by the terms love, truth, wisdom and power; and this luminous central force produced that which we call the soul life of sentient, conscious being as manifested not only in the form of man but in various forms and degrees in this life with which you are familiar. Emerson has most beautifully addressed the infinite life as the "Oversoul"—grand, glorious and glorifying—brooding upon the waters of the great deep; and above all that the universe contains, permeating these with its life-giving force.

THOUGHT OF THE EARLY MAN.

In ancient days it was the custom for the early man to worship the sun as the great luminary of life itself, as the vivifying force of all being, and, knowing nothing of the interior qualities of spiritual life, this primitive man, realizing the potency of the sun in its course, bowed before it and made sacrifices to that grand central power of light. In this there is a substance and form of truth, for even primitive man, groping for an understanding of nature and of his own life and being, was intuitive in many directions. He felt the force of life, yet could not interpret it. He felt the mystical qualities of its vivifying power, but did not realize whence it came. Starting within him were the elements of adoration and worship of something which he could not take up in his hands or come in contact with in his rude existence, in the varying forms and conditions of material life. But the greatest power, the grandest expression of force and of beauty, of helpfulness to himself and people, he saw in the rays of the sun.

PRIMITIVE MAN VIEWING NATURE.

In the spring, he beheld the frozen waters of the deep breaking up and changing form and manifestation, coming into active life and leaping forth in beauty to satisfy his thirst; he beheld the ground, arid and cold and dark as it had been, springing up with beautiful flowers, which covered it with a carpet of splendor. He realized that here was a principle of life which though he did not understand must have been helped into expression by the warming and vivifying rays of this grand sun. And so, as summer came upon him with its warmth and grandeur, with its blush and bloom and beauty, giving to him the products of nature, he also recognized that the power came from above and that the sun of light with its splendor and heat had the power to produce this wonderful effect.

So with autumn and her productions. This man turned naturally to the source of the heat and power, to the fructifying source of life itself, as he beheld it in nature's works, and gave reverence to it as one gives reverence to that which is more glorious and grand than he can reach.

The primitive man received within himself the thought of something great and glorious and all-powerful; and, as we have observed, he was intuitive—he felt these conditions and the spiritual impulse within, and expressed them as best he could.

The soul, we claim, IS A FLAME OF LIGHT; or, we might say, that it in its incipience—before it has reached out through human expression and experience—is a point of light, a spark of brilliancy so glorious that it would dazzle your mortal eyes could you behold it. Even the point of light, that is a soul principle—an element of power that permeates or is invested within the lowest form of human being that you can imagine—would, were it withdrawn and revealed to your mortal sight, appear so brilliant and dazzling that you could not behold it clearly, could not realize its potency.

WHENCE COME HUMAN SOULS?

Whence come these points of light which we call human souls? Who shall say? What finite mind can interpret and explain the source of being? When mind can reach out and come in contact with the central source of all power and intelligence and explain the infinite wonders of life itself, and from whence these soul-germs come, that mind is infinite and can not come in contact with finite life to give intelligent understanding of these wondrous works. Therefore, we do not claim to explain whence these soul-germs come—these points of brilliancy that are destined to flame on and on through one form of expression and another, vivifying and revivifying human entities until they also become Godlike in power and expression. But this we do believe; that they come from the infinite source of all being—the Oversoul—the central light that we call God.

It matters not by what name we reverence or call that which is infinite; it matters not if you, on the one hand, are pleased to term it Nature, and say: "I worship Nature, and my religion is the religion of naturalism;" or if you, on the other hand say: "I believe in God. I worship the Supreme Being—my ideal. My idea of infinitude is of a grand, supreme intelligence, majestic, magnificent in expression and power." It matters not by what term that great central source of light is called. We believe that all recognize intuitively, instinctively, that there is a supreme power permeating this universe of ours and that design, order, grandeur of expression are manifest on every hand.

One can not look out into the starry night and behold the magnificent display of the heavens, realizing how these stars and worlds outnumber all human conception of figures, and believe that this is all by chance, and that there is no hand of design, no infinite mind, spreading out these glories to your view and marking each world, each star and each system with its own power for the grandeur of eternal expression and of being.

MANIFESTATION OF DESIGN.

One can not walk forth in the fields of nature, when the spring-time spreads her garments of verdure abroad, and rippling waters tell of life, beauty and harmony on every hand; when the summer time with ruddy glow presents her beauties to your inspection and gives you the color, the richness, the glory of a perfection which man can not portray; or when autumn time reveals her fruitage upon the bough, her splendor and richness upon the hilltops and in the valleys; or even when winter's snow and ice are on every hand locking the streamlets and clouding the wayside with the feathery snow—one can not behold any of this panorama of the seasons and believe that it does not manifest design. The passing seasons show beyond the shadow of a doubt that design, order, utility, and all that goes to make the manifestations of intelligence are portrayed there by nature's works, and therefore it matters not whether you say it is "law," or "infinite force," or "divine intelligence," or "nature working through the various forms of expression," or "God;" it is all one and the same: the SPIRIT, grand, beautiful, majestic, manifesting power through every atom and by every manner of manifestation.

The life of the soul is that which this point of light—this supreme brilliance of which we speak—gains for itself in unfolding processes, through different forms and manifestations of being which we call human, and which belong to the various planes of existence.

SOUL GERMS AS PRESENTED TO SOME.

Let us tell you how the soul germ appears to the spirit eye. There are spirits, human beings who have passed out from the mortal; you are all spirits encased in mortal flesh, but we are speaking of some who have passed out from the mortal and who are apart from the conditions and environments of the material life. There are many spirits who have never seen a soul germ; they know nothing about it, and if asked concerning the same would be pardonable if they claimed that there is nothing of the kind, because they do not see and have not come in contact with them. Some day, undoubtedly, those very individuals will have so advanced that they will see and recognize these elements and forms which we call the "soul germs." Others—many of whom are high teachers—are familiar with them; THEY ARE GUIDES, IF WE MAY USE THE TERMS, AND SOME OF THEM HAVE A NUMBER OF THESE SOUL GERMS IN CHARGE, DIRECTING THEM HERE AND THERE BY MAGNETIC WILL FORCE, AND THEN BRINGING THEM INTO CONTACT WITH HUMAN LIVES ON EARTH BY AND THROUGH WHICH THEY ARE TO GAIN EXPRESSION ON THE MORTAL PLANE.

Now, then, we will describe as well as we can how a soul germ appears to a spirit intelligence who beholds it. But you must remember that in describing anything belonging to the spiritual states outside of matter we are obliged to make use of your terms and expressions, your language, your similes, and all that you can understand, because were we not to do so, that which we would try to interpret to you would be foreign, as if spoken in some dead language which you could not possibly understand; therefore, in using your terms of expression you will at once concede that it is not possible for the spirit to give full description of that which appeals to one on the other side of life where we are not confined to mortal phraseology and are not obliged to make use of terms which are of the earth earthy.

SOUL GERMS DESCRIBED.

Then we shall say that a soul germ appears to be like a brilliant point of light, scintillating, sparkling, and that it is covered or enveloped by a white, vapory substance that is very clear and beautiful, of a milk-white color. When this first appears to the sight of a spirit it is somewhat in the form of a small fig, and in the center of that substance is the point of light which is really the soul-flame, or the principle—essence—of life. When we call anything the essence or essential quality, we mean that which is the most vitalizing, that which is the most powerful, that which is the all in all, and that which produces the particular substance or object of interest. The essence of the flower is its perfume—its spirit—and because of that essence the flower is odorous to you and a thing of pleasure.

The soul principle, then, or this point of light—which is the vivifying power enveloped in this vapory substance and shining brilliantly through the same—has attracted to it these elements and forces, magnetic in character, from the atmosphere and the conditions of life around it, and formed this envelop for its sustenance and protection. This substance of a magnetic character may be likened to the substance surrounding the germ of an acorn. Nature's work is true and exact in its processes of upbuilding and unfolding, and as true and exact in its processes of building up a human entity and bringing forth into expression the human being that we know as a co-ordination of the forces and elements, or spirit and mind—of intelligence, consciousness and expression—as it is in building up the oak tree from the tiny germ, which the acorn contains. We deal with scientific problems when we deal with the soul life—with the spiritual being—and when we deal with the external form and its manifestations here in material life.

GROWTH OF SOUL GERM.

So nature is working in her own beautiful way—Nature, God, Intelligence, Force—whatever you may call it—is doing this work, and the soul-flame sent out into the universe from its central source of light, gathers to itself—for it has within the power to attract the magnetic elements and forces to form this covering of which we speak. Opening the acorn which lays in your hand you perceive the tiny germ within; you know that germ is the life of the plant, that it is to unfold, to grow, to come into expression; and the substance around that germ, which you behold as the nut, is that which the germ will feed upon during the processes and waiting time of nature, when it is covered by the soil, before it has gathered the strength and power to manifest itself by coming above the surface of the earth as a tiny expression. You open a grain of corn and you find the germ there surrounded by a milky substance which it has to feed upon until it gathers strength to put out its rootlets and become a stalk which shall bear ears of corn for your sustenance and gratification. So with the soul life; it is along the same exact processes until the soul gathers its forces and comes into expression.

As we have said, this soul-germ appears like a point of brilliant light in the midst of this magnetic substance which it has for its support; that it is in form somewhat like a small fig, and by and by this substance increases; instead of decreasing it gathers to itself new elements from the atmosphere and this increases its size, but it retains the same shape, and after a time it comes to look something like a beautiful pear, only it is still of a white, vapory appearance and substance. The point of light feeds—so to speak—upon this magnetic envelop; it absorbs it; thus the light grows in size and power, and develops new possibilities—rather it is putting out its potency, for, coming from the great principle of all light and being, it must be charged with potential qualities, with electrifying force; and as it feeds upon this magnetic supply which is of its own it develops and throws out greater beauty and power, until by and by, following the law of attraction, just as surely as all things in life must follow that same omnipotent law, this soul germ is swept into the atmosphere along the currents of expression of some human being upon this mortal plane; in this magnetic environment or aura it becomes absorbed, and then will come the processes of gestation and of growth in a material sense. The soul becomes absorbed by this co-ordination of forces that is creating a mortal form, and when the life principles—the positive and negative elements—are blended together, this soul germ, seeking expression through these outlying forms, comes into active conscious life on earth.

LIFE OF THE SOUL.

This is the life of the soul, as far as we can follow it to the mortal state; but the life of the soul, we might say, is only just begun; that is, provided that soul germ comes fresh from the infinite life to the mortal state of earth. It may have passed through various forms of expression in other worlds, on other planets; we do not know.

There are those which have, and which do not come in that soul germ or form of which we speak; but we are confining our description to the soul germ we have reason to suppose has had no expression through any form of activity and consciousness of which we can become aware. Therefore it has now come into the outer manifestation of life on earth. It has the power to vivify and animate this co-ordination of elements and atoms, spiritual impulses and magnetic forces, which we call a human entity. All this aggregation of forces has built up a mortal form and this form is endowed with various qualities and powers, partly drawn from the spiritual, largely drawn from the material life.

PARENTAL LIFE AND ANCESTRY.

As the soul comes into contact with this magnetic life of the parentage, being sensitive and subjected to various vibratory forces, it comes also under the influence of that which belongs to the parental life, consequently as it takes upon itself these varying conditions of materiality it also takes upon itself in a measure those qualities which belong to the parental life and even to ancestry—these vibratory forces working through and upon this growing child create conditions which we call the conditions of heredity, and thus we find the child may exhibit traits and characteristics which have not been shown by either parent, or by both, but by those who are of more remote ancestry; but all the while the soul maintains its brilliancy, its own subjective and creative power.

THE SOUL CAN NOT BE DESTROYED.

The conditions of earth may be such—and also those of heredity—through the material processes of life, as to cloud this soul power; as to in a measure cramp and gather around it that which we may call a shell. It may seem to be for the time crystallized so that it can not give out this scintillating, radiating power which makes for good; but all the while the soul is there—it can not possibly be destroyed—it knows no fear. The soul itself is of the Infinite; it can not be lost, whatever its conditions or lack of growth.

The life of the soul, then, begins to enlarge—if we may so express it—when this vital flame, that is only a point of light, surrounded by the substance of magnetic force which we have mentioned—first permeates every part of the growing child. If the soul life is withdrawn, or if there is that which severs the connection between this soul germ and the physical form during the period of gestation, you will find that when the child is born it is dead, there is no life or animation—it is simply a little speck of clay. But if the soul germ takes possession through the magnetic aura of the mother, and this little principle of life which is produced by the co-ordination of forces through the parental conditions, then the child is alive, and this soul-germ begins its work. It begins from that little point of light to send out radiating lines just exactly as the rootlet of the tree sends out its radiating root lines until it can throw out the grand and beautiful conditions of leafage and fruitage and helpfulness for the earth. These little radiating lines, coming from the central speck of brilliancy, pass through every fibre and nerve and condition of the human form, and it is this soul life which is not only the radiating force and animating power, but it is this which enables a human entity to grasp the conditions of life and to understand them.

As we have said before, the soul life may be cramped, may be crowded back, may be held from the development which belongs to it, and so the human being may go tottering along in this mortal life, and perhaps be a mere semblance of what a human life or form should be, but nevertheless it exists and because of this the machinery of the human body and the mental action of the brain may go on and do their work, by greater or lesser degrees, according to the case.

THE SOUL HAS A WORK TO DO.

But the soul has a work to do—it is busy. This human body must be fed. We do not mean by the external forms of sustenance, but we mean by spiritual elements, by the forces and qualities that are gathered from the atmosphere, mental and spiritual. This human body requires something more than the bread, meat and raiment which you find here in physical life; it must have something gathered from life itself, from nature, which will give it the strength to make its way in the world. The soul-flame has charge of this duty. It still has its attractive force, just as when a speck of light emitted into infinite space, it gathered magnetic qualities to itself and then the envelop that enabled it to come into contact with this external life. Just so it has the attractive force now, while permeating you as human beings, to gather to itself elements and atoms and forces which enable it not only to benefit these external bodies but to build up the spiritual form which hereafter it will claim in grander worlds than this.

THE SOUL FLAME AND MIND.

This flaming light or force which we call the soul, as we have intimated, permeates every nerve and tissue, and there is not an atom in your body but what is vitalized by it; there is not an element in your spiritual bodies that are being built up now, but what is animated by this vital flame of being, and as you go forth from day to day this wonderful creative, upbuilding force is constantly at work. It can not die, and never sleeps. The soul can bring you into a condition by which you may secure rest that is needed by the external form, and, when your body is gaining repose, when your eyes are closed in slumber, the soul life is moving constantly on and under its influence you may project yourself out of the external form into contact with other lives and other realms, gaining knowledge and consciousness of being, which, though you are unable to bring back into this outward thought and line of expression called the daily life of earth, yet remain with you registered in soul life, and which you will find by and by helpful to an understanding of existence in the spirit spheres. This soul life will continue to animate the consciousness and enable you to express that which is within.

We understand and realize that conditions of mortal life have a great deal to do with assisting in this up-building process. We know that education, opportunity and all the various conditions which go to assist a human being in reaching onward here in mortal life have much to do with the unfolding and the expression of the human mind. But the soul flame itself is that which sets the mind in motion, enables it to attract to itself forces from beyond, to develop others from within, and thus give the mentality power to manifest itself in wondrous forms of achievement throughout the universe.

The life of the soul, then, while it is within, while it is the great motive power of your being, is that which is independent of these atoms and forces which you behold around you, for this soul flame or light—this principle of being with its attractive power drawing to itself all that is necessary for its expression on earth—exists out in the realms of space long ere it comes into this external form to give manifestation of life.

SOUL AND SPIRIT DEFINED.

There are those who claim that the soul is the product of matter. We make a distinction between "soul" and "spirit," and claim that neither is the product of matter, but that matter, or the co-ordination of atoms and forces into substance or objective life, which we call matter, is itself the product of spirit, and that spirit itself could not exist except for the vital flame which we call the soul, animating, attracting, drawing it together, bringing it into form and substance in conjunction with this building up of the material body which we see on earth.

We chose this subject to give you some idea, brief and feeble though it may be, of the various and wonderful processes which we behold in the spirit that pertain to human life and consciousness. The soul flame of being will by and by have had its experience with this mortal form, or, rather, you will have had your experience as co-ordinated human entities under the animation of the soul flame. By and by you as human beings will leave the outer shell and will be drawn onward, still vivified by this soul flame of light, and still enabled because of it to pass out into realms of usefulness and power to gain your advancement and your spiritual growth. Without it there would be no coalescence; without it there would be no coherence; chemical affinity would be unknown; the law of attraction itself would not be; but with it all things are possible, for it is the offshoot of that great supreme life which is the "all in all." Thus do we claim that we are a part of the supreme; thus do we claim we are called to live in the living presence of the omnipotent power; thus do we claim we have the right to call ourselves children of the living God, for it is true that from that great central source cometh every flame of light—every soul that finds expression here or elsewhere in the vast universe.

SPHERES OF LIGHT.

We are told that there are intelligences in the realms of space so beautified, so perfected, that were they to approach you in their majesty and splendor you could not behold them as anything but spheres of light, and yet they have the divine qualities of intelligence—the human qualities unfolded, evolutionized unto the divine—so magnificent we cannot compare them to anything else than the qualities of a God. These are human entities—if we may employ the term—and they appear like spheres of light to those who are not upon the same plane of vibration and of progression as themselves; and this proves to us that the soul life is of the flame, that it is the light of infinity that blooms and blossoms into grandeur in its expression as shown to you in the glowing stars above your heads that march in matchless beauty through the ages, each true to its course and to its work.

THE GLORY OF LIFE.

These are the thoughts brought to our minds as we seek to study the majesty of being, the grandeur of existence, the glory of life. Think of it. Cradled here in the arms of Mother Nature, rocked to and fro by her convulsions and by what may appear to you to be her spasmodic conditions of life, probably as most mortals, amidst the dark, damp conditions of materiality, groping on, trying to reach through the darkness of ignorance and seeking for light; searching ever here and there for some treasure that shall be for your uplifting; ever pressing onward with burdens upon your backs, and with bowed heads because the storms of life center upon you, you may be pardoned if you feel that after all life is hardship—life is not to be desired; but when you realize that you are children of the living God; when you realize that it is not this external form of clay, even though its elements and atoms and particles, its tissues and forces, are drawn from the infinite storehouse of nature and given out by her bounty and goodness, but that it is the soul flame that has sprung directly from the infinite power of all being, and that you are creatures that may press onward, magnificent in power, splendid in achievement, grand beyond the telling in aspiration, springing ever onward and upward to higher fields of conquest and attainment—then you may realize that it is grand indeed to be alive.

Yea, my friends, it is glorious beyond expression to realize that we are not of the common clods; are not a ball of earth rolled into a certain form and battered here and there by the conditions of life that we behold around us, but that we are the light, the glory, the power of infinite love; that we are a part and parcel of the beauty, splendor, holiness, wisdom, truth, intelligence, and all that goes to make up Omnipotence; that we are living souls, moving onward and can attract to ourselves that from the universe, from the atmosphere, from all life, which is uplifting, which is conducive to unfoldment, which helps onward to higher things, because the soul flame within is the attractive force. When we realize this—that the soul life is the real or attractive force—we may gather to ourselves from the universe those things which we need, those which we must have for the development of divinity within our lives; and this we can do as we study ourselves and our conditions, as we come into accord with life and into harmony with mankind. Thus shall we climb on and on, not content to remain here as children groping in the dark, but aspiring to become men and women in the proudest, grandest sense; men and women of courage and power; men and women of trust and faith in things divine; men and women who have within ourselves the potency and possibility of accomplishment, of achievement—not children crying because there are little obstacles in our way and we can not overcome them, but men and women secure in our assurance of strength that we shall overcome, that we will surmount the obstacles, that the impediments must be removed by positive action of the life itself. Thus day by day, undaunted by that which may seem a mistake or blunder or failure, but only girding up the inner powers for new effort and new achievement, we shall march on, FINDING THAT AFTER A WHILE THE IMPEDIMENTS ARE OVERCOME, THE OBSTACLES ARE SURMOUNTED, THE HEIGHTS ARE CLIMBED, THE GLORY OF THE STARS WITHIN OUR REACH, AND THAT WE ARE CHILDREN OF THE LIVING GOD, FULL OF THE SOUL-FLAME, OF MAJESTY, OF LOVE, OF WISDOM AND INTELLIGENCE—ON, NEARING STILL CLOSER AND CLOSER TO THE DIVINE LOVE OF THE FATHER AND MOTHER OF US ALL.

CURES DEAFNESS AND CATARRH

ONLY ONE REMEDY IS CERTAIN AND THAT IS "ACTINA."

Deafness is the direct result, in 95 out of every hundred cases, of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The effect of catarrh is to fill up and clog the air passages with deposits, these in a short time stopping the action of the vibratory bones. Deafness ensues, and the hearing cannot be restored until these deposits are removed. It is impossible to reach the inner ear by probing or spraying, and that is the reason why the greatest aurists and physicians find their skill baffled. But science has discovered a way to reach these heretofore inaccessible portions of the head. This discovery has been named "Actina." It is a vapor current which, passing through the Eustachian tubes attacks and dissolves the clogging catarrhal deposits, so that they pass away, and at the same time loosens up the bones (hammer, anvil and stirrup) in the inner ear, so that they immediately respond to the slightest sound vibration. Ringing noises in the head are also caused by catarrh, and are the premonitory signs of deafness. "Actina" never fails to cure this distressing affliction; we have known cases of years' standing to be cured in three weeks. "Actina" is also a certain specific for asthma, bronchitis, sore throat, weak lungs, colds and headache; all of which are either directly or indirectly caused by catarrh. "Actina" is sent on trial postpaid. Write us about your case. We give advice free, and positive proof of cures. Professor Wilson's 100 page Dictionary of Disease, also sent Free. A NEW CATECHISM,
BY M. M. MANGASARIAN.
This is a new "Catechism" in the full sense of the word. There has as yet appeared in the world of liberal literature nothing like this most wonderful little book or reason. E. P. Powell, the well-known author, the reviewer and critic, says: "The remarkable thing about this 'Catechism' is that it tells the truth." It deals with the questions of God, Immortality—the Creeds, the Clergy, the Church, Prayer and Salvation, Jesus and his Teaching, the Growth of the Christian Scriptures, and many other philosophical, scientific and ethical questions with the utmost candor, courage and clearness. 188 pages. Cloth 75c; paper, 50c

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH,
Or the Future Life According to Science. By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French by S. R. Crocker. A very fascinating work. This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author says: "There is a true and respectable idea in Spiritualism," and regards as proved "the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of earth." Price, $1.50.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Chicago Spiritualists are making ready for another good time in the way of the fourth annual Grand Prize Masquerade Ball and Psychic Entertainment, to be held at St. George Hall, No. 3337 State street, Saturday evening, Feb. 6. This hall is extra large and on the ground floor, and absolutely safe. Thirty prizes will be given. For prize list and programme, address W. J. Elmo, 40 East Thirty-first street.

A Buffalo (N. Y.) paper says: "Last night's session of the Spiritualist meeting proved to be one of the most interesting that has yet been held. After the opening exercises, Mrs. Reynolds gave a discourse on the comforts of Spiritualism, pointing out how people who had at first been disposed to scorn Spiritualistic teachings had later come to believe in them and receive comfort from the messages of those who had gone before them. Mrs. Reynolds was followed by the Rev. George R. Lersch, who spoke at some length on materialization and spiritualization in the phephenomenal. His was an interesting talk and he was frequently applauded. Then was sung a song, after which spirit messages were given by F. Corden White. The meeting closed with Mrs. Reynolds pronouncing the benediction."

The Evening Post of San Francisco, Cal., says: "Fred P. Evans, known all over the world as the famous psychographist, or slate-writer and clairvoyant, has returned to San Francisco after an absence of seven years and has selected for his home and office a magnificent location overlooking Jefferson Park, 1112 Eddy street. During his travels, particularly in New York City, his success among the 'smart set' as well as the leading occult students was phenomenal, but the professor prefers living in San Francisco, his former home, where he is well known."

Andrew G. Johnson writes: "I wish I could fully express my appreciation of the paper, and my only regret is that I did not know of its existence until a year ago, and no doubt there is a great many people in the United States today, that are not aware that a really liberal and progressive paper is printed. All the premium books are worth several times what you ask for them; but I especially like Hudson Tuttle's Religion of Man, as I think it wholly free from fiction."

The Chicago Chronicle of Jan 22, says: "Spiritualism was given as the cause of Mrs. Emma A. Lett, 4021 Lake avenue, losing her mind. She was declared insane at the detention hospital yesterday morning."

Dr. J. C. Phillips, the healer and psychometrist, writes from Clinton, Iowa: "Mrs. Berry, of Philadelphia, is speaking very satisfactorily for the society here at present and giving tests at close of each lecture."

A St. Louis paper says: "August Schneider and Miss Vella Grissinger, who were married Tuesday morning, departed from conventional methods when they called upon the Reverend Mrs. Josie K. Folsom, pastor of the Olive Street Spiritualist Congregation, and were married by her. While this is not the first marriage in Missouri in which a woman has officiated, it is perhaps the first in St. Louis, and certainly the first among the Spiritualists. The Olive Street Spiritualist Congregation has been in existence since last October. It has a membership of 200 persons and meetings are held Sunday afternoons and evenings in Howard's Hall, at Olive street and Garrison avenue. The Reverend Mrs. Folsom has been in charge since the congregation was established. Mrs. Folsom was ordained a minister of the Spiritual gospel in Springfield, Mo., in March, 1897, by J. N. Bell, then president of the Progressive Spiritual Association of Missouri, which is chartered under the laws of the state. Since then she has officiated at many weddings and funerals, possessing the same authority in such cases as other regularly ordained ministers."

H. F. Coates writes: "Sunday, Feb. 7, Mr. H. F. Arnold will lecture for the Church of the Spirit Communion, at Kenwood Hall, 4308 Cottage Grove avenue. Mr. Arnold has occupied our platform before and all who have ever heard him will welcome him again. Our church will change speakers each week and by so doing will give you a variation of thought. Dr. Hewitt, who has been with our society so long, and served it so well, leaves the city to serve the society at Muncie, Ind. Nothing but good wishes follow the Doctor for he has proved himself both as a man and teacher."

The Rev. Dr. Charles A. Briggs evidently is a disturber of theology. He began his disturbances upon the occasion of his installation as professor of biblical theology in Union seminary of New York nearly thirteen years ago. Upon that occasion he startled the presbytery of New York by claiming divine authority for reason in scripture interpretation, that the church apart from the scriptures is a source of divine authority, and that there are errors in the Bible; by discrediting Old Testament and Messianic predictions, and particularly Moses and Isaiah; and finally by setting up the doctrine of redemption after death.

The American says: "Paris, France, has been producing a large crop of prophetesses or sorceresses, or clairvoyants, or people who claim to reveal the future by cards and kindred ways. There are at least twenty of such who are well known. Two claim to receive their knowledge from higher powers; one from an angel, the other from an archangel. Mlle. Couesdon, for instance, asserts that her inspiration comes from the Angel Gabriel; Mme. Clavel-Gracien goes higher still and would have us believe that Michael the Archangel discloses the future through her. Discussing with the American correspondent the condition of affairs in France, this pretentious prophetess said: 'Dreyfuss will be rehabilitated, but he will disappear suddenly. Something will occur to bring this about. Mme. Humbert, another disturbing element, will be let out of prison next year because of illness. She will be nursed in a hospital. Her case will be taken up again and more scandal will follow. The Combes ministry will fall during the coming year. Men like him, but women hate him, and they will succeed in influencing their husbands and brothers to put him out of power. He will be succeeded by a milder man, who is an unknown. A Paris theatre will be burned, and there will be many victims. A great fire will break out in a big establishment on the grand boulevards, and many will be burned to death. There will be avalanches, floods, fires in the provinces. The Royalists will grow active and increase their plotting. But the Republic will survive it all.'"

Mrs. Susanna Harris writes: "Since my return from Indianapolis, I have again taken up my work with the West Side Church, Columbus, Ohio, giving test and trumpet seances. I would like to hear from societies wishing my services as test and trumpet medium. Terms reasonable."

Mrs. Virginie Barrett, of Indianapolis, is the guest of Mrs. J. B. Harris, the trumpet medium, of 30 Buttles avenue, Columbus, Ohio. She is lecturing to large and enthusiastic audiences in the West Side Spiritual Church.

Mrs. Hattie G. Webster writes from Columbus, Ohio: "Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Grove, of 277 N. 19th street, Columbus Ohio, left for Los Angeles, Cal., Dec. 20, to remain until early spring. Mrs. Grove's health is reported as being much better in the sunny clime. Mr. and Mrs. Grove are officers and workers in the West Side Church, and they took with them the best wishes of the officers and members of the society. Before going, Mrs. Grove donated fifteen occult books to the society to start a library, and the board of officers will be thankful for donations of occult works from authors and others who desire to assist in spreading the truth. We hope in the near future to establish a reading room in connection with the church and will accept magazines, papers, etc., from those who have them to spare, as donations."

J. T. and Orro M. Barnes write from Owensboro, Ky.: "I have not the gift to express my gratitude to you for the great pleasure I enjoy in reading The Progressive Thinker. I believe it the best paper published. It is food for the soul. I reckon I always was a Spiritualist, but did not know it till we commenced reading The Progressive Thinker one year ago, and I want to tell you it has made our home better. I find it a great renewer of life."

Each human being has a fluid double. This is the assertion of Colonel Albert Rochas, ex-administrator of the Polytechnic school and a well-known physicist of Paris, France. He has just been making some remarkable experiments with hypnotized subjects. In the hypnotic state, Rochas says, this fluid equivalent of the human body rises above the latter and floats above his head, attached by an impalpable cord, like a captive balloon. Several experiments have been made with individuals to prove this. A person was put to sleep and the demonstrator mounted in the room above the sleeping subject and touched the spot to which it was thought the double would probably rise. The result was a piercing scream from the hypnotized individual below. Several hypnotists think that on account of the suffering the subject undergoes from these experiments it will be better to hypnotize animals for further investigation, as it is known that they, too, have this fluid double.

By the use of the power of hypnotism, it is claimed, two unknown men abducted Miss Ruby Brown, 15 years old, from her home in Champaign, Ill., Friday morning. The girl was brought to Peoria on a Big Four train, but in the Union station after her arrival she recovered consciousness while her kidnapers were out in search of a carriage and made her escape through the baggage room. Appealing for aid to a stranger, she learned that she was in Peoria and was taken to the residence of her aunt, Mrs. William Perham, at 1103 Prarie avenue. She left for her home in Champaign this morning. The girl was on her way to school Friday morning. When less than a block from her home a man stepped quickly behind her and seized her by the arms. Another man made several passes before her face with his hands and she lost consciousness. After her escape in this city the police were notified and were given a good description of the men. Her story is corroborated by Conductor Scanlon, who noticed the three persons on the train. Miss Brown is the daughter of the manager of the teaming interests and lives in the best residence district.—Chicago Chronicle.

Mrs. Mary Craig Jacob, 932 North Illinois street, Indianapolis, Ind., is slowly improving after being an invalid for many months. She hopes to exchange her long imprisonment at home for a journey in search of recreation as soon as settled spring weather will permit. She has been a valued member of the First Spiritual Church of her home city, while the friends she has made through her phase of independent slate-writing and independent voices without the trumpet, are legion in number, and scattered from Washington, D. C., to the Pacific coast. She is yet unable to see her would-be patrons. The crowning honor of her thirty years' labor as a medium is found in the loyal confidence of those who know her best. Time has whitened her hair and weakened her physical form, but her soul still glows with zeal for Spiritualism.

TAKE NOTICE.

All books advertised in the columns of The Progressive Thinker are for sale at this office. Bear this in mind.

We go to press early Monday morning, hence communications intended for that current issue should reach this office not later than the previous Saturday morning. Bear this in mind.

H. E. Martin writes from Grand Rapids, Mich., in reference to what will help any Spiritual society to grow:

After much observation, I offer the following conclusions to aid any spiritual society to grow.

1.—Every member should work unselfishly for the good of the society and its cause in all possible ways.

2.—They should be friendly and sociable with each other and should welcome strangers. Every one should be a committee to welcome visitors and strangers.

3.—They should love one another and do away with selfishness.

4.—No member should speak ill of another. We should criticise a person's ideas, not the person.

5.—They should aim at self-development and help and encourage young mediums and speakers to become public workers.

6.—All should lead good, respectable lives.

7.—Practice the golden rule.

8.—All should always work in harmony with the other members according to the sentiments of the majority.

9.—We should not harshly criticise other denominations.

10.—We should sing our philosophy into the hearts of the people. We should have songs for all spiritual occasions; the old and appropriate songs should be preserved, learned and sung.

Moses Whisler writes: "I notice in your issue of Dec. 23, that you have tabled a bushel of the evidence, and as this seems to close the testimony of the witnesses, I am prepared as self-appointed judge to decide the case in favor of the defendants, and I hereby pronounce them innocent of the charges against them as set forth in The Great Psychological Crime."

Menominee, Mich.—In the report of Detective McMillan, of the Pinkerton agency, who was working on the Adams murder case for a long time, filed yesterday with the prosecuting attorney, the detective makes the interesting statement that Mrs. Gust Adams, the wife of the dead man, claims that Mr. Adam's mother warned him of impending danger. Gust and his brother Charles were visiting at their mother's home, and when they started to leave, the mother, with tears in her eyes, told her sons that she had dreamed that some great harm was to befall Gust, and asked Charles to always stay near him to guard him from harm. The detective seems to have been entirely unsuccessful in placing the blame on anyone.

Rev. Flora Heckman, who has been filling the rostrum of the Tacoma Spiritualist Church for the past several months is now in Spokane, Wash., lecturing for the First Spiritual Church of that place. She would like to hear from other societies in the state of Washington. She is at present located at Temple Court, Room 326.

In a studio in Chester, Pa., works Joseph Jeams, Jr., an artist in advanced life, who has in his studio pictures of spirit forms he has captured by his camera. The most noteworthy one is that of a figure unknown to him. He was developing a plate, when he noticed some peculiar lines, and to his astonishment the face and figure of an athlete came into view instead of the person who had posed for the photograph. He was mystified and thought at first that he had inserted an old plate by mistake, but it was fresh from the supply box. It chanced that James Burns, clerk at the Arcade, dropped in, and at once he pronounced the picture that of his old trainer, who had died.—Philadelphia Record.

Hypnotism is in many cases an agent of mischief. The Chicago American has the following from Charlotte, N. C.: "Elwood Bates, the young son of a Pittsburg capitalist, is in jail here while the authorities await instructions as to his disposition from his father. Young Bates disappeared from a Catholic school which he was attending near Pittsburg some time ago, and since then has been vainly sought for by his father. The boy was discovered last night on the stage of a theater here by two priests. He was being used by a traveling hypnotist. The priests recognized him by descriptions sent out from the Pittsburg school, and took charge of him. Afterward the boy escaped from the priests, but was found to-day and placed in jail. Young Bates declares that he was taken from the school near Pittsburg by a hypnotist and forced to accompany the latter over the country, being unable to resist the man's bidding."

The New York Herald says: "Hush, children!" said Mrs. Michael Dissett to her two little ones; "don't I hear your father's feet on the stairs?" It was two o'clock yesterday morning and the mother and children sat huddled together in their home at No. 52 Prospect street, Brooklyn, awaiting, as they had for hours, Mr. Dissett's return. "Yes, it is he, my little ones," continued Mrs. Dissett. "Now he's putting the key in the outer lock." She was rising to welcome him, she says, when the sounds of the key stopped and the footsteps retreated slowly and died away. Mrs. Dissett says she ran to the window and looked out in the street. There was no one in sight. After day dawned the body of Dissett in uniform was brought home from the East River. Captain Alfred Harrington, of the tug Walter Johnson, had found it floating off Washington street, Brooklyn. Dissett was a substitute letter carrier attached to the Manhattan office. He was forty years old.

Mrs. Alice Gehring writes: "I am again located at 644 West 63rd street, Chicago, and ready to work. Circle every Monday night; also Wednesdays at 2 p. m."

A. Hebert writes: "The Spiritualist Alliance of Stockton, Cal., has had with them the last three Sundays, Mrs. Elizabeth Holmes, a medium formerly of Minnesota, and she will remain with us one more week. In Mrs. Holmes we have a medium whom we know we can trust, and who gives nothing but what she receives from the spirit world, and with her clear, convincing messages she consoles many a sorrowing heart. She came up from San Jose, where she was engaged for three months by the society there. If we had many workers like Mrs. Holmes, Spiritualism would surely prosper."

Dr. Freedman, the Australian Healer, has removed to 618 West Monroe street, where he will be pleased to see his friends.

Mrs. A. E. Kibby, the well-known medium, has returned to her home, No. 4 River View, Mt. Adams, Cincinnati, O., where she can be addressed for engagements.

ALWAYS GIVE YOUR FULL NAME AND ADDRESS WHEN SENDING NOTICES AND COMMUNICATIONS FOR PUBLICATION, OTHERWISE THEY WILL FIND THEIR WAY TO THE WASTE BASKET.

Louise E. Zimmerman writes from Elmira, N. Y.: "We wish to report a continuation of the interest in Spiritualism and the work in this vicinity. The Sunday services are given wholly to the philosophy, and the Thursday evening meetings to the phenomena, and, taking the extreme cold and unpleasant weather in consideration have been very well attended. Mrs. Clara L. Stewart, who has been with us as speaker, closes her engagement the last Sunday of January, with best wishes, God speed and hope of a return in the future, of all, to be followed by Rev. Oscar A. Edgerly, of Lima, Ohio, for February and March. Mrs. Stewart's discourses upon Biblical quotations and studies, comparative to daily experiences and incidents, give much food for thought and awaken an interest to better know and understand the true origin and spiritual teachings of that book of books, the Bible; and during her 'heart to heart' talks, as she calls them, there are not many dry eyes among her listeners, which proves her ability to reach the hearts of both the young and older grown children. Mrs. Stewart has also the gift of psychometry, which, at the earnest request, because of the great need and demand of the people, was demonstrated at our Thursday evening meetings, with gratifying results. As Miss Clara L. Slater, her early development in mediumship took place in Elmira, N. Y.; as Mrs. Clara L. Stewart she is widely, well and favorably known as a worker for Spiritualism in the Northwest, having worked many years as a speaker, also served as president of the Wisconsin State Association of Spiritualists, and we bespeak a wider field of labor for her in the future, as she has filled all positions with satisfaction to others and credit to herself and spirit teachers."

Since the world began there has been "fortune tellers." They exist today. According to the Detroit Journal one is at Ann Arbor, Mich. She is a colored woman who has become affluent through forty years of fortune telling. She is called "Mother" Johnson by the students. She lives on the outskirts, in a house on a hill. Mrs. Johnson makes no pretense of possessing mystical powers. She has no secret about the way in which she reads the future. She relies solely on cards, and really believes her curious system is more accurate than her shrewd and really well educated judgment. She began telling fortunes by chance. One day a friend asked her to try her hand at it. She did not know one card from another, yet when she ran through them picking them out in random combinations of color, face, etc., her haphazard predictions proved fairly correct. She has been a fortune teller ever since. Her reputation grew up with the university, and as the students scattered over the United States they did not forget to tell of the fortune teller of their alma mater. Then, too, Mrs. Johnson made some famous guesses that were printed in newspapers all over the country. But she would rather laugh at her successes as good jokes than spend time proudly recounting them. "I just see," she says, "what a good lie I can tell the boys." She has a blind faith in the cards. "I never look to read my customers' faces," she says. "I can read better than my own judgment ever told me out of the pack of cards. Three aces together, for instance, means a change. Some of the spot cards tell me whether this is a change in business; or, face cards will make it change in friends or in lovers. Old men, young men, mothers, fathers, sweethearts, I pick them all from the face cards, kings being old and jacks young men. The color of the surrounding cards, whether dark clubs and spades prevail, or whether the light diamonds and hearts crowd about, prompts me to predict gloom or happiness, if the other combinations are right."

Mrs. G. Partridge started Sunday for Bridger, Montana, in response to an urgent call by old friends. Her many other friends and patrons should make a note of it and address her accordingly.

Residents of Kingsbridge, near the power house of the Interurban Railway Company, New York, have been seeing things lately, and some of them are confident that ghosts are about. According to reports from that section, the misty white form of a phaeton drawn by a horse of the same mystic, transparent make-up, has been conveying the forms of two men around and around the power house every night for a month. The phaeton and its uncanny occupants, so it is said by those who claim to have seen them, make their appearance between 4 o'clock in the afternoon and midnight. Some of the workmen in the power house have quit their jobs on account of the nightly appearance of the spectre rig.

Nicholas Becker writes: "I read the answer of Brother L. O. Hull to Mr. John McKinstry, of Nelson, Ill., in The Progressive Thinker, and knowing Mr. McKinstry cannot now reply, I will take this means of informing you and Bro. Hull that he has solved this question without a doubt. 'If a man die, shall he live again?' I was informed he had passed to the higher life. He has not yet communicated with me as a spirit, and I have not even sensed his presence."

Dr. C. H. Figuers writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "At a business meeting of the members of the East End Spiritual Society, in December, 1903, it was determined to organize a lyceum in connection with the society, and C. H. Figuers was appointed a committee of one to find a hall. After some trouble a hall was secured at 1186 Pearl street, near Clark avenue, and lyceum sessions were begun on the second Sunday in January. At the third meeting there were fifty scholars present. The outlook for this lyceum is very bright. It is the intention of the East End Society to found a mission at 1186 Pearl street, which in time will grow into a self-supporting society. On the first Sunday in February I shall begin afternoon meetings with lecture and messages, beginning at 2:30. Many words of encouragement are given us in the new work, and the officers and teachers are earnest, honest seekers after truth. This is the second lyceum which has been organized by the East End Spiritual Society; the first one, held on the corner of Euclid and Willson avenue, now on Wade Park avenue, is in a thriving condition, and a self-supporting society is the final outcome of the East End Spiritual Lyceum. Next season the East End Spiritual Society will endeavor to organize yet other lyceums. Let us organize and conduct properly more lyceums. This is better than fighting for supremacy in things spiritual."

The Spiritual Progressive Society will give an entertainment at Jos. Heuser's Hall, 576 Larrabee street, corner Wisconsin, Sunday, Feb. 21, at 2:30 p. m. Tests and messages by different mediums and good speakers. Refreshments served; dancing to commence at 8:30 p. m. Tickets 25 cents.

M. C. Whitney writes from Connecticut: "The Progressive Thinker improves with age. I would not know how to do without it. I have enjoyed reading the symposium concerning The Great Psychological Crime. Have enjoyed it more since reading the book. The author writes like one having authority."

The Los Angels (Cal.) Herald says that Robert J. Howard, a veteran of the Mexican war, is now living at the Soldiers' Home at Santa Monica. He is to-day, at the age of 75 years in a fair state of preservation, and tells the following story of how he was cured of blindness. He had been out hunting with a friend, and through a mistake sent a shot through the clothing of his companion. The latter, unfortunately, had the same thing happen to him twice before and became quite angry. The dispute led to a heated altercation, and the weather being miserably cold, with a blustering wind, they did not reach camp until a late hour. The next day Howard's left eye became inflamed, and three days later the right one was affected. The pupils became contracted and, notwithstanding the assistance of best medical aid, a condition of almost total blindness ensued for six years when he was miraculously cured through the agency of a dream. Howard had never seen his mother, and was brought up by his father's relatives. But in this dream he who could only see his finger in outline when placed up to his very eye, plainly saw two women come up the corridor; they parted and one opened his door and entered. Howard says he knew at once that she was his mother, although in life he had never seen her. She came close to his bedside, threw back the coverlet and said, "My son, I will cure you." She tarried only a moment, and walked away as quietly as she had entered. He immediately awoke, rushed to the door, and, to his amazement, could see fairly well. But no one was in sight. From that night on the inflammation reduced and the sight improved. In a week he who had not read a newspaper for six long years, could enjoy that delight. Surely this is an illustration of the divine influence of a mother's love, and a proof of the faith which it can engender.

C. J. Barnes will give trumpet seances at the home of his sister, Mrs. Hamilton Gill, No. 522 Monroe street, 1st flat, twice a week, or by appointment.

W. C. Mann writes from Louisville, Ky.: "On Monday evening, Jan. 25, thirty-two friends of Mr. Val Speed assembled at his residence, it being his 61st birthday. Brother Speed was greatly surprised. He received many beautiful flowers. After congratulations, they all assembled in the back parlor where they were treated to a fine trumpet seance by Mrs. Mary Mann. The messages were many, and very beautiful. After the seance was over, the friends assembled in the dining-room and partook of a bountiful repast that had been furnished by the good ladies. Brother Speed's 61st birthday will long be remembered."

In another column will be found an account of the death of Thos. Lees, of Cleveland, Ohio. Mr. T. Clifford also sends a report from which we extract the following: "Brother Lees was the valued friend of all the prominent speakers and mediums that have graced the Spiritualist platform during the past twenty-five years, many of whom will recall his loving, kindly disposition, his steadfast advocacy of truth, and unswerving defense of the 'new revelation" that robbed the grave of its terrors."

Salvarona writes: "Personally I consider the chapter on 'Marriage,' in the 'Harmonics of Evolution' to be the most sane, helpful, philosophical advice on the subject of marriage that I have over read. Whether we consider the ethics of the subject or its sociology, or its vibratory philosophy or its spirituality, it is obvious that Florence Huntley has laid the foundations for a more profound understanding of this problem of problems. The subject is treated with a lofty dignity worthy of George Fox, and a breadth of modern research worthy of a university sociologist."

W. W. Hawkins writes from Lima, O.: "It is gratifying to notice the impetus which our cause here is now receiving from the ministrations of Mr. and Mrs. White of Detroit, Mich., thus enabling us to once more enter the columns of your world-wide vibratory medium of expression of 'good will to all men,' especially to those whose constant fidelity to the work of dissemination of its most important truth is always present. Their practical demonstrations of both phenomena and philosophy are so truly helpful that a protracted stay is already assured, and we feel certain that all will fulfill their parts. As no canvassing has been done here recently for your paper, a few copies sent to them might lead to an increase of your subscription list."

Dr. H. E. Ballard writes: "The Universal Occult Church holds regular services every Sunday in Hall C, 77 East 31st street; Children's Progressive Lyceum at 2; Conference at 3:30; evening at 8. Although the mercury has looped the loop, yet it did not prevent those hungry for the truth from coming out last Sunday night to feed on the problem of life as given by Prof. Marsh. Robert Gilray will give us further insight regarding the natural law, on the 7th inst. Feb. 14, Dr. Warne will talk to us; this being the second Sunday of the month, a double treat will be offered. At these program services the best available talent that will both instruct and entertain will be secured. We intend to make this a feature the second Sunday of each month during the year. The socials given by the ladies of this church at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Aitken, 253 East 31st street, are worth all the effort it requires to get there; one certainly feels the better for going. The next social occurs Feb. 13. We would like to make an extra effort to increase the circulation of The Progressive Thinker. The people should understand by increasing the circulation of The Progressive Thinker, it increases believers of Spiritualism."

S. L. Lee writes from Washington, D. C.: "I very much enjoyed being rated by The Progressive Thinker as a foolish and credulous Spiritualist. I was curious to know how Spiritualists viewed the magician Kellar. It would be useful and highly desirable to explain the means of distinguishing between the phenomena which a professed Spiritualist would offer as evidence, and the 'tricks which look mysterious' of a Kellar, between the 'foolish and credulous Spiritualist,' and the rational and enlightened believer in manifestations. Kellar is a hypnotist. What more he is—who knows?"

Dr. H. A. Cross writes: "Hyde Park Occult Society has secured Prof. Parker O. Marsh for speaker for Sunday evening, Feb. 7, 'The Problem of Life.' Something good is sure to be given out by this speaker. Dr. P. M. Harmon occupied our rostrum both Sunday evenings, Jan. 24 and 31. He gave us a rare treat in his answers to questions. The ladies are to hold another card party on the afternoon of Friday, Feb. 5, at the art store of Mrs. Silberhorn, 5515 Monroe avenue. The prizes will consist of hand painted china. Tickets 25 cents."

We have received several letters from Beaver Falls, Pa., complaining of the conduct of Geo. W. Renner, trumpet medium. Before engaging his services it might be well for you to write to T. M. Welsh, 1024 Twenty-fourth street, or Franklin P. Houk, 408 Ninth avenue, both of Beaver Falls, Pa.

But makes some green spray sweeter;
There's never a wind inall the sky
But makes some bird wing fleeter;
There's never a star but brings to heaven
Some silver radiance tender;
And neve ra rosy cloud but helps
To crown the sunset splendor;
No robin but may thrill some heart,
His dawn like gladness voicing;
Love gives us all some small sweet way
To set the world rejoicing.

Harry J. Moore writes from Battle Creek, Mich.: "In my last letter I requested you to announce in The Progressive Thinker that I had some time in February and also the month of March open for engagements with societies. This was a mistake. I meant to say April and May, instead of February and March. Am engaged February and March. I now have several Sundays in July, excepting the last one, open for engagements and also the last week including the last Sunday of August, so would like to correspond with camp-meeting associations relative to employing my services covering the above mentioned time. Address me at 323 Garfield avenue."

W. C. Jessup writes from St. Joseph, Mo.: "I have been very busy holding seances in Indiana ever since Camp Chesterfield closed. Mrs. Jessup is secretary of Chesterfield camp this year. She is in Fitzgerald, Ga., at present."

I. S. Getchel, president, writes from Rockford, Ill.: "The Spiritual Science Society of Rockford, Ill., which was organized a few months ago under very discouraging circumstances, having many hinderances to overcome, is proving itself of the right kind of metal to win success, having among its members many respected business men and citizens, who stand firm for the cause of truth and are doing all they can to support it by both money and influence. It is not the large memberships with far-reaching resolutions that count so much as it is the work to win, the everlasting stickativeness that turns chaos into order and defeat into success. Although we have held public meetings but six months, we have raised $465, paying to foreign talent alone $216.75, and for incidental expenses, including hall rent, $210, which speaks for itself. With meetings well attended and perfect harmony existing, we feel that we have much to be thankful for."

Mrs. Thomas M. Locke writes from Philadelphia, Pa.: "The Philadelphia Spiritualists' Society began the year of 1904, with Mr. and Mrs. George W. Kates as our speakers. They have done a good work, and quite a number have united themselves with our society during their engagement. They are aways well received, and though the weather has been severe, the people have manifested quite an interest in their work, and they have made many warm friends while in our city. During the month of February we have Mr. Albert P. Blinn, of Boston; March, Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley; April, Mrs. May S. Pepper, of Providence, R. I.; May, Miss Elizabeth Harlow, of Haydenville, Mass., and with such fine talent we are looking forward to good results for the cause."

Mary Scheltenbach writes: "On Jan. 24, the First German Society of Greater New York celebrated its third anniversary; meetings were held afternoon and evening in their hall, 168 W. 23rd street. Luncheon was served between services. The speaker of the evening was Mrs. Amanda Coffman, of Grand Rapids, Mich. The hall was filled to the doors and many standing in the ante-room. All listened with great interest and much pleasure. After a very instructive lecture Mrs. Coffman gave messages to many, all being recognized. We cannot say too much in praise of this noble worker."

THE AMERICAN MEDICAL UNION.

The American Medical Union at its fifth annual meeting, held in Chicago, Jan. 1, revised the language of the third article of its constitution, relating to members, so as to make it clear that osteopaths, electropaths, vitopaths and adherents of all other systems of therapeutics are admitted to membership on equality with drug dispensers.

This organization gives promise of being able, ere long, to force the repeal of all medical monopoly laws, and restore freedom to the physicians and the people. It surely will, if all who believe in freedom will join it and work to that end.

It is charged by the union that those laws were lobbied through the various legislatures by doctors who expected to hold office under them, and that they are often administered not only despotically but corruptly. Resolutions were adopted by this meeting calling upon the attorney-general of Illinois and the state's attorney of Cook county to prosecute the state board of health for malfeasance in office, and fraudulent practices.

Wanted—100,000 persons to join the Medical Union.

The membership fee is only one dollar, which should be forwarded to

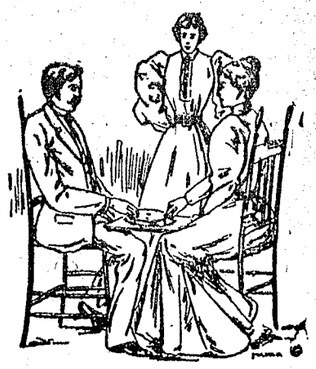
A CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY.



I have been selling "Non-Alcoholic-Flavoring Powders" for the past six months and have made $315.00. Every family buys three or four boxes. The flavoring powders are better in every respect than the liquid extracts, and are lovely to sell. I do not have to canvass. People send to me for the powders. Any intelligent person can do as well as I and average $30.00 per week. I get my flavoring powders from the California Fruit & Chemical Co., St. Louis, Mo. Write them and they will start you in business. E. C.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Passed to spirit life, at her home in Woolstock, Wright county, Iowa, Mrs. Jerusha Perry Higbee, aged 66 years. Mrs. Higbee has long been a sufferer, and often prayed that the arisen ones might call her to the life beyond death. For over fifty years she was a staunch believer in the spiritual philosophy. She leaves, besides a husband, six children, and many friends to mourn the absence of the voice they loved, but to rejoice that another one had been relieved of the suffering attendant upon physical life. Services by the writer.
WILL J. ERWOOD.

Passed to spirit life, January 18, 1904, Mrs. Ann M. Chamberlin, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Elizabeth Harding, at the ripe age of 88 years and 17 days. She was a marked character and a staunch Spiritualist for twenty-five years. She is survived by Mrs. Fegan, Mrs. Harding, of Clinton, Iowa, Mrs. Glasser of Maquoketa, Iowa, and Mrs. Cox, of California. The services were conducted by the Spiritualists of Clinton. DR. J. C. PHILLIPS.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH
—OR—
DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means or developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the several loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

Securely packed, and sent postage paid from the manufacturer, for $1.00. Address:

MAHOMET, THE ILLUSTRIOUS.

By Godfrey Higgins, Esq. This work is one of the Library of Liberal Classics. No author was better qualified to write an impartial and honest life of Mahomet than Godfrey Higgins, and this volume is intensely interesting. It should be read in conjunction with Gibbon's work. Price, 25 cents.

SPIRITUAL HARP

A collection of Vocal Music for the Choir, Congregation and Social Circles. By J. M. Peebles and O. O. Barrett; E. H. Bailey, Musical Editor. New edition. Culled from a wide field of literature with the most critical care, free from all theological bias, throbbing with the soul of inspiration, embodying the principles and virtues of the spiritual philosophy, set to the most cheerful and popular music (nearly all original) and adapted to all occasions. It is doubtless the most attractive work of the kind ever published. Its beautiful songs, duets and quartets, with piano, organ or melodeon accompaniment, adapted both to public meetings and the social circles. Cloth, $1.25; post. 14 cents.

LIFE OF THOMAS PAINE.

By the Editor of the National, with Preface and Notes by Peter Eckler. Illustrated with views of the old Paine Homestead and Paine Monument, at New Rochelle; also portraits of Thomas Clio Rickman, Joel Barlow, Mary Wolstonecraft, Madame Roland, Condorce, Brissot, and the most prominent of Paine's friends in Europe and America. Cloth, 75 cents.

ORIGIN OF SPECIES,

By means of natural selection, or the preservation of a favored race in the struggle for life. By Charles Darwin. Gilt top, cloth bound. This book is the grandest achievement of modern scientific thought and research. It has passed through many editions in English, has been translated into almost all the languages of Europe, and has been the subject of more reviews, pamphlets and separate books than any other volume of the age. Most of the great scientists of the time fully support his position. The thought of this book has become a part of the common inheritance of the race. For sale at this office. Price 75 cts.

LISBETH.

An Interesting Story of Two Worlds.

Elevating, Fascinating, Instructive Throughout.

This work by Carrie E. S. Twing is exceptionally interesting. She well says: "These characters which have brought out the highest and lowest in different religious beliefs, have moved me, not I them." The whole book is interesting, fascinating, and instructive. Price $1.00.

Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated.

A Unique BIBLE PICTURE BOOK.

By WATSON HESTON.

Nothing else can so completely upset the old superstitious Old Testament Stories as these vivid and lifelike portrayals of them. They present the old myths in the proper absurdness of their absurdity, ridicule their ridiculousness and in fact hold them up to the light of reason. It is a book of 400 pages with 200 full page pictures It will make you laugh off every vestige of the old superstitions; a good way indeed to get rid of them. Price, board, $1; cloth, $1.50.

"AS IT IS TO BE."

A VERY SUGGESTIVE WORK.

It Beams With Spiritual Truths.

This is a beautiful book, by Cora Lynn Daniels, and it scintillates with grand spiritual thought. An idea of this work can be obtained by reading the titles of a few of the chapters therein:

The Process of Dying; Light and Spirit; The Law of Attraction; Senses of the Spirit; What Is Unconscious Will; Fear; Astrology; The God-Soul of Man; The Drama; A Day in Heaven. Price $1. For sale at this office.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

Henry Hammon: The best remedy for a bad bread is powdered charcoal, taken into the mouth dry; a teaspoonful twice a day. It is a sovereign remedy, whatever may be the cause, and for indigestion and dyspepsia there is nothing comparable. The charcoal tablets sold by druggists, are more convenient and palatable, and although the absorptive power is diminished answer the purpose very well.

Seth Lamprecht: Q. What is meant by "baptism by fire," as used by Matthew 3:2—"I indeed baptize you with water; he will baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire"?

A. It is an allusion to the purification by fire which almost universally prevailed in ancient times. With the Romans it was the custom for those who sought this purification to pass through or over the sacred flame three times. It is said that in some remote parts of Scotland, this custom lingers, and when a child is brought for baptism, it is swung three times over a fire with the command, "Now burn this child or never."

The ordeal by fire had its origin in this custom. If baptism by water or fire purified, then those already purified it would not harm, and thereby their innocence would be proven. It was a most harmful method and allowed the priesthood to hold the lives of the condemned in their hands, for they could arrange if they pleased to have those who paid them well pass through the flames unscorched.

Wallace H. Moore: Q. I read some years ago of a trance medium, Mrs. Laura Cuppy Smith, unaccompanied by a protector, traveled over the plains to California, passing through various tribes of Indians, some of them hostile at the time, and in every case was treated with great respect. That on entering the domain of any tribe she would be controlled by some departed chief of said tribe and converse with his people in their own language. Is this true?

A. That Laura Cuppy Smith made the journey, as stated, and safely, is authenticated by good evidence. The means used for her safety rest on her own statement. The narrative was published and commented on by the spiritual press at the time, and received without a shadow of doubt.

Laura Cuppy Smith was a speaker, when in trance, of rare ability, and her character was above reproach. No woman or man, could have passed through the hostile tribes, inflamed to madness as they were at that time, and that she went unguarded, in safety, confirms the story.

A. Occult is a term loosely applied to all the floating isms and fancies of the outlying realm beyond actual knowledge. Mysticism, astrology, alchemy, theosophy, legerdemain, necromancy, demonology, all claim that name, and witchcraft, and any form of charlatanry and deception, from the fake lecturer on mesmerism to the "mahatma" spirits who go and come at the call of Blavatskyans.

A new definition may be given the word, the meaning being the study of the spiritual forces of the world, yet the old meaning remains, to cast its degrading shadow on the new. It is passing strange why a body of Spiritualists should prefer "Occult" to Spiritual. Is it possible they think the former name more popular? Is it more comprehensive or expressive? Allow me to quote from the Arcana of Spiritualism what its spirit authors say on this subject:

"Spiritualism has such a load of folly, deception and uncleanliness to carry that I do wish it could receive another name," was the impatient remark ....What has the dross to do with the pure metal? They make a mistake who think the bubbling surface of Scoria a sample of the metal beneath .... Where is there another word that expresses a thousandth part of the many-sided, diverse, yet unitized meaning of this? The basis of all religions is Spiritualism, our hope and evidence of immortal life rest with it.

We might as well say that because the sun shines on slimy pools, oozy marshes and malarial fever-glades, it should not receive that name. Its rays, while they expand the blossoms which fill the air with fragrance, hasten the decay of the festering carcass, or reeking cesspool. They breed the monsters of the slime as well as they develop the poet or the sage.

"If we believe that there is a life after death of the physical body; that that life is an infinite prolongation and evolution of this; that the spirit remains unchanged in being, changed only in conditions; that it may hold intercourse with those in this life, we are Spiritualists. If we believe that this view of nature carries with it the highest, purest, and most practical system of morals; that it is the basis of true religion, expressed in the loftiest phrases of self-forgetfulness in helping others; in noble living from the cradle to the grave, we are Spiritualists. If we refer the fleeting changes we call creation, from the expanding bud to the revolving sun, to force, which thus being made cognizant in matter, carries with it as a corollary that it is intelligent, loving, and wise, planning for a purpose, and pursuing a defined course to an end pre-determined, so pre-determined that man with his finite mind often can calculate what it will and must be; if we give this power, as spirit infinitely expression, we are Spiritualists .. ..There is no word as perfect and expressive in its application to all these varying yet harmonious blending aspects, forming a system of philosophy and science of Nature, as Spiritualism....It is the Tree of Life, like the fabled ash of Norseland, which strikes its roots into the foundation of the material world, and stretches its branches into the heavens. Let us not give the great World Tree another name because a few vagabonds have camped beneath it, and have stolen its fruit, or come to us with Sodom apples under its name. They have their day, but Spiritualism is without day, or year, or limit of duration."

There are psychic societies, "progressive associations," "Magian orders," "mystic circles," "occult societies," etc., and of course if Spiritualists prefer to sail under such ensigns, they are at liberty to do so, yet the solidarity and unity of the movement is broken thereby. These are but offshoots from the main trunk weakening its growth by diverting its vital energies.

If we believe in the facts and philosophy of Spiritualism we should be proud of its name, nor weakly hide our light and ourselves under a pint cup of another name.

S. J. H., Kansas City: Q. What is the occupation of Sam Walter Foss, author of "The Calf Path"?

A. He is Librarian, Somerville, Mass. He has published several volumes, composed in his quaint style, but nothing approaching in its suggestiveness the poem mentioned.

R. Herner: Q. (1) Do you yourself know positively that we live on after death?

(2) Do you yourself know positively that we receive communications from the dead?

Arthor Bounton; Q. Why do you believe in spirit control?

A. I know as positively as I know of any other occurrence. The conclusions of years of observations, study of psychic phenomena, and manifestations received through my own psychic gifts, assure me. If I did not feel certain of the grounds whereon I stand; as certain as in other fields of knowledge, I would cease my advocacy of the cause until assured. If I were doubtful, I should not conceal my doubts, and if it were possible to prove the manifestation false and delusive, I would be first to renounce my belief. I believe in Spiritualism because it is founded on demonstration, and not faith. We must with our limitation accept a great deal by faith, but there must be a foundation, made secure by demonstration, or these beliefs become no more than fancies.

If I attempted to tell why I believe, it would make a long chapter. What mght be to me evidence, would not be to others, and I content myself with educing the varied contributions made to the columns of The Progressive Thinker for the many years since it began, and the volumes published, which have been given me by higher intelligences.

TO THE SPIRITUALISTS OF THE STATE OF INDIANA.

The state convention of Spiritualists of Indiana, has been called to meet in the Madison Avenue Spiritualists' Temple, at Anderson, Indiana, February 26, 27 and 28, 1904.

The purpose of this convention is to organize a State Spiritualist Association.

Every local society in the state is earnestly requested to send delegates to this convention. Where it is impossible to send delegates, societies should send instructions to the credential committee, or to the undersigned, to have proxies appointed to represent them in this most important convention.

Each society will be entitled to one delegate to represent its charter, and one for every ten of its members.

A society of ten members will be entitled to two delegates; one of twenty members, three delegates; one of thirty members, four delegates, etc.

There will be three sessions daily, as follows:

Friday, February 26, 10 a. m., 2 and 7:30 p. m.

Saturday, February 27, 10 a. m., 2 and 7:30 p. m.

Sunday, February 28, 10 a. m., 2 and 7:30 p. m.

The morning and afternoon sessions of Friday and Saturday will be devoted to the business of the convention. The evening sessions of Friday and Saturday, and the three Sunday meetings will be devoted to lectures, music, recitations, spirit messages, tests, etc.

The best of talent has been engaged, as the following list of speakers and platform test mediums will show: Prof. H. D. Barrett of Boston, Mass., president of the National Spiritualists Association; Rev. E. W. Sprague, Jamestown, N. Y., Mrs. C. A. Sprague, Jamestown, N. Y., missionaries of the N. S. A.; Thomas W. Smith, Anderson, Ind.; Rev. Gardner Haines, Anderson, Ind.; Dr. Ida A. Griffin, Terre Haute, Ind. Others are expected.

Mrs. Flora Russell of Alliance, Ohio, whose sweet voice has gladdened the hearts of thousands of people at the N. S. A. conventions, and at the Spiritualist camp-meetings, will be present during the entire time of the convention.

Prof. J. A. Wirtz will have charge of the music, and a rare treat is in store for the lovers of good music.

The Anderson friends will entertain the delegates in their homes, so far as they are able to do so. There are plenty of good hotels and restaurants in Anderson where board may be obtained at reasonable rates.

This will be one of the most important meetings ever held in this state, and with the talent secured must be one of the best ones. Let every Spiritualist of the state, who can do so, whether a delegate or not, arrange to be present, thus helping to make the meetings a grand success.

A School for Spiritualists.

Chicago University Throws Away Its Sectarian Garb.

NO LONGER CREED-BOUND.

The University of Chicago Non-Sectarian—It Permits Perfect Freedom of Thought, and Is a Good Place for Spiritualists to Send Their Children to Obtain a First-class Academic or Collegiate Education.

Why should Spiritualists desire a College, an Academy or an Institute of learning of any kind, when our country is overflowing with first-class non-sectarian schools, thoroughly well equipped with eminent professors and expensive scientific apparatus? Spiritualists could not raise money enough to buy a telescope, to say nothing of other valuable appliances required in a first-class school or college. Expend your money, Spiritualists, in building homes for destitute mediums, orphan children and incurables in our ranks, and send your children to the splendid non-sectarian schools dotting our entire country. The change of front on the part of the University of Chicago marks a new era in the history of free thought, as set forth in the Chicago Daily News.

President William R. Harper announced to the senior class that the university had outgrown its denominational character. He declared that in the nature of its faculty, its students and its methods it had spread beyond its allegiance to the Baptist church. Most of the students and most of the professors, he said, were non-Baptists. All the buildings on the campus were paid for by people of other creeds, he continued, and $99 out of every $100, except that given by John D. Rockefeller, who is a Baptist, were contributed by people not members of that church.

Religious denominationalism in universities, he said, was "narrow-mindedness" and the fact that the University of Chicago had broken away from this class was an evidence of its mental progress.

Stir in Church Expected.

Dr. Harper's remarks are expected to arouse marked surprise among members of the Baptist church. For some time it has been a subject of criticism among other denominational universities that the University of Chicago had virtually ceased to maintain its character as a Baptist institution and that little regard was paid to the creed of professors selected for the faculty. There has also been uneasiness among the more strict members of the denomination and the state conventions of the church throughout the northwest have each autumn sent committees to visit the divinity school and observe its tendency.

The climax came when President Harper addressed the spring graduating class in Haskell assembly hall. A week previously he announced to the class his intention to speak on the religious policy of the university.

Requirements of the Charter.

"The university charter requires that the president and two-thirds of the trustees be members of the Baptist church," said Dr. Harper. "In reality, the University of Chicago to-day is not Baptist. It is not kept up by Baptists alone. It is not attended by a majority of Baptists. Its professors are elected without regard to their religious beliefs. The university is managed on a broader scale.

"Except for the contributions of Mr. Rockefeller 99 per cent of the money with which the institution was built, was given by non-Baptists. Not one building on the campus was given by a Baptist. Cobb, Foster and Kelley halls were given by Universalists, Green and Haskell by Presbyterians, Walker Museum and Kent and Ryerson laboratories by non-church-members.

Cannot Control Religion.

"As to the religion of our professors, the trustees cannot control that. The Baptist church alone could not supply us with enough professors. At faculty meetings where elections are held religion is not mentioned. Denominationalism may apply to small colleges, but not to large ones. Yale as Congregationalist and Columbia as Episcopalian are narrow-minded in that they cling to their forms.

"History made it necessary to call the University of Chicago Baptist. Before it was founded other denominations except the Baptist were supplied—the Presbyterian by Lake Forest, the Methodist by the Northwestern, the Congregationalist by Wheaton and Jacksonville, and the Episcopalian at Racine.

Baptist Was Only Opening.

"The field in Chicago was unoccupied and the Baptists felt they must have a university here. Many Baptists gave money. Mr. Rockefeller gave $600,000 on condition that $400,000 more be raised. Of the latter amount $200,000 was raised and then there was a halt.

"When hope was given up members of the Standard club, composed of prominent Jews, gave $50,000. This brought the project to success. The university would not have existed if it had not been for the Jews. We cannot thank them enough. We have more Jews on our faculty than any other American university.

"Many of our professors are indifferent to religion but not hostile to it. The university will never interfere with the great principles of Christianity and it will always be a Christian institution. But we don't care what a professor's religion might be. That could have nothing to do with his suitability. We are too broad-minded to discriminate against religious denomination."

MEDIUMS' RELIEF WORK.

As It Is Carried on by the National Spiritualists Association.

To the Editor:—We thank you for all your co-operation, and good words extended to the N. S. A., and especially so for your help in the mission of the N. S. A. Mediums' Relief Fund; we are sure that much is is owing to you for your courtesy and helpfulness which, we never fail to receive. In my last letter I stated that a good soul in Arizona sends a dollar each month for the mediums' fund. I should also have stated that Mrs. Mayer, in Connecticut, sends a dollar for the same fund each month that her business receipts will warrant her in doing so, she has only missed one month since she began to report to us. Such faithful souls are worthy of all honor.

Since my last letter, we have received ten dollars for the mediums' relief, which must have been called out from your aid in this good work. Words can not express the good we are doing with the mediums' fund—would that it contained thousands of dollars that the work might be greatly extended. The beneficiaries are more than grateful; each month, in acknowledging the receipt of their money, they send heartfelt thanks and words of appreciation. Mrs. G. F. Perkins—Emeline, the veteran and now helpless medium—has been placed on the list. In receipting for the first monthly payment of this money designated for the benefit of his companion, Brother Perkins writes of the great relief this aid will be, that he is beginning to think Spiritualists are the most generous people in the world—some of us should blush at such unmerited praise—and he concludes his letter by asking what he can do for the N. S. A. to earn the money we are to pay to his companion.

The N. S. A. also sometimes gives temporary aid to mediums who are not wholly unable to work, but who need a little assistance to tide them over a sickness or some financial strait. One such, a well known veteran medium, who has herself often assisted some needy person, has been incapacitated from work for a time, owing to an accident. The executive board, knowing it to be a worthy case, appropriated twenty dollars to her needs; here is her response to our letter and the money:

"Received from the National Spiritualists Association, $20, for which receive my heartfelt thanks—from my spiritual guides, ditto; may God bless you all. I am encouraged to live and use my mediumship for good. I am so surprised at the large sum, I cannot herein express my feelings to you. I pray that I may be an instrument in God's hand's to do much good in the future. I shall use this money for rent this winter. I did not know how I could live as I have suffered so much, now I see; angels will help you."

If anyone who is at all spiritual and who can spare a few dimes or dollars for the mediums' fund—who has not already done all possible in that direction—can read such a letter of gratitude as the foregoing, and not at once send an offering of money to this work, we believe such an one must be lacking in the true instincts of human brotherhood.

By the way, a word as to lyceum work: Brother John W. Ring, of Galveston, Texas, is general superintendent of lyceums under the auspices of the N. S. A. His lyceum paper should be in every spiritual school, and he should be encouraged by every true Spiritualist. I perceive that of late some of our workers are disposed—through the papers—to criticise the N. S. A. that it has done so little for lyceums. Let me remind these friends, that a National Lyceum Union existed a few years, that it was officered by unselfish and competent lyceum workers; that they did their best to enthuse the Spiritualistic public, that they received so little encouragement from the public, they became disheartened; that the N. S. A. did its best from this office to help on the work, all to no avail. If we cannot get Spiritualists to take an interest in the lyceum and to send their children to such a spiritual school, or to aid in organizing such in their locality, the fault is with the public at large and not with any institution.

Since writing the foregoing, we have received a draft for $25 for Mediums' Relief Fund from a friend in Illinois, and two $1 contributions from other friends. Our sincere thanks are returned to them. Sincerely yours,

MARY T. LONGLEY,
N. S. A. Secretary.

SPIRIT FACE ON WINDOW PANE.

Woman Warned by Voice of Dead Friend Finds Profile on the Glass.

Richmond, Va.—Superstitious folk here are convinced that the spirit of Bessie Jenkins, a young woman who died on Christmas eve, has come back to lay the impress of Bessie's pretty face and the features of another woman and a man on the kitchen window of Mrs. Sarah Corbin's home at 1228 South John street.

All day long and at night by the light of lamps crowds standing in front of the house gaze in awe on the three dim shadows showing in line down the center of the polished glass. Mrs. Corbin has attacked the shadows with soap and water and plenty of elbow grease, and the neighbors and the police have lent a hand, but the hardest effort has not blotted out the faintest line in the three profiles.

Mother to the Girls.

Mrs. Corbin is a sort of mother to the neighborhood. All the girls with romances giving joy or sorrow flock to her fireside, and there they pour out their secrets and laugh or cry, as the occasion requires, when the wise old woman gives her sympathetic advice. Bessie Jenkins used to be one of Mother Corbin's best friends.

To Mrs. Corbin it is clear Bessie returned when all was quiet at night and put the features on the window as a token of her love. The faces were found by Mrs. Corbin on last Tuesday, and she says Bessie came to her and whispered to look at the shadowed glass.

"I was sitting in my little kitchen," said Mrs. Corbin, "when all of a sudden I heard a voice, close and clear. I turned my head, but not a soul was in the kitchen but myself. 'Mother Corbin,' said the voice, and I said 'Is that you, Bessie?'"

Told to Look at the Window.

"'Mother Corbin,' said the voice again, and I said, 'What is it, Bessie?' There was an awful silence for a few minutes, and then I heard: 'Mother, look upon your window and see the handwriting.' I looked at the window that you see there now, and there were the faces as plain as day."

Just below the profile of Bessie is a likeness supposed to be that of Annie Wilson, an old woman who died a few days before Bessie. The man's face is supposed to be that of William Goodo, who died a few months ago, and who was one of Mother Corbin's friends.

At first it was thought the pictures were the work of a practical joker, but as it has been found impossible to erase them the conviction is spreading that they were blown in the glass by Bessie's spirit, perhaps in company with the unseen bodies of Mrs. Wilson and Goode.

SUGGESTION.

Excellent Results that Flow Therefrom.

To the Editor:—Your paper of the 5th inst., containing the pathetic appeal from "A Devoted Spiritualist" impels me to give you my experience in some similar cases, hoping that it may be the means of relieving the pitiable condition of the lady mentioned.

For some eight years I have been deeply interested in Spiritualism, mesmerism and occultism, and have read all I could on the subject, and by experiment found that I could mesmerize and relieve those who were in physical or mental distress by means of magnetism and suggestion given while under control.

My first patient was a lady who would be taken with convulsions every eight or ten days, and during the attacks it would take three or four men to hold her so she would not injure herself;

By holding her hands for a few minutes and exercising all the will power at my command, she would become quiet, go into a peaceful sleep, when suggestions appropriate to the case would be given with the result that after a few such treatments the convulsions ceased.

Another case was a ten-year-old boy of a Spiritualist friend who was a medium, as was also his wife and the boy. The boy's health was poor, and he was subject to hemorrhages from the lungs, and was frequently obsessed by his grandmother who had died of lung trouble. The boy was very weak and thin, and his father asked me one evening to see if I could do anything to help him. I was willing to try and after some time got him under control, gave him suggestions to strengthen his will, correct his habits of living and banish all evil spirit influences.

The boy received but one treatment and in three months' time was as strong and robust as most boys of his age, and continued in good health.

Some eight months after treating the boy, his mother sent for me, and on arriving at her home I found her in a deplorable condition. For some time she and a lady neighbor had made a practice of sitting at any and all times for the most trifling motives, which resulted in a VICIOUS SPIRIT GETTING CONTROL, AND THE NEIGHBORS WERE ABOUT TO HAVE HER SENT TO AN INSANE ASYLUM.

She would do most unusual things, and was wild-eyed and nervous to an alarming extent. Taking her hands for a few minutes and then making long passes from head to feet she soon became quiet and went to sleep. She was given suggestions to strengthen her will power and resist all evil influences, and instructed as to the danger in such promiscuous sittings. This one treatment entirely relieved her, and I have not to this day heard of any return of her trouble.

Mesmerism and suggestion cannot be over estimated as a means of relieving physical and mental distress, and should not be degraded by even comparison of hypnotism for amusement or pastime.

If people would take the pains and time to get a thorough knowledge of spirit control, and only employ it in bettering their spiritual condition here and hereafter, there would be no such cases as the one reported by "A Devoted Spiritualist." I believe that any case of obsession can be cured by a good mesmerist, and I hope the Devoted Spiritualist will look one up and get her friend out of trouble.

Tucson, Ariz. E. G. WOODARD.

THE QUESTION DISTINCTLY ANSWERED.

The Boston Citizen says that an advertisement appeared in the Boston Herald and other dailies, having this heading, "Did Catholics Kill Lincoln? A Learned Protestant Divine Answers This Question in Jan. 2, Sacred Heart Review."

People who purchased the above paper must have come to the conclusion that the Roman Catholics did kill Lincoln, for the Sacred Heart Review, despite its startling question, failed to say whether they did or did not. All that the readers found in that paper on this question was five lines, in an article written by that most peculiar gentleman with the oxygenated, or rather, oxy name, "Starbuck." ("Star" and "Buck" are favorite names for oxen with the farmers.) This is not a papal bull.

Mr. Starbuck claims to be a Congregational clergyman, and the Romanist papers advertise him as "eminent," "professor," etc. He is not particularly "eminent," for outside of Romanist advertising, he is very little known. He has no church and is not a professor. The letter which he printed last week was his '84th written for the same paper attacking Protestants and eulogizing popery.

But here is Mr. Starbuck's answer to the query, 'Did Catholics Kill Lincoln?" He says:

"Dr. Christian mendaciously declares that all the persons concerned in Mr. Lincoln's murder were Roman Catholics, whereas it is a public fact that of the four hanged for the murder, one was an Episcopalian, one a Lutheran, and one a Baptist, the son of a Baptist minister."

That is all. In that noted volume, "History of the Secret Service," by Chief Detective L. C. Baker, who had charge of the investigation of the Lincoln assassination, and the arrest of the assassins, we find these words (page 479):

"I mention, as an exceptional and remarkable fact, that every conspirator in custody is by education a Catholic."

There it is: Mr. Starbuck versus the Chief of the U. S. Secret Service. Whom shall we believe?

This we know: Booth was a Romanist; the Surratts were Romanists; O'Laughlin was a Romanist; Spangler was a Romanist; Mudd was a Romanist; Herold professed to be an Episcopalian; and Payne professed to be a Baptist, but both were drunkards and long under the influence of Mrs. Surratt.

But Chief Baker says: "All were under the direct influence of Mrs. Surratt." Booth and Mrs. Surratt—both Romanists—were the conspirators; the other poor wretches were simply their tools.

But why was the article, "Did Catholics Kill Lincoln?" suppressed in the Sacred Heart Review? Apparently it was written, and it was intended for publication; yet after advertising it it disappeared. Is this a case where "Discretion is the better part of valor?" Was not Rome afraid to have the question discussed?

Chiniquy's "Fifty Years in the Church of Rome" and Harris' "Assassination of Lincoln" tell the whole story.

A Remarkable Doctor Book

HAS JUST BEEN ISSUED, ENTITLED

THE NATURE CURE

BY PHYSICAL AND MENTAL METHODS, ILLUSTRATED.

A Bridge from the Old to the New; the Dawn of a New Day in Medical Practice. A Clear, Short-Cut Treatise on the Cause and Cure of Disease.

By MARVIN E. CONGER, M. D.
Assisted by ROSA C. CONGER, M. D.

Nature Cure teaches how to heal by simple home remedies.

It teaches how Nature cures.

It does not use poisonous drugs.

It will save money in every home.

It is entirely free from technical rubbish.

It teaches how typhoid and other fevers may be cured at once.

It teaches how pneumonia, la-grippe, diphtheria and other forms of disease considered dangerous, may be cured in twenty-four hours.

It is, as a medical book for homes, THE BEST, and is up-to-date in every particular.

There is no similar book, no medical, hygienic or reformatory doctor book that compares with THE NATURE CURE.

The light is turned on to objectionable medical mysteries, latin prescriptions, dogmatic theories and dangerous experiments of the present expensive medical practice.

Every pains has been taken to make the leading points so plain that all, young and old, may easily understand. Condensed facts, short, clear-cut paragraphs are some of the attractive features of THE NATURE CURE.

The new and better methods of curing the sick and preventing disease, have never been so clearly stated in plain English for the plain people, as in NATURE CURE.

Our Definition of Medicine.—Any method or remedy that will remove, alleviate or modify pain and restore the sick to normal condition, is practical medicine.

Stripped of mystery and deception, the study and practice of medicine can be carried to success in every intelligent home. NATURE CURE will lead the way to certain success.

The best medical practice is the one that will cure in the least time with the least risk and expense.

Nature Cure is a true exponent of the practice of medicine as defined, and stands squarely upon truth and demonstration, rejecting theories and experiments wherever health and life are endangered.

The book contains 375 pages, and is finely illustrated; the mechanical and artistic work are the very best. Bound in fine English cloth, marble edges, $2.00; common cloth $1.50.

LIFE BEYOND DEATH

Being a Review of

The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,

Leading to the Question as to Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "other-worldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BEYOND THE VAIL

A Sequel to "Rending the Vail."

The two volumes together as a record of practically obtained facts demonstrating the claims of Modern Spiritualism as to post mortal survival, are unique and overwhelming.

Every communication is from a full materialized spirit form, in good light, and either spoken audibly or written in full view by the form. There is not an automatic or trance message in the book.

It is illustrated by several engravings, the originals of which were drawn in the presence of the circle by a full form materialized spirit artist.

BEYOND THE VAIL is, as a rule, authority. Price, by mail, $1.75.

CELESTIAL DYNAMICS,

Being a Normal Course of Study in the Astro-Magnetic Forces of Nature.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE LIGHT OF EGYPT," "THE LANGUAGE OF THE STARS," ETC.

A magnificent and complete course of Astro-metaphysical study, embodying Vital Principles of Life, Mental Force, Sickness and Disease. With the only true and really Scientific method of treating the sick successfully.

Mental Healers, Meta-physicians, and all who practice the Healing Art Divine should give "Celestial Dynamics" a thorough and impartial study, and thus learn the real cause of their frequent failures.

No Astro-Student can afford to be without this work, if he would understand the Meta-physics of Astrology.

This work was specially prepared for publication to meet the demands of a large and very earnest class of people who cannot afford to pay for a regular course of instruction under a qualified teacher. And those who can afford this privilege will find the work an invaluable text-book to their studies.

WISCONSIN WORK AND WORKERS.

In perusing a late issue of The Progressive Thinker I found an article signed by E. W. Baldwin, in which he makes mention of Mrs. Catharine McFarlin, and also a notice from her, stating that she is again free to do platform work. I feel it a duty as well a pleasure as president of the Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association to officially endorse her work. She is now in Plainview, Minn., but is considered a Wisconsin worker. The statement made by Mr. Baldwin is in no way exaggerated, and no society or camp will go amiss in securing her services. Her lectures are instructive and beautiful in every way. In personality she is dignified and pleasing. As I retrospect over the camp work of last summer at Waukesha, I feel a debt of gratitude for her efficient work and general assistance. She filled her position nobly, and many times with much reluctance did I seek her to fill a vacancy in our programme and was always received with a smile and cheerful willingness. Not only is she a fine medium, but is also a good elocutionist, able to assist in entertainments. Her private life is one many might emulate. I feel Mrs. McFarlin should be more widely known.

Mr. McFarlin was superintendent of the grounds and he filled the position to perfection, and for a promoter of fun his equal would be difficult to find. He was the life of the camp. It is rather late to give camp experiences, but others are yet to come and I desire all to know where such capable workers are to be found.

Since assuming the office of president of the Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association I have not written any articles to the papers on the work being done in Wisconsin, or the Great Psychological Crime. I have a weakness for shifting as much of such work as I can upon our secretary (W. J. Erwood), and he is so good-natured he only blandly smiles, shoulders the burden, sets his typewriter to work and tells the people that we are not asleep. Much missionary work has been done by the secretary and myself and will be until the end of the year.

Any place desiring a visit from myself or Mr. Erwood, we will gladly respond if possible. Special effort will be made to attend meetings of note, weddings or funerals. At present we are preparing for the coming convention, to be held in Whitewater in April. This convention is in no way connected with the school located at that place. It is the regular annual convention of the state association. We expect a large attendance. The best of talent will be secured for instruction and entertainment and the business sessions will be replete with matter that is of vital importance to the work of the association. None should miss such an opportunity of assisting in the work, meeting the workers of the state, and visiting the school and witnessing for themselves the grand work being accomplished there, and encouraging those who are so unselfishly working to put our cause before the world in a scholarly way that none will find an opportunity to sneer at the illiteracy of those that are bearing the standards in the struggle for truth.

REV. NELLIE K. BAKER,
President W. S. S. A.
Portage, Wis.

TO WISCONSIN SPIRITUALISTS.

I would like to call the attention of the Spiritualists of Wisconsin to the forth coming convention of the Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association, which convenes in Whitewater, Wis., the third Tuesday in April. While this notice may appear a trifle premature, it is none too soon if we wish to make this the banner convention of our Association, hence my desire to reach all Spiritualists in the state.

It should be the wish of each and every one who is interested in the work of this association to make an effort toward making this convention the success we hope it to be. There are many points of interest to be considered, and the work bids fair to contain more of interest than any previous meeting of similar character, since the Association was organized. Several times I have issued calls for membership. The responses thereto have not been all I could wish, and I hope this call will not be without the hearty response and support our association so richly deserves. If every Spiritualist within the state of Wisconsin, who reads this would sit down and write in for membership, and become one with us, I am sure our cause in Wisconsin would meet with such success as has never been experienced.

It would seem hardly necessary to inform the Spiritualists of Wisconsin that there are no salaried offices in this association, therefore the membership fees do not go to enrich the pockets of any of the officers or trustees. Money received must be accounted for at each convention—therefore it is in the hands of the Spiritualists to assure themselves what has been done, and how the finances have been expended. I simply make this little explanation for the benefit of those who are not aware of the facts of the case.

Spiritualists of Wisconsin, this is your association and its success or failure depends upon you as a whole and individually as well. Will you not, then, show your interest in the cause you love by enabling us to carry on the work as it should be carried on. Become members of the State body. As you well know, it takes but one dollar a year to secure personal membership.

I am sure most of the Spiritualists wish to see their association live, and have simply forgotten to take out personal memberships, or to renew the same where they have become delinquent. We have over two months now before our convention. Let us make a concerted movement to swell the membership before that time, until it becomes greater by far than it has ever been before. If you are members of a local auxiliary, why not get up an entertainment or social for the benefit of the state association? If you do so, you will be hleping a cause that has as its motive the elevation of humanity. Can you afford to let an opportunity of this kind pass by without an effort on your part?

At our convention we will have a good program. Each Spiritualist should endeavor to attend that convention. The hall is one of the finest we have ever had, and is situated in the Morris Pratt Institute. A good time will be assured to everyone who goes.

Now, Spiritualists, let us hear from you. Send in your memberships at the earliest date possible, and if you intend to attend the convention let us know. I would like to suggest to the local societies, that it would be a good plan to begin to look around for your delegates—have them selected early—study over the constitution and by-laws, and if you have any amendments to offer, submit them in writing to this office at earliest possible date, in order that copies of proposed amendments may be forwarded to sister societies. Do not make the mistake of coming to the convention to amend any part of the constitution without having given due notice of such intention, as it would be impossible to [illegible] this is an important one, and should not go unheeded. If you can spare, contributions will be received. Your membership fees and your moral support will do more for Spiritualism than you can imagine, perhaps. If every Spiritualist who reads these words will do what he can towards raising the working fund, and swelling the membership, I will guarantee that you will see the best convention, and the best year's work during the ensuing year, that you have ever seen, for many hands make light work.

EFFICIENT WORKER.

LETTER FROM MR. F. W. MARTIN.

He Is Working Along Humanitarian Lines in Promoting the Cause of Spiritualism.

To the Editor:—An article written by Mrs. Mary Frink Pope, on the doings of Spiritualists of Cleveland, Ohio, in a late issue of your valued paper has just come to my notice, and finding therein my name mentioned in connection with the work of the Ohio State Association and its missionaries, I believe an explanation will not be amiss, for I do not desire to sail under false colors, although a missionary in the cause I love so well.

I am not a missionary, and never expect to be, under the auspices of the Ohio State Association or any other body in the generally accepted sense of the word. I am willing to do whatever little I can and whenever and wherever the opportunity offers.

All my missionary work, covering a period of over five years, has been done in my home city, and I feel well paid for my labors, having had the pleasure to turn over a healthy society, that has held its regular meetings every Sunday since its inception through the instrumentality of writer, to my successor, Mr. Baird, as president. During the existence of our society we have always had a hall for our exclusive use, and although we have always kept open house (admission free), our hall is furnished, including organ and books, and more than enough money in the treasury to pay the hall rent for a year ahead, and the people of our community have had the opportunity of hearing many of the leading lights in our cause.

I am an earnest advocate of free meetings, and have fully demonstrated the fact that it not only can be done, but will prove a moral as well as a financial success in the end. I would advise all societies that are still asking an admission fee to try this plan, and I feel confident that after a year's trial they would not go back to the old way. Take a collection and you will find that the quarters, halves and occasional dollars will offset the nickels and pennies reluctantly given.

I was pleased to note that the First Spiritual Church of Cleveland is starting out in this way, and I will prophesy that it will flourish. It was this society I was asked to serve, taking the place of Mrs. Baird from our city, who is a state missionary, and felt indisposed to fill her engagement This was my first experience upon a strange platform, but I am sure the experience did me good, if not my audience. It being a very disagreeable night and our good brother, Moses Hull, holding forth for the neighboring society, the attendance was not as large as I had hoped it would be.

I found these friends earnest in purpose, and I felt more than repaid for my time and trouble and was only too glad to serve them. At the close of the meeting I was offered compensation, which was a surprise to me, as I had no thought of such a thing, and upon my refusal to even accept car fare, the surprise seemed to be on the other side. I speak of this only, so my many friends scattered over the country, shall not think that I have become mercenary. I feel that it is not right for such as are not dependent upon remuneration for services of this nature, to take that which is needed more where it comes from, than where it goes to, and I hope I shall always be able to earn enough in other walks of life, to be able to do my missionary work without expectation of material gain.

"Freely have ye received, freely give."

But speaking of missionary work, I want to say in conclusion that I BELIEVE OF ALL THE MISSIONARIES, NONE ARE DOING FOR HUMANITY WHAT THE EDITOR OF THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER IS DOING.

While I often feel that I would like to say something on certain subjects, I strangle the desire within me, feeling that I would be crowding out some more instructive matter. Let me say in conclusion that ALL OTHER SPIRITUALIST PAPERS ARE PUT OFF BY ME UNTIL AFTER I HAVE FINISHED THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER. MAY IT AND ITS EDITOR LIVE LONG AND PROSPER. KEEP ON EXPOSING THE DEEDS OF DARKNESS OF CATHOLICISM, SO THAT ALL MAY AWAKEN TO THE DANGER best wishes, F. W. MARTIN.

BAD STOMACHS CURED.

We Can Positively Cure Any Case of Stomach Trouble Not Caused by Cancer. Do Not Take Our Word. TEST IT YOURSELF.

FREE TEST TREATMENT

Do you suffer from indigestion, dyspepsia or stomach trouble in any form? If you do why not let us cure you? We do not mean HELP you by giving you a Soda Compound Tablet or some of the other patent "Dyspepsia Cures." We will positively and permanently cure you. We will go to the very foundation of your trouble; will remove the causes, strengthen and tone up the stomach, and make you strong and healthy as you ever were. We could give you testimonials by the thousands of those we have cured of stomach trouble in all its forms and stages; but they would not be facts or proof to you—only words of thanks and praise. The only absolute proof is in the treatment itself. And believing that a practical test would be more convincing to sufferers than all the testimonials we could print and absolutely prove its great merits, we will send anyone desiring it a full two weeks' trial treatment absolutely free.

If you have stomach trouble and have failed to get relief, write us at once and learn by practical test what we can do for you. Address Dr. Peebles Institute of Health, Ltd., 23 Main Street, Battle Creek, Mich.

VOLNEY'S RUINS

—AND—

THE LAW OF NATURE,

TO WHICH IS ADDED

Volney's Answer to Dr. Priestly, a Biographical Notice by Count Daru, and the Zodiacal Signs and Constellations by the Editor;

Printed on heavy paper, from new plates, in large, clear type, with portrait and illustrations. One vol., post 8vo, 248 pages; paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

This is undoubtedly one of the best and most useful books over published. It eloquently advocates the best interests of mankind, and clearly points out the sources of human ignorance and misery. The author is supposed to meet in the ruins of Palmyra an apparition or phantom, which explains the true principles of society, and the causes of both the prosperity and the ruin of ancient states. A general assembly of the nations is at length convened, a legislative body formed, the source and origin of religion, of government, and of laws discussed, and the Law of Nature—founded on justice and equity—is finally proclaimed to an expectant world.

The fact that the personal spirit of the medium may be shown to possess Form-creative power, does not prove that the spirit (which the medium may happen to see) is a spirit of his own creation.

But the fierce jealousy (lest sufficient justice be done to the spirit of the guide of the medium) should not lead us to treat with carelessness, impatience, or indignity the magnificent form creative power of the medium, as shown in the constructive laws of his or her own spirit.

In its last analysis however, it is as important that the medium know the laws regulating the form-constructive nature of his own spirit, before transition, as it is for him to know the laws controlling the form-constructive nature of his guide, or control.

The latter is taken for granted; and the medium, by reason of the splendor and sanctity of his reverence for his guide; has unconsciously been treating his own spirit with injustice, giving it no consideration at all.

It is my honest conviction—born of wide observation—that, in many, many thousands of cases, the lofty personal spirit of the medium is a far more reliable guide in things spiritual, than the testimony of millions of lower spirits, prowling and aching to control the medium.

As a rule mediums have treated such controls with far greater patience, kindness, humility, and obedience, than the controls have treated the mediums.

Thus, I consider the personal Spirit and Soul of the medium to possess equally as great Spirit-Form-constructive powers, as the guides; and these articles are written to prove it.

(b) I mean by the word Soul, when applied to a medium or any other human being whatsoever, the Physiological Vital Self. The word Self is used to show that it possesses the unity of personality. The word Vital is used to show that it has life. The word Physiological is used to show that it has to do with nerve cells. Thus; through its laws of Hunger and Coenaesthesia, the Soul aims to get, keep, reproduce, and reconstruct nerve-cell-forms and electric, and other nervous forces for the body.

(c) By the word Spirit, as applied to any intelligent human being, or to the personality of the medium—as distinct from any spirit guide whatsoever—I mean the Psychological Vital Self. The word Psychological is used to show that the Spirit has to do with mental shapes, figures, and forms, viz., sensations, concepts, passions; mental memories. The word Vital is used to show that the Spirit possesses its own distinct life. The word Self to show that it possesses its own unity of personality distinct from that of the Soul.

Thus; whilst the Soul, on its plane, is busy with getting, keeping, and reconstructing cell-forms, and physiological forces; the Spirit is at work trying to get, keep, reproduce, and reconstruct figures, and forms of sight, hearing, touch, concepts, ideals of the true, good and beautiful. It does this by transforming the pre-existing energies of the Soul to its own use; and to a higher plane.

As I understand myself I therefore possess two lives, viz., the life of my Soul, and the life of my Spirit.

And these two lives imply two systems of forms, forces, and motions.

Thus; I may become so conscious of my Spirit, that I forget the existence of my Soul.

And, I may become so enamored with the pleasures of my Soul, that I may forget the existence of my Spirit.

And; on the other hand, I may become so dumfounded with spiritual awe and wonder, because of some form-creation of a spirit guide, that I may wholly overlook the dignity of the forms created by my own spirit; and the marvelous form-creative powers of my own Soul.

An enduring spiritual philosophy must treat all three of these factors with equal justice.

Think of Sitting Bull insisting on being the intellectual spirit guide in natural science of yourself or Edison, Darwin, Marconi, Newton, Galileo, or Copernicus?

We become such lovers of the marvelous that we cease to be lovers of truth.

So thoroughly have we self-hypnotized ourselves into the idea of the superlative worth of the intelligence of a discarnate spirit, and the worthlessness of the intelligence of an incarnate one that we bow in awe-struck reverence to the raps of a Zulu, and sneer at the magnificent discoveries of a Marconi, or an Edison.

All credit due to the genius of an incarnate spirit is damned at a blow.

A stiletto is plunged into the heart of all intellectual worth.

For the hard, honest work of our own spirits, a number of old Choctaw guides—because they have passed out—are to get the credit.

We are so anxious to do justice to those who have passed out, that we have no justice left for those who are on this side. We are, in our own way, making the same ghastly mistake as the orthodox folk; who are so much concerned about the laws of heaven, and the other world; that the announcements of the grand discoveries of the physical sciences, in this world, are treated with ill-disguised scorn. Think of the cruel condition of things, which instantly condemns me (as not being a spiritual man) because I will not allow the discarnate spirit of a Tasmanian or a Fuegian, or Billy Brown, the grocer's baby—neither of whom have any knowledge of a single general or abstract term—to do the talking to an audience through me instead of my own spirit.

But for a discarnate spirit to do me any good in the way of knowledge, it must know more than I do.

Modern, evolutionary knowledge—if the word evolution have any meaning at all when applied to modern ideas—means the existence of the newest up-to-date knowledge of the incarnate spirits of the present hour.

Of these strictly modern evolved forms of comparative, and experimental scientific knowledge, the spirits of Plato, Socrates, and Aristotle, could know nothing when they passed out.

Thus; until that hour dawns, when a discarnate spirit (with a far wider range of vision concerning the knowledge of the future) shall teach me; I must incur the displeasure of the more narrow of my Spiritualist brethren by asserting that my general thoughts, ideas, and concepts, are not only the evolved products of my own spirit; but that I also shamefacedly offer them as unquestioned proofs of the intellectual evolution of my own personal spirit.

It is also necessary for me to repeat in order to allay prejudice that I have not (at the exact date of writing these words) seen or read a copy of The Great Psychological Crime; although I have been kindly asked if I wished a copy of the book; which gift is magnanimous; and is on the way.

Misoneism, is narrowness born of the fact that our interests and views have become so deliciously dear to us, that we cannot sympathize with any ideas broader than our own; particularly if we have had no experience or knowledge in other directions.

Thus; my kind and illustrious friend, Lombroso, confesses, in his "Man of Genius," to a possible misoneism concerning Spiritualism.

It is true, that I can get plenty of imperious, lofty, indirect, Spiritualistic dogma (of a splendidly helpful character) in hundreds of the transcendently sublime passages of the "Vedas," the "Koran," the "Bhagavad Gita," the "Secret Doctrine," "Science and Health," the "Apocrypha," the "Breeches Bible," the "Book of Mormon," and the "Book of our own dear people's delicious views;" but, this is not the sort of help I want.

And, I have chosen the latest, modern, evolutionary scientists—not the dogmatists—as my people.

So that where the Naomi of Evolutionary Science goes, I shall go; her people shall be my people, and her God my God.

Thus; as contrasted with all printed, written, or mouth-to-ear dogma whatsoever, I am, in all my religious, and Spiritualistic views—first and last—an experimental, scientific evolutionist.

My own personal misoneism is therefore intense in this particular, viz., that for any persons views of Spiritualism, to be honored by me, such views must shew that they are based on the latest, up-to-date, most modern, evolved forms, of comparative, and experimental science.

And; whatever may be the ultimate verdict of science, respecting the Great Mystery of Spirit Forms, considered strictly from the standpoint of the spirit guide, or control of the medium, I feel reasonably certain, in asserting the fact, that comparative and experimental psychological science will show that the finer, loftier, type of the heroically honest, and saintly, pure, psychic or medium—absolutely purified from every taint of a desire for money, praise, power, or sex-conquest; actuated only by a passion for experimental truth and benevolence—is a person of a more splendidly vast range of spiritual sensibility, than the average human being.

Mediums of this type are the ethical angels of humanity. The stars in the world's dark nights of spiritual progress. They are the walking revelations of God to man. The fragrance of the roses, the violets, and the lilacs, of unseen fields, of spiritual beauty, emanate from them. They make a glorious future a present reality. They reveal the spring skies of hope to the wintry soul. The sunshine of God is on their faces. They make the grave luminous. The skies above and around them are always clear. They chant the immortal symphonies of worlds that know no death.

Think what a lofty, exquisitely sensitive psychic of this type, has to bear, in a modern society, already fiercely and unavoidably prejudiced, because of the love of its old church dogmas; and, secondly, because of the unending series of malignant, greedy, impostures, ignorance; and the unceasing money and power-scheming efforts of unscrupulous occultists and psychics on vastly lower planes.

Thus, the loftier, finer, spiritual type, of the greatly intelligent, and holy, psychic or medium (actuated solely and only by an all-controlling martyr-like passion for experimental truth and benevolence) is the one hope for the chaos of modern theology.

They are foremost among the gravitating psychological powers drawing the oceans of human thought Godward.

The ethics of evolutionary Spiritualism offers hope to all.

For, the spirit of no human being has ever fallen so low, or so far—no matter how long the prison record or profound the disgrace—but what—at some time or the other—the forces of spiritual evoution will cause that tearful spirit to one day shine more luminous than ever it has in the past. Its own terrible sufferings prove its own moral safety-forces. We can always trust those who have morally profited the most by their own moral sufferings; for no spirit ever willingly returns to habits that have torn it asunder with moral anguish.

SALVARONA.

There was a noble way, in former times of saying things simply, and yet saying them proudly—Irving.

From the Spirit Realms.

Spirit Carlyle Petersilea.

While on Earth Mr. Petersilea was a medium for the transmission of important letters from those long in spirit life. Now, having become a freed spirit himself, he will convey his best thoughts through the mediumship of his devoted wife, and we are sure they will prove interesting to our readers.

Dear Friends and Readers of The Progressive Thinker:—The time has at last arrived, to my inexpressible joy, that I can control my wife to write.

You all know that when I was with you in the flesh I was a musician and teacher of music; and as a teacher whenever I had a new pupil—one not versed in music—I always commenced with that pupil at the beginning. If not at the beginning of music, at the beginning of its technic, and technical terms.

If this course had not been taken, my pupil could not have understood music as one should understand it; and now, in controlling my wife to write I desire to commence at the beginning of my experience as a disembodied spirit, and I hope to be able to write my experience as I go on and on.

My departure from my body of flesh was sudden and unexpected—as unexpected to me as it was to my dear wife. I had hoped to reside within my material body for at least ten or fifteen years more; but my great love for music at length rended my material brain and let my spirit free. If I had listened to my wife, I might have lived in my body many years to come. But I was ever wayward—so my revered father tells me—and contrary to my loved one's advice I determined, in addition to my other labors, to give a series of recitals from the great masters in music, commencing with Beethoven. These recitals were all to be given from memory, for I had no time to practice and must depend entirely on memory, and the music within my own soul; hoping also that each great master would in spirit come to my assistance at the time when I most needed him. Nor was I disappointed.

As I said before, I commenced with Beethoven, rendering seven of his grand sonatas, and singing seven of his beautiful songs, at the same time playing their intricate accompaniments.

Musicians will well understand what a tax this was to an already weakened constitution and rapidly advancing age. Those who are not musicians will not comprehend it; but the grandeur of Beethoven burst my material brain, or the little blood-vessels within it, and that which the doctors call apoplexy was the result.

Thus much for the cause of my departure; and now to return to that departure and its experiences; but first let me say that, owing to my strong vitality, I remained in the body for three months after the blood vessels were ruptured, the blood slowly oozing and forming a clot at the base of the brain, resulting in what appeared to be partial paralysis. But at last the brain was so charged or drowned in the life-giving fluid, that my departure seemed to be a sudden disaster.

Now, all this that I have written, I did not at the time, know myself, but have learned it since leaving the body; and now, once more to my experience, which I write, hoping to benefit mankind—and, as I before said, I will commence at the beginning.

I was standing near my own door, when I began to feel sick and dizzy. Just as I was trying to steady myself, my wife came out—for she always exercised a watchful care over me—she said:

"O, Carlyle! Something is the matter with you."

I did not wish to frighten her (and so I replied: "No, dear. There is nothing the matter with me, I think. I wish to go on and finish what I am engaged in doing."

But she would not hear to it, and led me into the house, and to my easy chair. I sank down into it, feeling perfectly helpless and faint. I saw that my dear wife was greatly frightened, as she said: "O! I must go at once for someone," and so I answered her:

"No, no, dear. Nothing is the matter with me;" and I really thought there was nothing the matter except a little vertigo. My wife in the meantime had left me alone, in order to summon assistance. Presently the neighbors rushed in, and the doctor came. I was still conscious of my surroundings and heard the doctor say there was a clot of blood at the base of the brain, and it was only a matter of a few hours, at the most.

Then my spirit leaped up. Could it be possible that I was about to enter the spirit world?

My sight began to grow dim, and the last thing I saw through my earthly eyes was my poor wife wringing her hands in agony, and the last words I heard with my earthly ears were her exclamations of grief and fright; but consciousness had not entirely deserted me, for I was conscious of being lifted on to my bed, and then for a short time all became dark and silent—a great silence such as I had never known before. I seemed to sink down into a deep, deep sleep; and soon, like one in a dream, I floated outward and upward. I really thought I was dreaming. I had suffered no pain to speak of, no more than one usually suffers when feeling sick at the stomach, and a full, throbbing sensation in the brain.

Now I floated out as in a dream, into what looked to me like green fields—as though I were floating just above the most beautiful green fields filled with flowers of all descriptions. I scarcely realized then that my spiritual eyes were opening. I heard the voice of my wife, frantic with grief, far below me, calling upon me. It seems that she had rushed out of doors, not being able to bear the scene of my departing spirit. I could not see my wife, but could hear her piteous cries, and in my still dazed condition I thought she had fallen down into some deep chasm from which I was unable to rescue her.

"O! I must have help," I thought.. "I must find someone to help me get my wife out of that pit." And now her voice grew fainter, and still more faint and farther away, until I could not hear her at all; but I heard instead a well-remembered voice at my side.

"Carlyle," it said, "dear boy, lean on me. Let me bear you up."

O, my God! That was my father's voice, speaking to me just as he used to when I was a mere child and needed his assistance.

"Father!" I called out. "Where are you? My wife has either fallen down into a pit or has been carried off by wild animals. Oh, help—help!"

It did not seem to me that I was in trouble. All was well with me. It was my wife who was in trouble.

"Carlyle," said the voice of my father, "steady yourself. Lean on me. Look at me, dear child, and try to understand."

But I was wild with grief on account of my wife. Again I heard her piteous cries.

"Look at me, dear boy," said my father. "Lean on me and try to understand. Your wife is not in a pit, except the pit of grief, and the only animal that has carried her off is the animal of woe—and a vile old creature it is, too. Steady, now, Carlyle. Look at me—your father. You are passing through the gate called death, and your wife's cries are those of grief. You cannot help her at present. Nothing but time can do that."

I now began to wake up to the fact that I was in the spirit world. I rubbed my eyes, and my father laid his hand upon my head. My sight grew clearer—my brain steadier—and I looked upon the spiritual form of my beloved sire. My heart leaped within me for joy and gladness. How grand, how noble, how beautiful he was. I threw my arms about his neck and wept upon his breast. "Am I indeed out of my body, oh, my father?"

"Not entirely," he answered. The body still breathes but the spirit is free. Will you come with me and observe it? There is a great reason why you should know all that is possible concerning so-called death. All do not return to witness the last struggles of the material body; but I know that you will have cause to regret it if you do not do so."

So, leaning upon my father, we sunk down out of the green field and into the room where my material body lay, breathing stentoriously. My poor wife, not being able to endure the scene, had been taken into a neighboring house; and I was very glad, and thankful to that friend, who had taken her from the, to her, dreadful scene.

And now I could calmly watch my own death, or, rather, the death of my material form, for I was not in it.

"Father, I asked, "I am not in that body; why does it breathe?"

"The material life forces are not yet entirely removed," he replied. "If you had ever watched the machinery of a great factory after the steam had been turned off, you would at once comprehend it. The belts and wheels will still revolve for quite a period of time, and gradually come to a stand-still. The spirit—the moving power—is out of the body, but the heart still beats slowly, the diaphragm still expands and contracts, and the blood still sluggishly circulates. The contracting diaphragm still laboriously draws the air into the lungs with a loud noise, which is called stentorious breathing; but, like the wheels of a factory, when the steam is turned off, it will soon, gradually, stop."

My father and I stood and watched that form until all was silent and still, the last breath drawn, the last stroke of the heart made. It was most solemn, dear friends, I had inhabited that body for more than fifty-nine years, and now I had left it forever. Poor worn-out piece of clay! Poor broken-down machine! The steam was turned off. The spirit had departed. I had left you because I could no longer stay within you.

"Come," said my father. "It is not necessary that we stay any longer. Leave that now cold piece of clay. Others will care for it. We need no longer concern ourselves about it."

"No; but my wife—my wife!" I cried. "I cannot leave her in her terrible sorrow."

"But you are not strong enough to make your presence known to her now, and her grief is too great for her to recognize you, even if you were. Come, let us go; and we will return again later, when perhaps we can make her see and hear us."

I was still reluctant; but my father drew me away. And now, once more we floated out into those green and beautiful fields. I could not yet stand upright without his help; but he sustained me, and we floated into an ethereal building, which I intuitively knew must be one of his homes.

"Carlyle," he said, "you must rest now, or you will not have strength enough to visit and make yourself known to your wife at the time when you ought to do so."

Thus far I had seen nothing but the green fields, flowers, and my father; and now this ethereal building.

"Father," I asked, "am I not to see others besides yourself?"

"Not yet—not yet!" he answered. "All in due season. You have not yet strength enough to see, or take cognizance of more than what has already been shown you. Now, my child, I shall treat you as I used to do when you were a weak little boy and tired all out—put you to bed."

Ah! how well I remembered. I had no mother in those early days on earth; and my father used to undress and put me to bed; and now, here he was, doing the same thing for me again, one degree higher up the scale.

O! how weak I was. I could not stand alone. My limbs trembled under me, and I shook like an aspen. Dear friends, my father led me to a couch, or bed, in an inner room of this ethereal building, and I sank down upon it wearily. A delicious sense of rest and repose stole over me. The sweet thought that I had gotten through with that dreaded monster, Death, was in my mind; but the monster had proved to be my best and truest friend, for had he not ushered me through the gates, into the Immortal Country? My father smiled upon me, and, waving his hand, said: "Adieu, for the present. I will come for you when you are rested, and as soon as you are needed below."

"Yes, come for me without fail, when my wife calls me. He disappeared and I slept.

I am not writing a novel. I am not writing a romance, but the Eternal Truth. Doubt it, you who may. I slept, and this will prove to you, as it did to me, that spirits sleep—that spirits need rest—especially a short time after so-called death. I not only slept but it was the sweetest sleep that I have ever known—the most refreshing. From Carlyle Petersilea, through his wife, Amelia.

"HE WHO DIED IN AZAN."

One of Edwin Arnold's Best Poems.

The beautiful poem called then "Not Dead, but Risen," which was read at the memorial service of Mr. Bowles, attracted wide attention, and its publication was followed by inquiry and discussion as to its authorship. This was finally rightly attributed to Edwin Arnold, an English barrister (we believe) who has written but little, but that little of singular beauty and perfectness. Mr. Arnold describes the lines as a paraphrase from certain Arabic verses quoted in Palgrave's travels in Arabia. Mr. Arnold is an authority in Sanscrit literature, and has made occasional essays in other Oriental fields. A lady of this city sojourning in London, Mrs. Louisa Andrews, has recently sent us a corrected copy of the poem obtained from the author himself, accompanying it with these words: "In a note to me, Mr. Arnold says of those very striking and touching verses, 'She is dead,' they said to him, 'come away' —both are reproduced in American publications generally with some other name attached, and, what is worse, with gross misprints and mistakes. For example, 'Azim' in the line you quote should be 'Azan,' the hour of afternoon prayer in moslem communities. This I think is the only mistake of importance in the lines as they appear in the Republican, but I feel that you will perhaps be pleased to have every word of this beautiful poem as it came from the brain and hand of the author, and therefore send you this perfectly accurate copy." Knowing that the readers of the Republican will be glad to share in this satisfaction, we reprint the poem in its authentic form:

He who dies at Azan sends
This to comfort all his friends.

Faithful friends! It lies, I know,
Pale and white and cold as snow;
And ye say, "Abdallah's dead!"
Weeping at the feet and head.
I can see your falling tears,
I can hear your sighs and prayers;
Yet I smile, and whisper this—
"I am not the thing you kiss;
Cease your tears, and let it lie;
It was mine, it is not 'I.'"

Sweet friends! what the women lave,
For its last bed of the grave,
Is a hut which I am quitting,
Is a garment no more fitting,
Is a cage from which at last,
Like a hawk, my soul hath passed.
Love the inmate, not the room—
The wearer, not the garb—the plume
Of the falcon, not the bars
Which kept him from those splendid stars!

Loving friends! be wise and dry
Straightway every weeping eye;
What ye left upon the bier
Is not worth a wistful tear.
'Tis an empty sea shell—one
Out of which the pearl has gone;
The shell is broken—it lies there;
The pearl, the all, the soul is here.
'Tis an earthen jar whose lid
Allah sealed, the while it hid
That treasure of his treasury,
A mind that loved Him; let it lie!
Let the shard be earth's once more,
Since the gold shines in His store!

Allah glorious! Allah good!
Now thy world is understood;
Now the long, long wonder ends!
Yet ye weep, my erring friends,
While the man whom ye call dead,
In unspoken bliss, instead,
Lives and loves you, lost 'tis true
By such light as shines for you;
But in the light ye cannot see
Of unfulfilled felicity—
In enlarging paradise,
Lives a life that never dies.

Farewell, friends! but not farewell,
Where I am, ye too shall dwell.
I am gone before your face,
A moment's time, a little space;
When ye come where I have stepped,
Ye will wonder why ye wept;
Ye will know by wise love taught
That here is all, and there is naught,
Weep awhile, if ye are fain—
Sunshine still must follow rain;
Only not at death—for death,
Now I know, is that first breath
Which our souls draw when we enter
Life, which is of all life center.

Be ye certain all seems love,
Viewed from Allah's throne above;
Be ye stout of heart, and come
Bravely onward to your home!
La Allah illa Allah! yea!
Thou love divine! Thou love alway!

He that died at Azan gave
This to those that made his grave.

Concerning Sacred Days.

The early history of Christmas goes back to Sun-worship days. The Druids, of Britain, borrowed the idea. They called it Yule-tide. The Christians never adopted it until the seventh century. As the Romish church had created a God, it was fitting he should have a birthday like earthly potentates. So they made him one—one, then, almost universally observed. Man had observed that old Sol had not gone south to remain away, but was slowly returning in answer to their prayers, sacrifices and fastings. That they did not sooner observe that his migration south was a regular thing, is of course a marvel to you of to-day.

Sun-worship was the most rational of them all, inasmuch as the earliest inhabitants recognized the sun's effect on vegetation and life. Now that is about all there is to that.

It is no credit to your civilization that men relax their grip only once a year on their money bags, when human duty demands judicious charity and generosity every day. For myself I have little respect for the season due to the preponderance of fictitious charity performed. It may pain you to know we do not keep Christmas nor Albert Edward's birthday here.

Well, some of us have found the value of kindness daily performed, and the duty of cheerfulness always; and that is the pinnacle of peace.

Do not forget to say to your wife that she will enjoy each succeeding year more and more as she recedes from the old feudal castle, with its dismantled defenses and mimic cannon.

You ask of Jesus? He never lived; nor did any such mixture of good and evil ever exist. As to the best writings in scripture, they are not necessarily forged nor dishonestly written, but chronicles of some devout persons believing the original lie.

Take your horse. You want to make him high-bred. You start by saying his original progenitor was old Hermit. Now all is easy from there out. If that is true your steed is related to all the great Derby winners. You have only built on one falsehood, and the rest proves itself.

The old lady asked if there was a city named Nain; on being told yes, said: "That proves the story of the widow's son."

Ancient lies become sacred lies, and oft-told lies almost convince the teller himself of the truth of them.

Now as to Sunday. Originally it was enforced rest, nothing more; nor was it a church holiday until the year 503—as you count time. Christ repudiated the sabbath of the rabbis, or, rather, the forged writings of this mythical man did, which was your Saturday, sure. It has been accurately kept by Solomon Jacobs. He repudiated it, according to the story. It was something of a priests' day, similar to yours. But your Romish church had no such day until 503, that being the year when the whole foundation was laid by them, on which rested the whole structure.

If you could force an error on, say, a generation or two of men, you would have little difficulty after that; particularly where investigation was denied.—Spirit Message Communicated to F. C. Harris.

A SPIRIT VALENTINE.

We sing of love, the poet's theme
We of the past, the old regime
Across the sands of time and space
We reach our hands, our names we trace
Your heart upon.

Like harpstrings by sofe zephyrs swept
Your heart responds, and hopes that slept
Leap up again, faith finds relief
Ne'er known in creed or old belief
Long years agone.

We come, love-laden from that shore
Where we shall meet but part no more.
Our earthly love increased, refined,
Drossless and pure as love divine,
We bring you as your valentine.

INTERESTING FACTS TOLD

Spirit Prophecies Fulfilled.

To the Editor:—I feel impressed to tell the many readers of your valuable paper a circumstance in prophecy that I have been watching for some time. I will give details as near as I can remember.

In the year 1889 a family consisting of husband, wife and one son, living among the mountains of Pennsylvania, then engaged in the manufacturing business. In August of the same year the husband and wife paid a visit to Lily Dale, and there began their investigation of spirit return. While on the ground a medium gave the wife a reading, saying in part, "in 1893 they would dispose of their business and go westward, and in 1894 would land in a far distant city." This was all fulfilled, and on New Year's day of 1894 they found themselves in Los Angeles, Cal., and to-day they are honored residents of the Golden State. So much for this part of the prophecy.

The son also visited Lily Dale in 1892, and at a seance was told that he was going west and would have large mining interests there. He was only amused at this fairy tale, as he called it. Finally the World's Fair started him Westward in 1893. While in Tacoma, Washington, he wandered into a public hall and was given a communication, telling that they saw mines all around him, he laughed and said it was news to him. The same communication being given in Seattle, San Francisco and Los Angeles, but paid little attention. Soon after this he went North to work in a manufacturing plant, the father and mother locating in Los Angeles. In the following year, 1895, the son came home, then went North with a party to look up a mine, but the deal was not consummated, so spent part of the summer in the Yosemite Valley, and upon his return disposed of his outfit and gave up the idea of looking for a mine.

Later the father bought a sixth interest in a mine in Navada, and the son went out to look over the property. His report was unfavorable, and advised that there be no more money put in the mine. While in that vicinity looked over the ground and saw what seemed to him a good piece of mining property if it could be secured. It belonged to parties who did not care to dispose of it. Returning home he took up the study of mineralogy and assaying, and later went to the mines to work as a miner to gain practical knowledge of mining.

Soon after this the mother attended a circle of Mrs. B., when the medium said to her, "Your spirit mother comes to you and says, in the month of August two papers will come to you; don't fail to take care of them, as through them we will able to work out our plan for your son. His father will laugh, but we know you will take care of them, and know what to do."

The very last day of the month two legal papers came, offering for a consideration one-third interest in the mine that the son thought could not be bought. The terms were accepted and legally attended to, and the news sent to the son, who immediately went to Nevada to look after the property. Then came the spirit guides saying, "be of good cheer for you will yet own this mine alone." Improbable, he said, but will try. At last this was accomplished, the mine became the property of the son, who now began systematically putting down a shaft opening bodies of fine ore, working until his means was exhausted, then came home and talked over matters with the father and mother, concluded to incorporate and sell stock to open the mine. He had in the meantime located three other mines around the main mine, but other parties owned claims next to him. Again came the spirit helpers with their words of wisdom: "Go slow; you must own these claims to complete your group." He began negotiations to buy them, at the end of nine months was successful in getting them transferred to the company. Making a group of six claims in all. In the meantime the son had been selling stock and had the preliminary survey made for a United States Patent on the ground owned by the company.

Again came the spirit friends and said, "When you go out in November, prospect on the surface, as we don't want much stock sold, for you have rich ore near the surface." The son being very practical, made a mental note of this. This also proved true; enough pay ore having been struck at the surface to run a ten stamp mill for several years. He is now engaged in raising money to erect the necessary machinery.

I have been watching this mine and its history for some three years and these things have been called to my attention long before they would be worked out. I know the parties well, having been entertained in their home during my first visit to California, and have kept in touch with them ever since my return from New York.

They are an intelligent, respectable family, and one that I often consult in regard to business, and their advice I always have found valuable. They are neither visionary nor credulous, but good common sense people in all things. Should anyone wish to know further regarding this "Spirit Mine" for such I regard it, I will be pleased to answer any communication addressed to me.

SILENCE.

Give thou a quiet hour to each long day.
Too much of time we spend in profitless
And foolish talk. Too little do we say.

If thou wouldst gather words that shall avail,
Learning a wisdom worthy to express,
Leave for a while thy chat and empty tale—
Study the golden speech of silentness.

A GRAVE QUESTION.

Why Should Woman Have the Ballot?

Because the women of this country are citizens under a constitution formed "to establish justice." Justice demands equal rights, opportunities and privileges for all, for every person.

Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. This is a truth that alone justifies or condemns an organized governing power over a people. Every woman in this land has the right to vote because she is governed.

Our government is entirely out of accord with the principle on which it was founded. Had the original statement of the Declaration been, "All persons of the male sex are created equal, and are endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights," the constitution then should have specified that only persons of the male sex were to be governed.

Was the government of a sex by a sex for a sex, the idea of our forefathers?

One of the late suggestions by workers for woman's enfranchisement, is that tax-paying women should unite and make a special effort to secure to themselves the ballot. If tax-paying women would work for the enfranchisement of all women I would rejoice and congratulate them.

But if tax-paying women propose to obtain the ballot as a property consideration, because they contribute money to the support of government, and only for tax-paying women, then I protest emphatically.

Such enfranchisement would not ennoble womanhood, would not promote good citizenship, would not purify civic life and political management, would not tend to lift our civilization out of the mire and degrading sordidness of money worship.

Were I paying thousands of dollars in taxes yearly, I would not consent to the enfranchisement of tax-paying women, unless all women were to receive their inalienable right to the ballot, to consent to be governed, to vote for those who should administer the government.

It is a violation of liberty and justice that any woman who wishes to vote should be denied.

But if American womanhood considered itself responsible as citizens with sufficient earnestness to demand it, we would soon be at the ballot box.

It is woman's conscience and sense of responsibility that needs agitation. The home is the special realm of woman's energies, activities and devotion. True, but no home can be unaffected by the civic and political conditions of the neighborhood, the municipality, the state, the nation.

The lack of confidence in the honesty and integrity of people so permeating our social state is appalling. In no realm is it more pronounced than in the political. Has the mother no cause for seeking the means to promote honor, honesty and integrity in political affairs. Is it no responsibility of hers to help promote honesty and integrity in the administration of public affairs?

If our country is saved from the inevitable destruction of the money worship now sapping its moral life and energies, American womanhood must arouse and fulfill the responsibilities of a citizenship loyal to liberty, justice, integrity, and devotion to human welfare.

The Dogmas and Spiritualism.

There is but little sympathy to be expressed for those weak-kneed Spiritualists who are so apprehensive of offending the church and its ritual. Spiritism is no suckling babe that it is necessary to wean it off by degrees on baptism, christening, ordination, D. Ds. and deacons.

Why this imitation and mimicry of the dogmas of the church? The creeds of the church are based upon faith and belief, both of which are incompatible with the irrefutable evidence of heterodox Spiritualism.

With the book and bibles, rites and creeds of the church, modern spiritism has nothing in common; there is no similarity between the dogmas of the church and spiritism. The evidence of the church is the writings of others, while that of Spiritism is actual sensorial communications, the authenticity of which is unequivocal.

Why, then, should Spiritism endeavor to clothe itself with the sacerdotal cloak of ritualism, and like a whipped cur, lick the hand of the ecclesiastic?

A spirit, speaking of matters analogous to this said: "These things are of and for the material world. There is one law of the flesh and another of the spirit, and between them there exists no correlation.

The barbaric savage of nature knows not of creeds and beliefs, yet he enters into the spirit life under the same conditions and with the same environments as the so-called civilized man. Culture, creeds, civilization and doctrines end at the grave. As the physical child at its inchoation must be taught the elemental principles of material law and knowledge, so must the soul that is born into the spirit life receive instruction relative to the laws that shall govern it in the spirit world."

Let Spiritism be subordinate to no creed or doctrine. Let there be no implied weakness by imitation or assimilation of that which belongs to others. And, by our mediums and teachers demonstrate to all humanity that we, the Spiritualists are obligated to no sect or creed.

And, as the cry is now on, of the waning power of creedism, and the deterioration of the orthodox church, let Spiritism open its doors and say to all humanity. We have no theorems, the principles of Spiritism are open to the most stringent analytical inquisition, and will not be found deficient.

Spiritism has swept away the mystery that has for ages surrounded that natural demarkation called death, and with unimpeachable evidence has demonstrated that death is but the maturation of the chrysalides of embryonic man, from which, he emerges into a perfect existence whose antecedent, materialism, is but primogenial.

ANGEL VISITATIONS.

O'er the dizzy heights of mountains,
Through the valleys long and low,
By the side of crystal fountains
White-robed spirits come and go.

Through the palaces of grandeur,
Through the homes of want and woe,
Through the halls of mirth and splendor
White-robed spirits come and go.

Into the dismal prison cells,
Into the dungeons vile and low,
E'en through the worst of living hells
White-robed spirits come and go.

Up and down the boundless ocean,
Through the storms of rain and snow,
Into every land and haven
White-robed spirits come and go.

Ever with their presence bringing
Peace and balm for every woe,
Ever blessing, softly singing,
White-robed spirits come and go.

Spiritualism.

As a Factor in the World to-day, It Is Not Receding but Is Gaining Ground.

Spiritualists are inclined ever and anon to believe what they regard as the decline of Spiritualism, and lose heart and hope in the cause of the spread of its truth. Here and there all over the country, societies will spring up and flourish for a season, only to go down soon or late in apparent defeat. But, as a rule, the failure of such societies is only apparent, not real. No matter how brief the existence of a society may be, if while living it has wrought any good work at all, its short life as a society cannot be counted a total failure.

Our society disbanded some months ago after a most prosperous existence of about ten years' duration. Its disintegration was by no means due to to the loss of interest in the truth of Spiritualism, for there is not an individual who belonged to it that is not ready and anxious to form a new society, provided that some other individual, or all the other individuals will bear the burdens or assume the responsibilities necessary to its successful continuance. The many depend too much on the few for the financial success of the society, and upon themselves in advising those few how to run it without their financial assistance. And thus the few, in time, become weary of replenishing the society's exchequer, and reluctantly withdraw their support from it.

But the interest in the subject of Spiritualism in Fort Wayne at this very moment is greater, deeper, though quieter, than it has ever been. There has been some splendid seed sown here fo rthe cause which has taken root and borne fruit bountifully. Every week or two I get inquiries by telephone, postal card, letter, or from persons met on the street: "Where does your society meet now, and when?" "Why did you let your society go down?" "Are there any good mediums in the city whom you can personally recommend?" "When are you going to reorganize your society?" All such questions relating to and expressing the interest felt by all kinds of people in the question of Spiritualism.

As proving that this interest is not alone manifested by the idly curious, let me relate the following incident which occurred within the last few days, even tho' it is somewhat personal to myself. It is impossible for me to relate it without reference to myself, which will be excused under the circumstances.

I am the only Spiritualist member of the Allen County Medical Society, the membership of which numbers about three hundred. A few days ago, one of its prominent members and vice-president, passed to the beyond. He was a most radical orthodox Presbyterian. The president of the society is a most radical orthodox Baptist, whose pastor, the Rev. J. N. Field, preached a sermon about eight weeks ago, against Spiritualism, to which I replied in the Fort Wayne Journal-Gazette.

Before I had heard of the death of this member, the president called me by telephone about 9 a. m., informed me of it as having happened but a few hours previously, and requested me to act as chairman of a committee on resolutions, etc. He informed me that he thus notified me early so that I would have time to prepare them in order to present them to the society the following evening, at its meeting to take action on the death of the deceased member.

I immediately went to work on them, determined in their preparation to break away from the old, stereotyped phraseology which characterized such formal documents, such as "Whereas, it has pleased Almighty God, in His inscrutable providence to remove from our midst . . . . .,Therefore, be it resolved," etc., and to get as much Spiritualism into them as I possibly could. After finishing them I called the president up to inquire who the other members of the committee were, inasmuch as they might not feel willing to endorse what I had written, informing him that I had entirey ignored the old "regulation form" in the construction of the paper he had delegated to me. His reply was: "This is the very reason why I appointed you chairman of this committee. I felt assured you would give us something out of the ordinary, that would be a refreshing innovation. I have not appointed the other members yet, thinking I would do so at the meeting of the society this evening, but I will appoint whoever you desire to serve with you."

He appointed two members as my co-committeemen whose names I had suggested, of materialistic inclination. At the meeting I prefaced the reading of what I had drawn up, with the remark that if my associates or the society had any objection to it, it could be so amended as to meet it. But it passed unanimously, was ordered engrossed, published, a copy sent to the bereaved family, and all seemed pleased with it, declaring it to be a long-needed departure from the old form of such papers.

Now I have related this little story of recent local history, to illustrate the fact that the interest in the subject of Spiritualism is not waning but increasing. Had it not been that I was a Spiritualist, and an outspoken one, I am quite certain I would not have been appointed on this committee. The fact is, the entire society with many other people, want to hear all that can be heard upon the subject, without revealing their interest in it directly, by presenting themselves where the philosophy, science and religion of Spiritualism is expounded from the rostrum. I am as well satisfied that I meet old friends and acquaintances, patients and patrons of mine for many years, but members of the different orthodox churches, who are extremely anxious to engage me in conversation on the subject, to hear my experiences personally related, and to get all the information possible at first hand, as I am that I exist. But I have always made it a rule never to introduce the subject myself, and they, for various reasons, do not feel at liberty to do so. But I can stand such silence if they can. I am not around peddling Spiritualism, but I am enjoying it "all the same," and it is quite well known here that Mr. L. O. Hull and myself have the courage of our convictions.

Since this communication was commenced, there has occurred the death of the oldest member of the Allen County Bar, one of the ablest jurists in the state of Indiana, and long a valued, personal friend of mine. He was for many years judge of the several courts here, and was twice elected to congress. He was far from orthodox in his religious belief, but will be buried by an orthodox minister just the same.

I remember some years ago, he manifested his interest in the occult, by visiting the residence of Mr. L. O. Hull one evening and engaging with us in investigations. I see that a committee of his brethren of the legal profession has been appointed on "resolutions," etc., and on that committee is the name of one of our present judges with whom I have sat in seances, and who in one of them received a very wonderful, satisfactory message, from a deceased legal friend. This judge is satisfied of the truth of the phenomena of Spiritualism, but is a Theosophist. I believe he is a Spiritualist with Theosophical trimmings, or a Spiritualist in Theosophical regalia, I am just now wondering that if he has the writing of the "resolutions," whether he will inject into them any of his Spiritualistic knowledge, as I have done in those above referred to. If he does, it will only be another evidence that Spiritualism is leaking out in every direction.

I notice in Brother Hudson Tuttle's last quarterly report as Editor-at-Large of the N. S. A., he writes as follows:

"The work constantly enlarges and more newspapers and monthlies have sent requests for articles on the subject of Spiritualism than it is possible to supply. While the press has for some time contained scarcely any editorial matter on the subject, the pulpits of the country have fulminated and gospel ministers, both great and small, have preached a sermon on Spiritualism. Perhaps this is because they find it a drawing card, attractive and pew filling." This does not point to the "decline of Spiritualism" very strongly.

This communication is already too lengthy or I would include in it a copy of the "resolutions" I have referred to. I will, however, make one extract from it which will give the reader some idea of its general tenor:

"Science, which has always been disposed to obey Paul's injunction to "prove all things," is now making an effort to prove a future life. It is meeting with much encouragement in the accomplishment of this object, and its effort is more and more sustaining that other statement of Holy Writ, with which, it can hardly be said that saint and sinner are yet in full sympathy, viz. "The day of one's death is better than the day of one's birth," or that "To die is gain."

It will thus be seen that Spiritualism, or the science thereof, is obeying a Bible command which the orthodox church is paying no attention to, so far as a future life is concerned. When Paul commanded his hearers to "prove all things," he had no thought of excepting that of a future life.

SPIRIT GOLD MINES.

Treasures Brought From "the Great Beyond."

There is no doubt among the experts that great and valuable "Spirit Gold Mines" with the most valuable treasures for humanity have been discovered by the bold and hardy explorers into the spirit realms; and that these priceless riches are free to anyone who has got the sand and brains to extract them from their sources.

These treasures relate not alone to spiritual but also to material riches. People who accept these discoveries will not only be wealthier in the occult lines but they will live on earth longer, have better health, less sickness, more pleasure, etc., than those who reject all these reforms. We come to-day loaded down with these rare jewels from the great Beyond and give them all away freely to the public, "without money and without price."

Leadbeater, the famous English lecturer, Theosophist, etc., tells in a recent Progressive Thinker, a detailed statement of Vegetarianism and Occultism. His lecture was one of the best I have ever read and should be scattered by the millions in all lands and languages.

As a scholar who has studied the subject carefully for several years under the best conditions, I wish to endorse all Leadbeater says along these lines. The greatest "gold mines" ever struck in the spirit world are those which have told the people the kind of food they should eat and its effect upon life here and hereafter. Briefly, then, the higher spirits advocate a list of foods such as vegetables, fruits, grains, cereals, nuts, honey, (whole wheat macerated with honey), Indian meal, corn, oatmeal, etc., butter, cream, cheese, eggs, and most any vegetable "ripened by the sun." I know Leadbeater is reported to not endorse eggs for food and to be strongly against meat—beef, mutton, pork, game, fish, oysters, etc. The well known Boston artist's controls (or spirits) speaking through Mrs. Adelaide C. Littlefield, have for years endorsed the highest discoveries along these lines and especially have I heard them speak against people eating meat, and even seeking to keep their medium from going to butcher shops, etc., where the bodies of slaughtered animals lay.

We know the college, the university, the professional people are often arrayed against the spirit world in these new lines of thought, and spare no occasion to "buck against the gods," but we see the opposition of even this class of people being surely overcome. It was scarcely ten or twelve years ago that some Harvard University graduates were sitting in the parlors of this Spanish-American artist, at her home in 218 Columbus avenue, and they were predicting what a dismal failure the new electric car system would be, but to-day that system is admitted by these same men to be a brilliant success. The papers which once ridiculed Spiritualism are now printing our most advanced literature, and truth is winning out.

Mrs. Littlefield's controls agree quite perfectly with all Leadbeater says along these various lines and also speak against the use of any beer, liquors, wines, etc., tobacco, or even tea or coffee (an exception being made to coffee made from wheat). People may say these theories or discoveries are very good, but then ask, "What effect these theories have upon human beings?"

I will tell you, briefly. Anyone who follows high spirit advice will be better off in this world and the next. (N. B.—We do not advise anyone to accept advice from spirits who are gamblers, robbers, speculators, etc.)

To illustrate effect of spirit power, etc., I will take some personal cases.

Case 1. Young married man had ignored all spirit laws, etc. Smoked, drank little, etc., ate meat and thought there was no future life. He was taken very sick and had given up a valuable position. Spirits perfectly diagnosed case at artist medium's, and in a few days he was a well man.

Case 2. Young lady, telephone central in large city, was overworked, had peculiar head pains, was about to resign; case a very baffling one. Spirits diagnosed accurately, cured with few magnetic treatments and lady fully recovered. Now holding very valuable position.

Case 3. Elderly lady was on deathbed. Had pains in side, etc. No relief from various doctors' etc., but spirits took away pains in one treatment and would have fully cured case probably if the family had obeyed instructions, but as they had more faith in regular doctors, the case was returned to them. They all solemnly swore that they could cure the case but the woman died and the bills were paid. No autopsy.

Case 4. Young lady expected to wed man of wealth. He refused. She had beauty, youth, education, dress, etc. Came from elegant home where costly wines flowed like water, meats, fish, leisure, luxury, horses, carriages, etc., galore, but men did not "take to her." She was put under spirit treatments. All meats, fish, fats, candies, liquors, etc., were abandoned. She was put on regular hours, baths, plain vegetable and fruit foods. Skin was treated, face massaged, beefy fat plumpness refined, indolent, lazy muscles exercised, mind cultivated along special lines and in about one year the young lady was blossomed out as a new woman. She had numerous admirers. Several stood ready to marry her at once. She picked out her man, turned her back on Spiritualism, and is going back to her old habits, losing her beauty, daintiness and refinement.

Fact is, the spirit world is a great treasure house of wisdom—a gold mine which will be probably more carefully worked in the future than the past. Drink at least two quarts of water a day, exercise in sun and breathe pure air. Eat pure food.

WHAT'S THE USE?

What's the use of worrying, what's the use of tears?
Set the doors and windows wide, let the sunshine in,
Light's a certain remedy for sorrow or for sin.
In that flood they disappear quickly from the view
Both are ghosts of color—sunlight fades their hue.
Seal each door and crevice, darken every pane,
Back they'll come to greet you with the old refrain.

What's the use of toiling, morning, noon and eve,
Heaping up a lot of gold you must shortly leave?
Shrouds possess no pockets. Scatter far and wide.
Not one coin will jingle on the other side.
Mortal clay is dust and dew, only deeds can live;
Learn the joy of giving while your hand can give!

What's the use of sighing if the world goes wrong?
Oil the mill of labor with a hearty jest
Strip the peddler, Life, of jokes and wisely leave the rest.
Each one has his heartache—keep your own ache hid,
Box it up and stamp it with a smile upon the lid.

What's the use of quarreling over God and Man?
Think your thoughts and go your way bravely as you can.
Lend a hand and share a crust, let your heart be strong
God and Man are mysteries you shall solve ere long.
Anger in and Wit is out. Reason in dismay
Snatches Logic by the hand and hastens from the fray.
Follow up the path you see though the light be dim,
Do your duty to the world—and leave the rest to Him.

DIET REFORM.

If You Are an Invalid, Discharge Your Doctor and Put Yourself on Wholesome Foods.

I was much interested in the account of Miss Hinda Smith, the music teacher, who fasts often and lives on five cents per day. I have been a vegetarian for about fifty years in theory, though I never practiced it till about ten years ago, quitting pork, however, forty-three years ago. My apology for not eschewing flesh diet entirely, is that I was much from home and it was not only inconvenient, but in earlier years almost impossible. I won't claim that my good health is all based on my diet, but I do say, that for many years I was never free from pain, and I suffered from nervous headaches every few weeks, and sometimes every few days, and I never dared go far from home without a cane, and now I never use one. I can run up and down a long flight of stairs as rapidly as a man of twenty. It may be that I came into a period of health as years came to me, but even admitting that, I have proven that flesh diet is not necessary for strength.

Last fall and winter I boarded myself, and my bill of fare for the entire sixteen weeks was Malta Vita, whole wheat bread, nuts, fruits—apples, pears, grapes, peaches, oranges—potatoes, (which I baked by splitting them and putting them on my stove), honey, butter, milk, etc. I don't mean to say that I had all this variety at any one meal, for I seldom eat except two or at most three varieties at any one meal. I ate two meals a day, and always enjoyed the last meal till time for the next meal, never ate or required even a piece of fruit between meals. During that time I attended several patients each day, distant from each other, and every magnetic physician knows that magnetic treatments are much more laborious than any other kind of work, and I lectured each Sunday night, and attended about four gatherings of some kind in our society each week. At the end of sixteeen weeks I made an estimate of my cash book of what my board had cost me and found it had been 88 cents per week, or about 12½ cents per day, and this form of diet I should have indulged in had it cost double what it would to have indulged in the old popular method, because I believe it is best for the human system, and to support a system that requires the murder of animals, is abominable and wicked.

Sometimes people talk very patronizingly to me. They can eat anything—nothing hurts them, and if it did hurt them a little, they are going to have what they want. Thus they manifest their selfishness and heartlessness. They think they are demonstrating noble qualities, by dilating upon their gustatory talent, whereas, they show that they have no regard for the lives of animals and that they are themselves only a short remove from the brutes.

I am certain that a large percentage of diseases are prevalent in consequence of our diet. It is very certain that flesh-eating must result in diseases among the more spiritual and sensitive people. A state of excrementation is constantly in process with all animals. This excrementious matter is being transported to the surface from every part of the body every fraction of a second. It is dead—it is carrion. No person ever ate a piece of flesh, no matter how small, who did not eat carrion, for there is no part of the system of the animal where it is not. They that frequent the cow stable or the horse stable or the pig sty smell of it. A part of this carrion is uric acid of which your system already has as much as it can excrete, and if you obtain any more, it must be thrown into the blood or deputated by the kidneys, thus laying the foundation either for rheumatism or kidney disease. One would not think of allowing even a dead cat to lie near the house, but here we not only have carrion about us, but in time we eat many times the weight of a cat. How can we expect to be healthy?

Another wrong is the very great variety of our menu. You never would think of feeding your horse such a variety, and your own judgment admonishes you that you would in time kill your horse, if you did. One or two, or at most three dishes is all one should eat at any one meal. But just think of what you ate last Thanksgiving or last Christmas—Turkey, baked in its own grease, dressing consisting of a variety of things, pepper, always constipating, fruit, nuts, candies, raisins, mince pie, made of mince meat, fruit and perhaps brandy, doughnuts fried in hogs' fat, cranberries, etc., and you didn't get sick, either! isn't it strange! When you become a little higher spiritually, you will get sick when you eat such a mess. It would make you sick to look at it, if it was macerated and thrown into a swill bucket, as it was into your stomach.

But say, didn't you have the least bit of headache the next day? The facts are, the gastric juice is not equal to digesting all the ingredients in such a horrid compound. The digestive fluid adapts itself to the quality of food you eat. If you eat fruit, there is a fluid just adapted to fruit ready to combine with it. If you eat anything else, the fluid will meet it, but if you use one quality of food too long the fluid becomes weakened and incapacitated to assimilate it longer, thus showing necessity for a change. But when you take all kinds, at every meal, the digestion becomes weakened, and the food is but poorly digested. In this condition the bowels become packed—especially the colon—and the material sours and swells and finally commences to decay in the system, causing inflammation of the colon, and gives the surgeons an excuse for relieving you of your vermiform appendix, as if that would be a future preventive against the recurrence of the same condition.

President Arthur killed himself eating. He had around his plate some fifty-odd dishes it was said, and I suppose he tasted all of them. He had strong vitality to endure as long as he did. Rockefeller came to Santa Barbara, while I was there, offering a million dollars to any one who would cure him of dyspepsia. I would have cured him for five dollars, but he didn't consult me. I should have required him to dismiss his chef, who served him with indigestibles, and placed him on only one or two simple kinds of food—such as our prepared foods. He struck some one who put him on oatmeal and graham gems a short time after, and was relieved.

Another injurious article of diet is coffee—any condiment is injurious, but coffee is the worst. About forty or fifty years ago, old people will remember the experiments had with Alexis St. Martin. He had been shot in the war of 1812 through the stomach, but the wound never healed up, or rather never covered up, so that with a spectroscope one would be able to look through the aperture into the stomach, and see just what was doing. In the experiments the physicians were making on him, for their observation they gave him coffee, and invariably the stomach turned pale and the digestive fluid was driven back. I have frequently struck cases in my practice where I had to require them to give up their coffee, and always found great assistance in healing them when they did so. I think tea is more or less injurious, but not so bad as coffee.

I have had no personal experience in fasting. I know those who have omniverous habits if they will persist in them ought to fast at least once or twice per week. Perhaps I should yet be happier if I should fast occasionally, but under present conditions I seem to be good for quite a number of years yet, and when I get ready for the transition, I shall probably not make much noise about it, but walk off to the lounge, lie down, and go out.

It can be seen from what I have said, that happiness does not consist in what we put into our stomachs, but in what we assimilate. Any conjestion is diabolical, and we should avoid it. Pro bono publico.

THE PHILANTHROPIST.

To the Editor:—I shall be pleased—more than pleased—to see the enclosed manuscript and clipping in your excellent paper. C. H. MATHEWS.

A man who always sought the chance to play a big hand in finance conceived a plan whereby he might increase his goods a mighty sight, but at the time he knew he must kick up a bloomin' sight of dust; and, to conceal the game he meant, called it "benevolent intent."

Said he: "The heathen I perceive, the glorious gospel should receive; and in my wish to save their souls I'll cross the ocean's heavy rolls, and carry to these people wild the Christian gospel true and mild. I'll teach them ways of truth and joy and give their idle hands employ.

Thus did the man who framed the game proceed to put in force the same. With sanctimonious mien and air he sailed the briny seas to where there lived a people whose fair lands bloomed as the rose beneath their hands, and whose desire was but to be a people independent, free.

"I've come across the ocean's wave, your poor benighted souls to save," exclaimed the man on plunder bent, masked as "benevolent intent." "It grieves me sore that you should be benighted and in misery; and so I've come from far away for your poor souls to work and pray."

"But we are happy and content," the people cried. "Why were you sent?" We have our schools and churches, too; our peaceful ways we would pursue, and rule ourselves in freedom's name while you at home can do the same. We thank you for your kind concern, but you would better, far, return."

"Alas," the missionary cried, "it's sad that you my plans deride. I plainly see that you are blind to all the good I have in mind. So here I'll stay and while I teach I'll just grab all that I can reach. If I save souls from Hades hot you'll have to give me all you've got."

And when the natives did resist this oily old philanthropist he swept their land with righteous ire and laid it waste with sword and fire. He seized their lands, and while he prayed a sanctimonious look displayed: "I do this in God's name," he cried, and heaped the dead on ev'ry side.

He filled the land with blood and tears, disease, and rum, and awful fears. He sacrificed his country's sons who bore his bright, death-dealing guns. He used his country's flag to hide the thieving game for which he tried, and called men "traitors" who denied his right all rights to override.

And when at last his game was won he counted all the wrongs he'd done and said: "Well, Christian duty and our destiny walk hand in hand. I gave to them the blessed word at mouth of gun and point of sword, and it is only just and fair to take their all to make me square."

Moral:

When greed on plunder wide is bent,
It shrieks: "Benevolent intent!"

A Child Medium.

Danville, Ky.—L. A. Farris, a merchant near Carpenter's Station, has an adopted child of fourteen years whose mind became impaired in May. She was carried to the Lexington Asylum, where she remained until August, when she was reported cured and brought home. For the last week she has been sick with something like catalepsy. At one moment her whole muscular system becomes rigid, and in this condition she talks at random and sings the most pathetic airs, composing as she proceeds.

One morning last week there were loud and distinct knocks on the weather boards outside of the house. Supposing some one wanted to enter, Mr. Farris went out, but saw no one. The raps were heard again on the other side of the house, but no one could be seen.

Mr. Farris then walked from the family room to the dining-room and, hearing a noise behind him, saw, so he says, an ordinary cuspidore ambling along after him. Mr. Farris is a sober man and no one doubts his statements. A glass of water was on a table in the room where the girl lay. It tumbled off to the floor and was picked up and placed back. Off it went again, and even the third time, the last fall breaking it.

While these weird things are going on the girl is singing or chanting some strange melody, accompanying her music with all kinds of gesticulations with her arms and feet.

She sprang out of bed Sunday morning, walked to the fire, and her slippers, so it is solemnly asserted, moved gracefully from under the bed to her feet. She put them on.

Mr. Farris tore off part of the weather-boards, thinking that some animal was fastened up and couldn't escape. Nothing was found to explain the noise.

The girl in her lucid moments says that the spirit of Burt Wolford is hovering about the premises and making these noises. Mr. Wolford died there a few years ago.

Never Neglect Constipation.

It means too much misery and piling up of disease for all parts of the body. Death often starts with constipation. The clogging of the bowels forces poisons through the intestines into the blood. All sorts of diseases commence that way. Most common complaints are dyspepsia, indigestion, catarrh of the stomach, liver complaint, kidney trouble, headaches, etc. The bowels must be relieved, but not with cathartics or purgatives. They weaken and aggravate the disease. Use Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine instead. It is a tonic laxative of the highest order. It builds up and adds new strength and vigor. It assists the bowels to move themselves naturally and healthfully without medicine. One small dose a day will cure any case, and remove the cause of the trouble. It is not a patent nostrum. The list of ingredients goes with every package with explanation of their action. It is not simply a temporary relief, it is a permanent cure. Try it. A free sample bottle for the asking. ECHOES OF THE SYMPOSIUM

LYMAN C. HOWE. MRS. FLORENCE HUNTLEY.

The Great Psychological Crime

A Comparison of Views and the Reasons Therefor.

Lyman C. Howe, the veteran Spiritualist Lecturer and Medium, a man well and favorably known as one of the foremost thinkers and writers in our ranks, will Champion the Cause of Truth as reflected in Spiritualism, while Mrs Florence Huntley, the well-known Author and Journalist, will defend all the statements in The Great Psychological Crime, which Mr. Howe will dare to assail, making a series of articles instructive, suggestive and inspiring, and which every Spiritualist should most carefully read.

MRS. FLORENCE HUNTLEY REPLIES TO LYMAN C. HOWE.

My Dear Mr. Howe:—

By reason of conditions I could not anticipate, over which I have had no control, and which have arisen since I gave Mr. Francis my promise to undertake this correspondence, I am compelled to make you and our readers an explanation and apology which I trust will be received as it is given, in the spirit of candor and good faith.

At the time this discussion was proposed I hesitated to undertake it, realizing that it would add one more demand upon my already overtaxed time and energies, but after careful planning I thought I could so arrange to divide my time and economize my strength as to meet this additional requisition upon both. But I did not foresee that one of the direct results of this discussion would be to double my already heavy personal correspondence, and precipitate upon me a procession of suffering humanity I cannot ignore nor thrust aside nor deny such help as it is possible for me to give.

I have a regular correspondence with more than fifty friends and students of Natural Science, to say nothing of the relatives who must not be neglected, and since this discussion began I have had urgent letters from all parts of this country, from Canada, Mexico, Europe, Australia, and even far away India, which demand carefully prepared answers. I have neither secretary, clerk, stenographer nor maid, and therefore all this work is "hand made" and must be done by me personally and alone.

In addition to all this, for more than a year I have had in my desk the manuscript for a book almost finished, and another work is outlined which must be prepared for the publisher as early as may be possible. These are works directly connected with this particular school of science and philosophy, and appear to me to be of the utmost importance.

It has therefore come to the point where I must face the important problem of my own personal responsibility, as I see it, and decide where my duty lies. I can now see but one way out of the difficulty, and that is to discontinue this discussion for the immediate present and until such time as it may be possible to take up the subject again under less strenuous conditions. And so I have been compelled to decide. This letter, therefore, is to be my "au revoir," but I shall hope not my "good-bye."

This, I know, is a very proper place for me to sign my name, but your last two letters which are yet unanswered, present so enticing an invitation that I am tempted to say a word more in closing for the present my part of this correspondence.

For the first time, you seem to me to sense the fact which I have been trying to make plain, namely, that the author had in mind a very definite and specific PROCESS when he framed his carefully worded definition of "Mediumship." I am indeed glad if this be true, for I am convinced that by following the thought to its legitimate conclusion you will come to see that when the limitations of his definitions are applied and kept in mind, as he requested and intended his readers to do, it will place upon his words and his work a very different value from that which must result from ignoring or overlooking those limitations.

With this in mind I believe I can now answer your question on this subject so that you cannot fail to get my meaning clearly. After you quote his definition of mediumship, showing the three particular elements of control to which he alludes, you say, "We are not informed whether such control, in all cases, covers the three parts, or not. Perhaps it may not proceed beyond the control of the WILL. In that case would it be hypnotism?"

My reply is that it would depend entirely upon the PROCESS employed. If the process were the SUBJECTIVE PSYCHIC PROCESS to which the author refers, it would certainly be hypnotic or mediumistic, as the case may be.

And now, let me see if I can clear up one more point wherein you appear to me to become confused. You say, "That he classes trance, automatic writing, inspirational speaking, impressional mediumship, clairvoyance, clairaudience, emotional insanity, delusional insanity....all is mediumship."

Let me say that I believe this is as misleading a statement as any you have made throughout this discussion, although I readily concede that it is not so intended. You seem to quote his definition only to forget its meaning and application before you can pass to the next sentence.

Again let me quote from the author's own words at page 149 of the book, where he is referring to the effects of the subjective process of mediumship: "The spiritual intelligence dominates and controls the WILL, VOLUNTARY POWERS and SENSORY ORGANISM of the medium. The medium, being thus under the domination and control of the outside, spiritual intelligence, is therefore in a SUBJECTIVE condition TO THE EXACT EXTENT THAT SUCH CONTROL EXISTS.

"That is to say, IN JUST SO FAR as a physically embodied individual is subject to the domination and control of outside spiritual intelligences, IN JUST THAT FAR THE PROCESS involved and the relation thus established are MEDIUMISTIC and therefore SUBJECTIVE.

"The corollary of this proposition is equally true, namely: TO THE EXTENT that a physically embodied individual is FREE from the domination and control of outside, spiritual intelligences, TO PRECISELY THIS EXTENT, the relation between them is INDEPENDENT and therefore NOT MEDIUMISTIC NOR SUBJECTIVE."

Now, while the author defines all the various classes of mediumship to which you have referred, the limitations of his definition are of the most vital importance in connection with each class designated. You seem to forget that the three paragraphs from the book above quoted have any meaning or bearing or application whatever.

You seem to understand, for instance, that when the author refers to clairvoyance as one of the classifications of "mediumship," he means that ALL clairvoyance is necessarily mediumistic. But this is so manifestly unjust that I am sure no careful reader of the book would fall into such an error. It is those who have NOT read the book and who are depending upon this correspondence to form their judgment of it, that will inevitably be misled by such erroneous interpretations.

In order that any reader of the book may observe how far misleading such a conclusion or inference is, it is only necessary for him or her to turn to page 203 and beginning with next to the last paragraph, read as follows:

"Attention is here called to an exceedingly important distinction, viz.: While mediumship is at all times and under all conditions and circumstances a SUBJECTIVE PROCESS and invariably results in a surrender and sacrifice of individual powers on the part of the medium, THIS DOES NOT MEAN THAT ALL PSYCHICAL DEVELOPMENT IS MEDIUMISTIC. ON THE CONTRARY, QUITE THE REVERSE IS TRUE.

"There is, in fact, a method of development which, when once accomplished, enables the individual to come into as conscious relation to his spiritual environment as he is to his physical environment. HE SEES CLAIRVOYANTLY WHENEVER HE DESIRES TO DO SO, and when he opens his spiritual eyes he sees whatever there is upon the spiritual planes within the range of his vision. HE HEARS CLAIRAUDIENTLY whenever he WILLS to do so, and when he thus exercises his spiritual sense of hearing he hears whatever there is to be heard upon the spiritual planes within the range of his hearing. He is able to communicate with those upon the spiritual side of life as freely and as voluntarily as he does with those upon the physical plane.

"Spiritual intelligences HAVE NO CONTROL OVER HIM WHATEVER, NOR ANY OF HIS FACULTIES, CAPACITIES OR VOLUNTARY POWERS. HE IS ABSOLUTELY INDEPENDENT IN THE EXERCISE OF HIS SENSORY ORGANISM. IN OTHER WORDS, HE IS AN INDEPENDENT PSYCHIC IN EVERY SENSE OF THE TERM. HE IS IN EVERY SENSE A NATURAL 'DEVELOPMENT,' AND AT EVERY PROGRESSIVE STEP ALONG THE WAY HE ACQUIRES DEFINITE AND SPECIFIC 'POWERS.'

"HE OCCUPIES THE POSITION OF A MASTER, WHILE THE MEDIUM OCCUPIES THAT OF THE SUBJECT OR SLAVE. THE ONE IS INDEPENDENT, THE OTHER DEPENDENT. THE ONE POSSESSES SPECIFIC AND DEFINITE 'POWERS,' THE OTHER IS ROBBED OF THE POWERS WITH WHICH NATURE ORIGINALLY INVESTED HIM. THE ONE IS AN ACTIVE, INTELLIGENT FACTOR, THE OTHER A PASSIVE INSTRUMENT. THE ONE IS A RESPONSIBLE INDIVIDUAL INTELLIGENCE, THE OTHER AN IRRESPONSIBLE AUTOMATON TO THE EXTENT HE BECOMES A SUBJCT OF MEDIUMISTIC PROCESSES."

When the author refers to clairvoyance as "mediumship," therefore, he does so IN JUST SO FAR ONLY as the PROCESS employed is SUBJECTIVE, but no farther. The same is true when he refers to clairaudience, inspirational speaking, impressional mediumship, emotional and delusional insanity, and in fact every other class of mediumship mentioned by him.

A practical application of these facts will give to the book a meaning quite different from that which you and other critics have unintentionally read into it. So important is this that it would render valueless the alleged "testimony" of every witness you have thus far called and questioned. This is not because there is any question as to the honesty of your witnesses, nor any doubt as to your own motive in calling them. But it is because you have not placed before them the exact nature of the case under consideration.

I do not know the parties personally whom you have questioned and whose answers you have published in your last two letters, and therefore I cannot speak of their alleged "mediumship" of my own knowledge. But it is a fact that some of them have heretofore written of their experiences in such manner as to clearly indicate that what you and they have been designating as their "mediumship" is not mediumship at all within the meaning of the author's definition.

Before it would be possible to give to their testimony any scientific value whatever, it would be necessary to propound to each one of them a very different list of questions from those you have asked them. One of the first questions propounded to each witness should be, "What is MEDIUMSHIP?" And he should be permitted to frame his own definition without suggestion from you or me or anyone else. For only by so doing, and making his answer to this question definite and specific, is it possible to determine whether he is a "medium" at all within the meaning of the author's definition. There are a number of other questions which should supplement this in every case. Upon the answers alone would depend the qualification of each witness to testify from his own personal experiences concerning the effects of the "SUBJECTIVE PROCESS" which the author defines. I do not believe you will question the perfect accuracy and justice of this statement, after you have viewed the subject calmly and without prejudice.

If it were possible for me to carry on this discussion, I should be glad to question each one of your witnesses myself, provided you and they would grant me the privilege. I am satisfied that such questions as I have in mind to ask would elicit much valuable information with which our readers are not all familiar.

While your method of approaching and dealing with the subject is thoroughly UN-scientific, there is, I believe, a way in which it might be possible to make such an examination of all these cases, together with thousands of others, as to enable Spiritualists themselves to determine the question at issue upon the basis of exact and scientific data. I have already suggested to Mr. Francis something of the plan by which this might be accomplished. I am hoping that I may be able to discuss this idea with some of the leading Spiritualists personally, in the near future, and thus help formulate a campaign of scientific inquiry along lines which will offer to Spiritualists an opportunity to PROVE something of scientific value.

The author boldly challenges the world of scientific intelligence to take up this investigation. He states that when such an examination is made it will verify his position beyond all question. He does not shrink from the proposition. He is evidently, therefore, sure of his ground. But you might follow the lines you are now pursuing until you had filled hundreds of columns of The Progressive Thinker with such alleged "testimony" as you have thus far produced, but it would not be of the least scientific value, nor tend in the slightest to scientifically disprove the author's position.

I believe, however, that the time has come when Spiritualists owe it to themselves as well as to the world at large, to enter upon a study of this subject with a purpose single to the demands of science. I believe there are those within the ranks of recognized Spiritualism who are not only capable, but who would be willing, when a definite and adequate plan is outlined, to undertake the work for the sake of laying before the world scientific data which cannot be disputed.

I shall be glad to further this work as far as my time and abilities will permit. I should be glad to work with Spiritualists to that end, for I am convinced that it would be a work for humanity, and it is certainly one which has been all too long deferred.

I wish I had the time and space to make a careful analysis of your definition of "Personal Responsibility," for if there was ever a false philosophy of life promulgated it is that embodied in your conception of this subject as expressed by your definition. If you have therein given expression to your real convictions, I do not wonder that you can see no harm or wrong or moral principle involved in the subjective process of mediumship and hypnotism.

I hesitated to press this subject before, lest I might do you an injustice without knowing it. I desired to be perfectly fair with you, and therefore, feeling that I was not sure of your position, I asked you to define "Personal Responsibility" for me, and this is your definition:

"Individual Dependence upon, and responsiveness to ALL THE CAUSES IN THE COSMOS that reach the individual through ANTECEDENT and envirment." You then add that "this includes rewards and punishments."

If this means anything, it means that each individual, in order to be personally responsible, must depend upon and respond to "ALL THE CAUSES IN THE COSMOS" that "reach" him.

You will doubtless concede that the wisest man of earth is entirely ignorant of the very largest percentage of the "causes of the Cosmos" which "reach" him.

It is therefore apparent that knowledge of Nature and its laws, or of ethics and its principles, has no material place in your conception of the moral status.

If the "causes of the Cosmos" which reach him impel him to commit what mankind calls "crime," he is as much obligated by your definition to do so as he is to refrain in case the "causes of the Cosmos" happen to impel him in the opposite direction.

Can you imagine the results of such a doctrine as this upon society if it were embodied in our laws? Let us suppose for instance, that a man is on trial for murder. It may be that he has wantonly killed his helpless wife and innocent child, as did the man who was recently hung in this state. But under the new order of your philosophy of life, he goes to the witness stand and, after confessing the act, pleads that he was impelled to the act by his "dependence upon and responsiveness to ALL THE CAUSES IN THE COSMOS," etc.

Now, there is clearly no way in which the judge or the jury can disprove his claim, for it is impossible for them to know anything about the "causes in the Cosmos" which may have reached him "through antecedent," especially, and very little of those which may have reached him "through environment."

He must therefore be acquitted. Indeed, under your definition he is obligated to depend upon and respond to "all the causes of the Cosmos" no matter where they lead him or what they impel him to do. Under this view there is no such thing as "crime."

If you could only demonstrate the truth of your proposition you would not only prove the author entirely wrong, but you would reduce society at once to a state of such lawlessness as to save the city, the state and the nation an immense expense for police service, criminal courts and moral instructions.

In a former letter you indicated your belief that there is no destructive principle in nature so far as individual life is concerned. You held that all the processes of nature work together to "remove the obstructions" to man's EVOLUTION.

If this be true, then again "all is good" so far as the evolutionary process is concerned. In this view, what we call "CRIME" is only one of the phases of the EVOLUTIONARY PROCESS, and should therefore not be discouraged. Under your definition it may be just as valuable and necessary as the highest moral expression of life.

Thus, along two different lines your logic results in the total eradication of "crime" from the "COSMOS," or in converting it into an evolutionary and therefore necessary factor in man's development.

And yet, in response to my question, "Is crime a necessary factor in or aid to the evolution of man as an intelligent soul?" you answer, "I THINK NOT."

It was to bring out this contradiction that I asked the question.

And now I have already consumed more than my allotted space and must close, leaving untouched a number of points which I would gladly consider if I dared continue further.

Before closing this letter, let me say that if, during this discussion, I have at times appeared severe in my treatment of your various statements and opinions, please do not interpret this as any disrespect to you, nor any impeachment of your honesty. I ask you to bear in mind that I had been charged with the defense of a book which stands for—not merely the position of its author—but for the philosophy of the Great School I have the honor to represent.

My persistence in this correspondence rests upon the gravity of our theme, and the ever present consciousness of how few there are to formulate the scientific knowledge of the MASTERS, and how few there are to defend the lofty moral principles of their philosophy.

In conclusion, I want to thank you personally for the gentlemanly courtesy with which you have treated "a woman" throughout this correspondence. It has left with me a feeling of warm personal friendship for you as a man, and admiration of you as a writer, and I shall esteem it a privilege to meet you personally if the lines of our lives should ever bring us within hailing distance. Cordially and sincerely,

FLORENCE HUNTLEY.

PSYCHIC LIGHT.

Continuity of Law and Life, by Mrs. Maud Lord-Drake.

Two books lie before me inviting serious attention. Both are written by women, widely and honorably known; both public mediums, and both autobiographic in narration. One of them emanates from across the ocean. It deals largely with physical phenomena such as materialization, spirit photographs and similar facts. The other book concerns itself more with psychic matters and is a product of "Our Maud." Both are written in simplicity of diction and an earnestness of purpose, such as invite confidence and respect from the first sentence to the last. Both books will strengthen any wavering faith in the great movement of Modern Spiritualism, which may come from some of the latter-day weaknesses of the cause. They will give the seeker a body of facts to consider and digest, which may not always be attainable at first hand.

It would be a privilege to be prized, to meet Mme. E. D'Esperance, the author of Shadow Land. That work is a notable contribution to Spiritualism. But it is a reminescential pleasure and honor that I have felt the genial warmth of Maud Lord-Drake's hand-clasp. It is she who has just sent her message to the world in the shape of the second book to which I refer. Psychic Light, the Continuity of Law and Life is also a worthy addition to our literature. The book is full of meat—the meat of psychic experiences covering a period from childhood to her present youth. (Would that the book were as handsome to behold as the ever-charming Maud herself.)

I owe her a debt of gratitude. This will be her first intimation of the fact. In earlier years, when deeply pondering some very important psychological problems connected with Spiritualism, I chanced to hear one of her pleasant informal talks on this subject. Many things seem foreordained; so I was bound to hear an answer to my question from Mrs. Drake's lips, as though in direct response.

My problem in brief, was: Could a person be influenced by another intelligence, but perfectly unconscious of such influence? With our present wealth of knowledge on this matter, the question seems very elementary indeed. But this was before the advent of the English Psychical Society, and the more recent discoveries in the fields of hypnotism.

But, as to the answer. During the discourse Mrs. Drake (then Maud Lord) recounted one of her psychic experiences. A total stranger, she said, came to her in great haste while she was busied in her yard, and begged to know if she had seen anything of his runaway horse. To this she made unhesitating reply that he would find the horse grazing at a certain described spot. The gentleman rushed away on his search. No sooner gone than she became overwhelmed with shame at the succession of "lies" which she had so hastily and thoughtlessly forged. Consciously she had not seen the horse, nor knew anything whatever of his whereabouts. The sequel came soon. The stranger returned with the animal and was most profuse in his thanks for her information, "For," said he, "I found him at the place which you so exactly described."

Let those who understand these matters consider this fact in all of its bearings. To me it outweighs a ton of laborious negative arguments; and everything which I have since learned of that vast subject has but strengthened the far-reaching meaning of that one fact.

And the book is full of such experiences; a veritable mine of them. Like the book of Mme. D'Esperance, it comes from one who in her long course of public psychical ministry, has been above reproach. This means much—for there are no ordinary means of verifying many of the unusual phenomena described. The reader will soon drop into a sympathetic mood. Sharp scientific criticism is practically barred out.

It is impracticable to quote, but it may not come amiss to draw attention of our good theosophical friends to a little extract from page 260, referring to the incomprehensible Blavatsky:

"At the time Madam Blavatsky lived in New York, she was always delighted to have Mrs. Lord call, and was always pleased with the phenomena, as were others of her followers. It was the custom of the Madam to take a leaf out of the center of the table and darken it underneath by hanging curtains and drapery around the edges and have her spirit friends talk to her and show their hands and faces through the opening made in the table. She would place paper, pencils and slate under the table and receive messages written in the various languages with which she was familiar."

Sometimes it is well to end at the beginning, so I shall borrow a few nuggets contained in the preface of the book. That chapter gives our friend an opportunity of doing some philosophizing before she flings wide the doors of her "experience meeting." Let us remember then, that

1.—(All) facts must be self-evident (?) or demonstrable, to our senses; and, the number of the senses must not be limited by our experience."

2.—"It does not so much concern us to know from whence came life and how it came, as to be assured of its continuity and the conditions under which it exists."

3.—"....To know this fact now; to know something of the conditions of the next existence; to acquire some of the essentials for a fair start in that existence is of great value to all."

4.—"To be of value it must be a knowledge, not a belief. It must be a knowledge based upon logical inferences from facts."

5.—"....Neither the beginning nor the end concerns us now as much as the interim—the interlude, the tragedy or travesty, as the case may be....Preparing for the unending future is what should most concern us all while here on earth."

6.—"A force once started must continue until its legitimate consequence is accomplished. The evolution of the race is modified by every thought and action of the past. Every contemplated purpose must be accomplished somewhere along the lines of life, either here or in the great hereafter as sure as effect follows cause."

Many other good things are said, but space prevents reproduction. If every one of Mrs. Drake's personal admirers and friends—those who have come in direct touch with her warm, wholesome nature and have been benefited by the many proofs which she has given them of "the continuity of life"—will each secure a copy of Psychic Light—I predict that the first edition of this worthy contribution to the history and meaning of Spiritualism, will be quickly exhausted. And if these few words will aid to that end, then our universal "Maud" will have cause to remember her old friend, JOSEPH SINGER.

AN OUTRAGE.

Persecution of a Chicago Spiritualist.

To the Editor:—Mrs. Clarisse H. Mullins, a member of the Church of the Soul, a devoted Spiritualist, and most worthy woman, has been subjected to a legal outrage by a court in Owosso, Mich.

Because the papers of that city, and the Detroit Free Press during the five week of her detention there, continually published and commented on her "arrest for abduction," and always announcing that she was a Spiritualist and a medium, Mrs. Mullins desires that the facts in the case should be furnished to Spiritualists.

After repeated postponements of the trial, Mrs. Mullins was discharged on the evidence of the prosecution, after her lawyer, Mr. Eugene Snow, of Saginaw, Mich., had expounded the law to the court showing there was no grounds for her arrest.

Hazel Wallace, the child of whose abduction Mrs. Mullins was accused, was taken from the foundlings' home in Detroit by Mrs. Anna Wallace when eleven months old, Mrs. Wallace being a second cousin of Mrs. Mullins.

Hazel is nearly fifteen years old, was fond of Mrs. Mullins, and for two years had been wishing to come to live with Mrs. Mullins, whom she called Auntie.

Having received a letter from Hazel asking advice concerning the annoying attentions of a young man, Mrs. Mullins consulted a good lawyer, who assured her the child being over fourteen years of age had the legal right to choose her guardian, and wrote Hazel that if after considering the matter well she decided she would like to come now to live with her, she would go to Owosso and bring her.

Hazel replied favorably, sending her measure as requested, that Mrs. Mullins might furnish her an outfit of garments. She told her companions that she was going to Chicago to live. Mrs. Mullins went for her on Nov. 9. The child got homesick before she had reached the city. Mrs. Mullins sent her back the second day after arrival, the 11th of November.

On the 27th, two weeks after, an officer called at her home with a warrant for her arrest for abducting the child. She did not ask for requisition papers, and learned that the Governor when applied to, told the sheriff there was no case against her, and he could not issue requisition papers.

The sheriff (Gerow) said, having gone so far, issued a warrant for arrest, we must proceed, else in future cases Chicago lawyers will not attend to our cases. And this sheriff, who promised Mrs. Mullins that he would not treat her as a prisoner, and with the handclasp of a brother Knight of Pythias, on arriving at Owosso with Mrs. Mullins, would give her no opportunity to get bail and thrust her into jail where she was obliged to stay over Sunday.

Mrs. Mullins wrote to prominent Spiritualists in the state, expecting they would come to her relief by furnishing bail bond, but they failed. As she learned it had been stated that she was going to educate Hazel to be a medium in order to help her in her business, she had Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond go to Owosso to prove to the court that mediums cannot be made.

The trial was postponed from week to week on different pretexts till she engaged Attorney Snow of Saginaw, Mich. She had been furnished bail by Mr. E. H. Cherry, of Owosso, soon as he was informed of the facts of the case.

It is a disgrace to courts and a travesty of justice that such proceedings can be carried forward in the form of law, and innocent persons outraged by legal methods.

LUCINDA B. CHANDLER.

Lake Helen Camp, Fla.

The additions to our numbers of late have been P. W. Birkhauser, Omaha, Neb.; Miss J. E. Whitney, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Miss A. Sahnas, Brooklyn; Miss A. H. Bennett, Brooklyn; Mrs. D. O. Spear, Amherst, Mass.; H. A. Reed and wife, Miller's Falls, Mass., and a Miss Parsons. The above are stopping at Hotel Casadaga.

Mrs. Bender and Miss Wilkinson, of Pittsburg, Pa., are at Brigham Hall and Mrs. Arthur Underhill and son Arthur, from Canton, Ohio, are stopping at the Underhill cottage.

The eastern people named above are a part of the Budington excursion. Three others, Mrs. Flora Bishop, of Boston, and Mr. and Mrs. Evarts, of New Hampshire, are at Hotel Webster.

Mr. and Mrs. Budington are at their fine cottage on the grounds.

Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Porter and son, of Mentor, Ohio, are at the Apartment House.

Sunday, Feb. 7, our regular camp session begins.

We have had one decidedly rainy day and two days that it rained a portion of the time, within the week. The rainy day was just a steady downpour like some of our warm June days in the North.

On Saturday and Sunday it was colder, and to-day (Monday) good fires are very comfortable, but roses, jonquils and jasmines do not seem to heed it at at all.

On Saturday evening, Jan 23, Dr. and Mrs. Hilligoss gave a reception to Mrs. Hilligoss' daughter and her husband, Mr. and Mrs. Zachman, of Cincinnati, O., which was a very enjoyable affair. After introductions, speeches and refreshments, the guests spent some time dancing. Dr. and Mrs. Hilligoss accompanied their children to Miami, and have now returned to camp.

Mrs. Minnie Brown tendered the Ladies' Auxiliary a seance on Wednesday afternoon, which was well attended and netted a nice sum for the association. She was very successful in her descriptions.

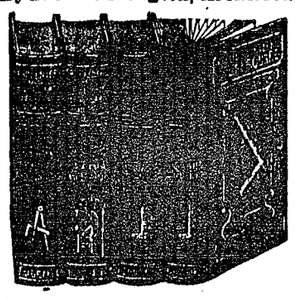
Writing of the ladies brings to mind the fact that Mrs. Horace Kellogg, of Lake Brady, Ohio, collected from the buy a barrel of oil and paint enough to buy a barrel of oil and epaint enough to paint our new lamp posts and lamps, before the lamps were all placed.

Progressive euchre every Monday evening.

Mr. and Mrs. Woodworth, of Montgomery, Ala., are at their cottage on the hill.

Mrs. McIntyre and Mrs. Hurley from Onset, Mass., are occupying M. H. Clark's new Hillside Cottage.

The meetings for the last two Sundays have been of unusual interest. Mrs. Stephens, of Washington, and Mrs. Wheeler, of Massachusetts, have been the leaders, the writer taking the platform in the absence of Mrs. Smith-Baker, of Kansas City, who was detained by the rain and was to have spoken from the subject of "How We Grow."



Several have remembered our bazaar, for which we are very grateful. Please send your names with the articles—we want to know whom to thank.

Mrs. Stephens, of Washington, is an expert fisherwoman. In three boat rides on our lake she has caught 20 black bass, the largest two were 8½ and 6½ pounds, no small fry. This isn't a Jonah story, either. I helped to eat one of the fish, and the last catch of line has been photographed.

Can Telepathy Explain?

Results of Psychical Research

By Minot J. Savage.

Dr. Savage, in this book of 243 pages, discusses problems that have vexed intelligent minds probably to a greater extent than any others, saving those of the religious life. He states a great number of well-authenticated instances of spiritist revelation or communication. His discussion is frank and fearless, and merits the widest reading, for he deals with facts and experiences. Price, cloth, $1.00.

THE LIFE RADIANT.

BY LILLIAN WHITING.—In this book Miss Whiting aims to portray a practical ideal for daily living that shall embody the sweetness and exaltations and faith that lend enchantment to life. It is, in a measure, a logical sequence of "The World Beautiful," leading into still diviner harmonies. It is calculated to render the soul in harmony with the universe. It is truly an inspiration. Price, cloth, $1.00.

"AS IT IS TO BE."

A VERY SUGGESTIVE WORK.

It Beams With Spiritual Truths.

This is a beautiful book, by Cora Lynn Daniels, and it scintillates with grand spiritual thought. An idea of this work can be obtained by reading the titles of a few of the chapters therein:

The Process of Dying; Light and Spirit; The Law of Attraction; Senses of the Spirit; What Is Unconscious Will; Fear; Astrology; The God-Soul of Man; The Drama; A Day in Heaven. Price $1. For sale at this office.

Discovery of a Lost Trail

BY CHARLES B. NEWCOMB,

Author of "All's Right with the World." Cloth 270 pages. Mr. Newcomb made a distinct success with "All's Right with the World," which continues in the front rank of the Metaphysical books that are now so popular. The great number who have been cheered and strengthened by him will welcome another book by this wise teacher whose words of help are doing so much to make the world better by making men and women better able to understand and enjoy it.

"Discovery of a Lost Trail" is a simple study of that strange and beautiful thing called life, but grand in its scholarly simplicity. It will be in demand by many who have not previously read metaphysical writings. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

ANTIQUITY UNVEILED.

Raising Ideas and Money.

Here are some suggestions that may prove of value to the members of Spiritualist Ladies' Aid societies, and others who are working to help the cause of Spiritualism.

As stated in the New York Sun, a mortgage of $3,000 on the First Baptist Church of Macon, Mo., was publicly burned at a jubilee service. The chief share of the glory for paying off the debt belongs to the women of the church, who showed themselves capable of raising ideas, as well as money. Says the Sun:

When they undertook the work they started to collect, not cash, but ideas. They reasoned that if they provided ideas the money would come of itself. So premiums were offered for ideas. Every idea that seemed promising had a fair trial.

The idea that seemed most successful was an elaborate plan originated at Quincy, Ill. In that town the church issued a book of quotations. Every person who contributed 10 cents could have his name printed prominently over his favorite quotation from the classics.

The Macon idea embraced a wider field. There were those who didn't care to borrow their literature. It was therefore provided that every real or fancied poet or prose writer could have his production handsomely printed, just as written, at 10 cents a line. Besides offering a chance for fame, the plan furnished good experience for young writers, because it taught them to economize space.

This world that we are living in
Is mighty hard to beat.
A thorn comes with every rose;
But ain't the roses sweet?

Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you.—Luke vi:26.

Honor and shame from no condition rise;
Act well your part—there all the honor lies.—Pope.

The book was a dazzling success. Evcrybody in town took a copy, and some of the amateur authors bought several copies to send to their friends in other towns.

Another idea that was developed to a profitable point was the manufacture of rugs or mats from cornshucks. This was presented by Mrs. C. R. Haverly, who remembered how her mother used to make such articles for the log cabin home in the pioneer days. In the early fall the women of the church drove out to a farmhouse and asked the owner for the shucks they would unwind from the corn. It was a stupid farmer who wouldn't jump at a proposition to get his corn shucked free. The shucks were brought to town and under Mrs. Haverly's directions white hands wrought skillful shapes for muddy feet. The mats sold readily at from 50 cents to $1 apiece.

Several hundred dollars were netted from these two ideas, and then came an inspiration—"The Woman's Exchange," it was called. A range was installed in the basement of the church, and upon it were developed such tarts, puddings and cakes as mother used to make. These were sold on Saturdays. From $20 to $25 was taken in every Saturday. So urgent has been the demand for its pastry creations that the church bakeshop is still continued, and the surplus revenue will be devoted to the minister's salary and expenses.

The Doctors and Vivisection, Etc.

The following excerpt relating to physicians and some of their cruel practices, is taken from that very instructive and useful work, Part Fifth of Dr. E. D. Babbitt's "Human Culture and Cure," which is for sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker, (price $1). Says Dr. Babbitt:

"Doctors, in their efforts to do some great and sensational thing, have taken rabbits and a great number of other animals including dogs, the best friends of man, and, binding them down, have cut their living, quivering flesh into pieces in spite of their cries, until they were dead.

"The more humane will give an anesthetic, but others seem to gloat on their agonies. Having gone so far, the next step has been to exert their hellish arts on human beings. One doctor in South America tested the germs of yellow fever on five innocent but humble women, all of whom died in agony. Multitudes of persons have been tortured or killed by the experimentation of physicians. When they have become able to rise beyond the slough of materialism into the knowledge of psychic and clairvoyant forces, they will learn that there is a better way to ascertain the processes of life than that of vivisection."

Quite in keeping with the tenor of the foregoing, Dr. Babbitt further says:

"The world could have been immensely more advanced if all colleges and schools had been guided by one great principle of action, namely, a supreme love of truth which shall demand that all students, after acquiring the wisdom of the past, shall keep their minds open to conviction and press forward to new and higher truths. Instead of that a crystallized course of study has generally been pursued and the student has been led to feel that he has acquired an ultimatum of knowledge or principle, so that when new or higher methods are proposed, he will meet them with contempt, branding their authors as quacks, cranks, empirics, etc.

"And yet, in spite of the fact that thoughtful physicians admit that 'medicine is not a science,' and that 'we know nothing of disease,' they have persuaded the legislatures of most of our American states to enact despotic laws against outsiders who have not passed through the set course of just such medical colleges, fining and imprisoning them, especially those who are able to outdo themselves in the treatment of human suffering. We have religious freedom and freedom to vote for any person we prefer, but medical freedom is a hundred years behind the age, for we are not allowed to choose the kind of physician or healer which we desire. Shall we allow such a monopoly to trample upon our constitutional rights?"

These are healthy sentiments clearly expressed.

Peace on Earth.

Every humanitarian must feel a deep interest in anything that tends to increase the sentiment of peace among the peoples and nations of the world. Hence it is of interest to note that in a recent address before the Twentieth Century Club of Chicago, Dr. Benjamin F. Trueblood, secretary of the American Peace Society of Boston, said: "We are at present on the eve of permanent international peace."

Whereupon the Chicago Chronicle remarks:

"True enough, but why?

"Dr. Trueblood bases this millennial hope on the progressive civilization of human nature, which, he thinks, has been greatly hastened, if not originated, by such organizations as the American Peace Society and the various international peace congresses and especially The Hague conference. The next step he hopes for is a new conference like that of The Hague which will deal with a plan for universal disarmament.

"The truth is, the world is much nearer to permanent international peace than Dr. Trueblood supposes, but from a widely different cause. The pacification of the world will be accomplished not by means of the peace societies but in a sense in spite of them. That is, it will come not by humanizing warfare but by making it more terrible. The peace societies are taking to themselves the credit of changes for the better which are wholly attributable to the increasing destructiveness of the arms and engines of modern warfare.

"From the time when armies fought hand to hand with broadswords down to the present, when they fight at a distance of a mile or two with long-range rifles, there has been a constant decrease in the fatalities of war and a constant progress in peace sentiments. It is on this principle that war is to cease and that it has already nearly ceased. Peace societies, so far as they have decreased the destructiveness of warfare, have postponed the advent of universal peace.

"As battles are not won by killing all nor even one-tenth of the enemy, but by killing and wounding enough to scare away the rest, there is evidently a degree of danger conceivable which no army will dare to face. At the precise moment when the implements of war produce that degree of danger war will cease and men will become as peaceable as lambs. Moreover, that moment is not far away."

There is much of sound philosophy in the Chronicle's remarks. Yet it must be considered that, in different ways, the perfecting of the means of war's destructiveness works in combination with the growth of humanitarian, peace sentiment, toward the elimination of war from the world. Incongruous as it may seem, the perfection of the destructive enginery of war, and the increase of peace sentiment, work hand-in-hand to bring in the reign of universal peace.

Made Insane by Orthodoxy.

"Living in fear of the vengeance of God and believing that eternal damnation would be the price of sins he acknowledged, Christopher Sending, an 18-year-old boy, has gone insane after refusing sleep and food, except what was forced upon him, for three weeks. Sending walks or runs continuously and had been in motion for two weeks except when strong drugs were administered by relatives. He has been a student of the Bible and went insane over religion," says a New York Herald dispatch from La Crosse, Wis.

Viewing the matter dispassionately, it is no wonder the young man went insane. The great wonder is that all believers in orthodoxy do not go insane. There are few who would not become insane if they really and fully believed the horrible orthodox dogma of endless hell torments for their children, relatives, friends, and "sinners" generally—all the unconverted, including by far the larger part of the human race.

An Opportunity of a Life-Time!

From all sides there comes an appeal for some materializing medium to capture the one thousand dollars. Mr. Hale, who offers this large sum, is in every way responsible, and is a fine gentleman in all respects. Any genuine materializing medium can easily capture the amount. The conditions for the seance will be far better than the usual promiscuous circle, as the medium will be allowed, no doubt, to select one dozen congenial persons, to form a battery, thus making success certain. It would immortalize the name of any medium to capture the $1,000 and donate it to the N. S. A. for the benefit of the Medium's Fund.

$ THOUSAND $

MATERIALIZATIONS WITNESSED WITHOUT THE AID OF A PROFESSIONAL MEDIUM—AN URGENT DEMAND MADE THAT SOME MEDIUM CAPTURE THE THOUSAND DOLLARS—WHAT MEDIUM WILL FIRST RESPOND TO THE CALL, AND TRY TO WIN THE PRIZE?

It is quite incomprehensible to me why some one at least of the many mediums who claim to be magnets for genuine spirit materializations, does not accept the truly munificent offer of the California gentleman of ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS as a reward for simply one genuine materialized spirit form, as published in 439 of your paper.

As I recall it there was just such an offer made some years ago and was kept standing from week to week in the columns of The Progressive Thinker, but no one could be induced to make the effort to secure the money.

What other conclusion can the public and the great mass of Spiritualists arrive at than that all so-called materializations are bogus; all such alleged mediums arrant frauds, AND IN NO PHASE OF HUMAN EXPERIENCE CAN THE PRACTICE OF FRAUD BE OF A MORE DESPICABLE CHARACTER THAN THAT OF TRIFLING WITH, FOR SAKE OF MERE GAIN, THE TENDEREST, PUREST AND HOLIEST AFFECTIONS OF THE HUMAN HEART. I speak only for the masses, and the cause herein represented in this regard, for personally such failure to accept does not in the least degree impair my belief—aye, my positive knowledge that spirit forms can and do materialize with sufficient clearness of outline as to be readily observed by the physical eye as are the mortal forms.

While I am no materializing medium, do not pose as a medium of any phase, and have no desire to do so, yet I have had genuine materialization on two occasions, several months apart, and with no expectation or desire therefor, and consequently without any of the usually considered prerequisites for such phenomena. YES, BROTHERS OF THE SUNSET LAND, THERE IS SUCH A THING AS REAL MATERIALIZATION OF SPIRIT FORMS, REGARDLESS OF WHETHER ANY OF THE PUBLIC MEDIUMS EVER PRODUCE IT OR NOT.

The first of these two experiences occurred in the winter, which was spent by me on a farm some ten miles from where I then lived in Iowa. The house, which was a large two-story one, was occupied at the time by just three other persons—the farmer, who was some seventy years old, and his wife about sixty, who slept on the ground floor. A lady relative of the family occupied a room on the second floor in a separate wing from where I slept, full fifty feet distant, with two vacant rooms, and a large hall with four doors securely locked and bolted, two from one side and two from the other, making it utterly impossible for a mortal to pass from one room to the other.

I particularize in these things to show my complete isolation from all of humanity at the time of the occurrence. I awoke with a clear impression that there was a presence in the room, but without the slightest sensation of fear, and I saw the form of a man standing at the foot of the bed, and I seemed intuitively to realize that the presence was not that of mortal. The room was nicely lighted by the moon, and hence I could see all the objects therein. As I opened my eyes and looked closely at the visitor he smiled, nodded his head and pleasantly remarked, "Good evening, sir," and stepping around to the side of the bed he continued: "You now behold a materialized spirit form. Now you see me, and—now—you—don't." As he spoke the last four words slowly he was gradually becoming less and less material, and at the word "don't" became wholly invisible, without moving an inch from where he stood.

The other incident occurred in the spring of 1894. I was also alone in bed, but at my usual stopping-place in town. The family consisted of the parents and four small children who slept on the first floor, and two half-grown boys who occupied a room alongside of mine, but separated by a solid plaster wall, the doors of both opening into a common hall, and both locked from within. Again I awoke with the impression that there was a materialized form in the room. As soon as I opened my eyes I saw the form of a man, but quite different in appearance from the other one, standing just beside the bed. I clearly realized that I was fully awake. While looking me squarely in the face, he reached over with his left hand, caught and twisted my nose so that it pained me sharply, and it was fully five minutes before the sensation of pain had fully left my face. After tweaking my nose he straightened up and stood good-naturedly grinning at me, when I remarked with some little annoyance, "Why did you hurt me so?" He replied, "I had to do it to convince you." He then walked across the room, still plainly visible to me until he reached the wall and suddenly vanished.

I was too thoroughly convinced by that lesson to have need of any more along that line, and am perfectly satisfied of the possibility of genuine materialization, regardless of what professional mediums may do or may fail to do.

Knowing absolutely of the genuineness of the experiences narrated, it is the more astounding to me the THOUSAND DOLLAR offer should remain open twenty-four hours, without a number of claimants for the privilege of demonstration in accord therewith.

The writer is a plain, practical, common-sense business man, and when he asserts that he would rather be the one to honestly win that THOUSAND, than be President of the United States, Emperor of Germany, or King of Great Britain, he means all that the words imply—not that he is carried away with zeal and enthusiasm, for well he knows that if that test were honestly made, and it were conclusively proven that spirit forms would materialize at his command, he would soon become a greater than President, Emperor, King, Czar and Pope combined—no living potentate but would do him honor—Catholic, Protestant, Jew, Pagan, Infidel, and even anarchist, all, all would worship at his shrine and he would never more know human want so far as wealth and honor are concerned.

Then, mediums, awake! arise to the occasion, or if there is not one of you who can meet this fair and reasonable proposition, then go to The Progressive Thinker office, and at my expense, have labels printed in the largest type that the office affords and have them pasted upon your back, bearing these words, "I AM A FRAUD; KICK ME OUT OF TOWN."

A GENEROUS OFFER, AND A CALL TO SPIRITUALISTS.

To the Spiritualists at Large:—A generous offer has been made by a prominent Spiritualist in this city to give ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS to the Mediums' Relief Fund of the N. S. A., for the benefit of aged and needy mediums, provided the Spiritualists at large will contribute another Thousand Dollars to the same relief fund by the first of June next. The N. S. A. is now paying out a large monthly sum in pensions to worthy mediums; the calls for aid increase and the fund is constantly being depleted. Let every generous soul who has not already done all possible for this worthy object, kindly send contributions, large or small, to the following address, each will be acknowledged with thanks. The generous man who makes the offer desires to be unnamed to the public.

MARY T. LONGLEY, N. S. A. Secretary.
600 Pennsylvania avenue S. E., Washington, D. C.

We send $5 as a starter, to assist in capturing the $1,000. We are deeply interested in seeing our helpless mediums properly cared for.

BOOK REVIEW.

The Holy Grail. The Silent Teacher. By Mary Hanford Ford. Published by Alice B. Stockham & Co., Chicago.

A dainty little book, beautiful alike in its exterior and its contents. It constitutes a very interesting explication of the Holy Grail, the story that has been told and sung for centuries, and whose origin is shrouded in mystery. The story is beautifully told, and its spiritual significance elucidated in this volume.

The Autobiography of the I or Ego, or the Metaphysics of an Interloper and Impostor, Himself in the Role of Confessor. By Charles K. Wheeler.

The work is to the effect of a demonstration that human beings are not self-conscious nor even conscious.

Annual Convention of National Woman Suffrage Association.

The 36th annual convention of the National American Woman Suffrage Association will be held in National Rifles' Armory Hall, Washington, D. C., February 11 to 17 inclusive.

A program of unusual interest has been prepared consisting of an evening with the National officers, one with Philanthropists and one with Sociologists, when men and women foremost along these various lines of thought will be heard.

There will be an afternoon and evening devoted to Colorado speakers. Mrs. Ellis Meredeth of Colorado, one of the cleverest newspaper women in the United States, will respond to a question box, when opportunity will be given to all persons to ask any questions they may desire concerning the operation of woman suffrage in Colorado.

Woman suffrage has been tried for ten years in Colorado and some of the state's most eminent citizens are coming to Washington to this convention to tell how it has worked.

Congressional hearings will be given woman suffrage on the morning of the 16th.

On Monday afternoon at 2:30 there will be a reception to the delegates at the White House by President and Mrs. Roosevelt, and at 4 o'clock on the same day the delegates will be received by Miss Clara Barton, at her own home. Miss Barton has a large collection of medals and flags which have been presented to her for her services by many nations which will make a visit to her home of special interest.

The hotel headquarters will be the Shoreham.

RADIUM VS. SPIRITUALISM

By Hudson Tuttle, Editor-at-Large National Spiritualist Association.

Several inquiries, accompanied by the following clipping have been received and a desire expressed to know as to its truth.

"Radium is puzzling and disturbing the Spiritualists. They are issuing serious warnings against meddling in any way with this marvel of nature. Prof. Ramsey, the high priest of radium, told a Morning Leader representative yesterday that almost every day his mail bag contained letters on the subject—letters of the most amazing kind—hinting that radium is an active agent of the supernatural. 'It is positively amazing how many lunatics there are at large in the world,' said the professor, with a smile. 'Whenever any new discovery crops up, these absurd people come out with their theories and prophecies. There seems to be no end of them. The radium craze has brought out Spiritualists more than anybody. Day after day I receive letters from these people warning me—most solemnly warning me—to leave radium absolutely alone and assuring me that such a potent force in nature must not be tampered with. There is no doubt that many occultists and Spiritualists believe that radium is one of the mysterious components of the other world, and they are genuinely anxious to know how ordinary mortals are to deal with it. They are biding their time for psychic revelations concerning it.'"

No doubt Prof. Ramsey gave his opinion to reporters after this bombastic style, yet it is almost unbelievable that a man claiming to be a scientist, in fact that a man claiming ordinary intelligence and sanity, could thus expose his utter disregard of truth in airing his vanity. Cranks and visionaries may have written him, but we challenge him to give the name of a single Spiritualist who has thus approached him. Spiritualists may be interested in radium as they are in all new discoveries, but why is it any more to them than aluminum? The spiritual press which quickly responds to the minds of its readers, has scarcely published a paragraph in reference to the subject. Once Prof. Ramsey has been quoted and a few mentions been made, but it has never been suggested that Spiritualism had anything to expect from radium more than from lead.

Prof. Ramsey could not have received letters from known Spiritualists, "warning him," for Spiritualists think for themselves and are sane people. For some purpose not apparent on the surface, there has been a great effort put forth to exploiter this discovery and throw a mystery over it. A thousand things are said of it that are not true, which in the nature of things cannot be true. It was at first said that it overturned all theories hitherto entertained of the constitution of matter. It was the exception, and proved the possibility of the perpetual motion. It exerted force, an awful, horrible force, without the least loss. It blazed with the splendor of the noon-day sun and diminished not. It would melt its weight of ice and then melt its weight again, ad infinitum, without losing a fraction of a degree of its own temperature.

Prof. Ramsey "discovered" that he could convert radium into helium, and as he could not catch the helium, concluded that he had resolved it back to force or nothingness. According to him the high atomic weight of radium shows that it is a compound, and gold being yet higher is more complex and ought to be converted into lower metals by being let down. There comes the problem of bringing the base metals up to the gold standard and a revival of the old charlatan business of converting these metals into gold!

Spiritualists have not "gone daffy" over this matter, but some of the scientists surely have. The scientific doctors have already "radium water," and are employing the rays in curing many diseases. They seized the X-rays in the same manner and dabbled with electricity as a curative agent. There is "bottled electricity" advertised as a miraculous cure-all, although it is well known that electricity cannot be condensed or confined in a bottle of water! We do not know if the ignorance and credulity on one hand is more to be pitied than the arrogance and pretension on the other is to be condemned.

When radium is relieved from sensational reports and the facts arrived at, it will be quite another substance from that Prof. Ramsey exploiters. It will not be found an exceptional element more than the X-rays are exceptional forms of light.

What confidence can be placed in Prof. Ramsey's scientific knowledge when his vanity tickled by a penny reporter, leads him so far from the truth? Why should he think that an occultist or a Spiritualist would regard radium as "one of the mysterious components of the other world?" Is not radium as material as iron? Does not Spiritualism teach that spirit forms and spirit spheres are so attenuated that although matter, this matter has been given the name of substance?

Not a Spiritualist expects "psychic revelations" from radium more than from pig-iron. As for the danger from "tampering" with it, until something more than an ounce of it is collected and some source found which will yield more than a dram to eight tons of rubbish, the danger is not imminent.

By the way, that furnishes a good illustration of the present knowledge of radium and Prof. Ramsey's knowledge of Spiritualism; a dram to eight tons of misstatement and ignorance.

NEW BOOK.

Psychic Light.

BY MRS. DRAKE.

Important Addition to Our Literature.

Mrs. Maud Lord Drake has a national reputation as a medium. The manifestations given through her mediumship have been most marvelous. She has written a book with this title: "PSYCHIC LIGHT—THE CONTINUITY OF LAW AND LIFE." It is a ponderous volume of 600 pages. It will hold your attention from the beginning to the end. It is chockful of stirring incidents. On another page will be found a review of the work by Prof. Singer. Everybody should read this new contribution to our Spiritualistic literature. Price of this large volume, only $1.60 postpaid.

"Handy Electrical Dictionary." A practical handbook of reference, containing definitions of every used electrical term or phrase. Price 25 cents.

Henry Ward Beecher A Trance Medium.

Dr. Minot J. Savage, pastor of the Church of the Messiah, preaching Jan. 31, on the "Divine Inspiration," said: "An intimate friend of Mr. Beecher told him it was no uncommon thing for him to preach in a trance. He did not say that he always did, but that it was an experience that was not unknown to him. He would rise and begin to speak when there would be a sudden rush of blood to the head and he would lose consciousness, and those were the days when he preached his most wonderful sermons. He would come to himself to find the people leaning on the rail in front of him absorbed and intent with listening, and when some one would ask him what he meant by saying a special thing he would have to wait for a report of the sermon to learn what it was. He reports this as an actual experience."—Chicago Record-Herald.

NEGRO GIRL INSPIRED BY SPIRITS.

Anzalia Edmonia Martin Goes Into a Trance, and Then the Muse Writes Poetry.

Guided by a spirit hand, Anzalia Edmonia Martin, a young negro girl of Kansas City, Mo., employed as domestic, writes poetry that stamps her a worthy peer of Paul Laurence Dunbar, the poet laureate of the negro race.

Miss Martin is 25 years old, and was born on a farm near Valley Falls, Kans. She graduated from the city schools and county high school and for one year taught a negro school. When the white and negro schools were consolidated, she lost her position, and came to Kansas City. Here she found employment as a domestic. Her employer, a music teacher, was a strong believer in Spiritualism. With the characteristic psychological leaning of the negro towards that which is mysterious and least understandable, the girl soon became imbued with the Spiritualistic ideas of her mistress.

Frequently her mistress, when coming out from the control of spirit forces, would write a piece of poetry, which, she said, was inspired while she was under the influence. This so worked on the girl's mind that, one night, while talking with her mistress about Spiritualism, she seemed to pass into a sleep that lasted for everal minutes. Then she awoke, and seizing a pencil that lay on the table, she wrote a piece of poetry. This was about a year ago. She sent the poetry to a negro paper and it was published. Frequently since that time she has written pieces of poetry, declaring that each poem is inspired by spirit forces. Last winter Paul Laurence Dunbar visited Kansas City and Miss Martin met him and submitted some of her poems for criticism. The negro poet pronounced them of a high order of merit, and gave the girl great encouragement. Since then she has contributed many to her race papers and some to the local newspapers, all of which have been published. Here is her latest effort:

Twilight.

The sun in his red robe of fire
Has passed o'er the hills from our sight;
The bright golden hue of the sunset
Tells us of approach of the night;
And peeping from o'er the horizon

A sweet song I hear in the silence,
The nightingale's song to its mate;
A song that is heard by its Maker,
'Tis heard in the twilight till late—
My soul longeth ever for music;
I linger and list at my gate.

The flowers with heads toward the west
Are peeping to see the red sun
Whose warm rays have kissed them so gently
From dawn till the glad day is done;
And stars, the sentinels of heaven,
Proclaim that the night has begun.

Superstitious Reverence.

Another exemplification of Romish superstitious reverence is brought to view by a special "cable dispatch" from Milan, Italy, under date of January 23, to the effect that "The greatest attraction of the treasury of Cologne formerly was the collection of the bones of the three magi—Caspar, Balthazar, and Melchoir—exhibited in a glass case set with priceless jewels.

"The reliquary and its contents have just been given to the diocese of Milan and installed in the basilica of St. Enstorge with great pomp.

The remains of the three magi, who once crossed the plains to take gifts to the Child of Judea, are now represented by a few fragments of the vertebral column."

"Koradine. By Alice B. Stockham and Lida Holt Talbot." In the form of an entertaining story, it contains lessons which every girl should know. Price, cloth, $1.

THE SONG OF MEMNON.

The story told of Memnon old—
I wonder if it's true;
That once at morn a voice was born,
'Twas tender, sweet and true,
And sang a song unknown to men,
With strange and mystic note,
That rose above like thought of love
And seemed to glide and float;

That in the ancient building time
Of monuments most grand,
Of pyramidal thought and line,
A memnon used to stand,
And when the dew had touched aright,
And when the sky was clear,
The voice that was caught within the night
Would fill the listener's ear.

Oh, Memnon, if thou hadst a voice,
The world of old to thrill,
We hear it not, for through long years
That voice of thine is still;
A strange low echo comes to us,
O'er history's mystic pages,
We cannot hear—but we may dream
Thou singest through the ages.

And when the song comes to us now,
Through silence great and vast,
We must interpret it aright,
As in our presence cast;
And this the song I hear thee sing,
Of patience and of love,
That bring each day their offering
To us from worlds above.

And when the world in turbulence
And bitterness of strife,
Cries out in poor ambition,
As in our present life,
I love to hark a little
Away from all the rest,
And strive to wake thy echo,
Thy voice within thy breast.

Oh, Memnon, long since silenced,
I think thy voice didst cease
When men began to quarrel,
And ceased to pray for peace.
But when the world's great lesson
Of turbulence has passed,
And peace divine awakens
Within man's soul at last,
Though all thy stone hath crumbled,
From out thy ashes then,
I think thy voice will waken,
And sing its psalm again.

JENNIE HAGAN BROWN.

A Suggestion to Spiritualist Writers.

A desirable object to attain is the introduction of the subject of Spiritualism to the readers of the secular press. Our Spiritualist papers are all doing a grand, noble work for the cause, but they are taken only by Spiritualists and rarely reach readers outside their ranks. The secular press now more than ever, is not only not averse, but anxious to publish articles upon the subject of Spiritualism, because it is aware that among its readers there is a demand for them which is growing. It is easy to conceive how the appearance of such articles in the secular press will tend to increase the subscription lists of our Spiritualistic papers.

Now, there is in the Chicago Sunday Record-Herald, a page entitled, "The Battle Ground of Modern Thought," which seems to be a sort of "free for all" for the expression of thought upon all subjects of general interest. Within the past few years I have contributed to this department several short articles upon or relating to the subject of Spiritualism, which, I have been assured, have been of great interest to a number of readers. There is hardly an issue of this department in which there is not one or more communications which afford a splendid opportunity for the Spiritualist to introduce his great truth directly or indirectly. Advantage should be taken of this chance by our workers, as frequently as possible. Eternal vigilance is the price of our final triumph. We cannot expect to break through the enemy's ranks unless we continue to present a bold front and keep pounding away. I hope our Spiritualistic advocates all over the country will be on the watch-out for, and miss no opportunity to get before the secular readers a few of our "pearls of great price."

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE BIBLE TELL IT.

JOHN E. REMSBURG'S GREAT WORK

The late R. G. Ingersoll stated in one of his famous lectures on the Bible: "Somebody ought to tell the truth about the Bible." John E. Remsburg, former President of the American Secular Union, has taken this obligation upon himself, and the fruits of his studies on the subject are now published in the shape of nearly 500 pages. The "higher criticism" has already plowed this field over quite deeply, but it has reached the ear of the public only in a fragmentary way, and even at that has found a very reluctant echo in the press. So much the more reason for rejoicing that this comprehensive work, got up in simple and popular language, is all contained in a single synoptically arranged book. The separate chapters of the work appeared in consecutive order in an uninterrupted series of articles in the New York Truth Seeker.

The facts set forth in this book about the Bible, its origin, its compilation, its preservation, its falsehoods, its credibility, and the morality it inculcates, are only partially known to the majority of ministers and priests, and it is earnestly to be desired that well-to-do Freethinkers may take it upon themselves to make energetic propaganda of the modern "higher" elucidation of the Bible by gratuitous distribution of this book to public libraries, or to Messrs. the pastors. The enormous expenditure of time and labor which the author imposed upon himself, the astonishingly low price of the book as compared with the attractive form in which it is gotten up, as well as the unanswerable logic of the composer—he lets the holy book for the most part speak for itself—are indeed worthy of the highest praise.

Ingersoll's desire that somebody should at last tell the whole truth about the Bible has been brilliantly fulfilled. No Freethinker worthy of the name can afford to pass over Remsburg's book in silence. Like Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," may it, let us hope, find admirers and translators in other languages. And again, like Paine's book, may this brilliant work bring to its author the praise of posterity.—Der Freidenker (Milwaukee).

This great work on the Bible by Mr. Remsburg is most valuable—it is an encyclopedia of information in regard to the Bible, and surpasses in importance all other works of the kind now published. It is up-to-date in every particular. Price, $1.25, instead of $1, as stated last week.

THE ABSENCE OF DESIGN IN NATURE.

Prof. H. D. Garrison's Cogent View.

There is nothing more beneficial to a normal thinking mind than to read and reflect, especially with reference to creation in its various operations. In order to demonstrate the absence of design in nature, the Professor gives many cogent reasons, which will make a deep impression upon many. We take great pleasure in presenting his views to thinking minds.

It is claimed by theologians that the order of Nature, when rightly interpreted, proves the existence of a great contriver or designer, and it is further maintained, by many, that the chief, if not the sole object in view by that great designer is, and always has been, the welfare of the human race.

Assuming the existence of a Deity, endowed with the attributes of infinite wisdom and power, it follows as a logical necessity, that whatever he designs and executes must be faultless in plan and perfect in workmanship. In other words a perfect God can make no mistakes. If we find what we believe to be mistakes in nature, we may explain their existence in one only of two ways. First, we may assume that we ourselves are mistaken; or, if this is not possible, then we must conclude that the imperfections observed are not the product of divine wisdom and workmanship.

EXISTENCE OF A GREAT DESIGNER.

The first explanation, which simply assumes that in all such cases we ourselves are in error, has proven so inconvenient to theologians and so anodyne to the human intellect that it is usually adopted, without question or remonstrance. We assume that what appears to be useless and purposeless in Nature will present a different aspect when we come to more fully understand the matter; and, if after prolonged and thorough investigation, the difficulty still persists, we hush the voice of reason by still assuming that we have not yet gone deeply enough into the matter. We are invited into the field of Nature to observe the evidences of design which are to prove the existence of a Great Designer, but at the very threshold of our inquiry are warned that we must only heed evidence in favor of the proposition in question. When difficulties appear and doubts arise, we are admonished that in times past it has often happened that what men have thought useless or even injurious has been found, on further inquiry, to be useful or even essential, and that therefore, a like solution of every problem is certain to result from adequate investigation. We appeal to reason to prove a proposition, and then deliberately reject all the adverse evidence, assuming that it must be imperfect, misleading and false, or it would not be adverse. It is as if the state, which assumes all prisoners before trial to be innocent, should refuse to receive or credit the evidence of the prosecution, because it has often happened in times past that men, esteemed guilty beyond doubt, by the bench, the bar and the people have been shown by the developments of time to be absolutely innocent.

The alternative of this mode of disposing of the subject on ex parte evidence is, if imperfections and purposeless parts are found in Nature, to deny that Nature furnishes any proof of design. The existence of such harmony and adaptations of means to ends as we perceive about us, cannot be accepted as proof of design, while there remains even one imperfect or purposeless structure in Nature; for we cannot perceive that a perfect God made a single mistake, or left any work in an imperfect or unfinished condition. Nor can we conceive that God designed some parts of nature and neglected other parts. All is, therefore, the product of divine plan and workmanship of none.

FOREORDINATION AND PREDESTINATION.

There is, however, a third method of solving this problem, which at first glance is apparently very profound, but which on investigation, proves to be a transparent sophistry. Thus, it is said that behind all matter and force there may exist an agency or being, who created the universe, with all its materials and forces, and who, having created matter and the laws to which it is subject, is content to allow Nature to proceed in obedience to the original, divine plan. This is simply foreordination and predestination applied to the universe. But it will be noticed that in stating this proposition, we are obliged to refer to an agency or "force behind all force," which involves a contradiction of terms. In other words, we must assume that, somewhere behind all matter and force, there is yet another force, which is an absurd proposition.

A BEING BEHIND NATURE.

Paley and others have written many volumes with a view of proving the existence of this hypothetical being behind Nature, using arguments which in the main, are analogous to the celebrated watch argument, which may be thus briefly stated:

A traveler finds a watch, and, on examination of its mechanism, notes abundant evidence of design, which induces him to believe that the watch did not come by chance, but had a designer and maker. Next the anatomist and physiologist examine the body of the watchmaker, and, on careful inspection, find it to be more wonderful in many respects than the watch, wherefore they conclude that it must have been designed and manufactured by an artificer possessed of superhuman knowledge and power. The theologian now takes up the clue and finds that this Great Designer lives somewhere in the sky, or behind Nature; and, although he does not frankly say as much, evidently concludes that this mighty being is so very wonderful that he did not require either a designer or maker at all!

For the sake of argument, however, we may neglect the absurdity involved in the doctrine of design, that God himself must have been designed by a greater God, and he by another, and so on, ad infinitum, and address ourselves at once to the facts of Nature.

That there is a remarkable adaptation of living beings to their environment, is apparent to all, and has in all ages and among all peoples, originated and maintained the theory of an intelligent, designing Deity. Can this wonderful adaptation of living beings to their environment be otherwise explained?

EVOLUTION THE DESIGNING HAND.

The doctrine of evolution—natural selection—the survival of the fittest, explains all in a most satisfactory manner. Evolution is, therefore, the designing hand. True, steps in the development of beings of every kind are not yet, and perhaps never will be made out with certainty. It may never be known, for example, what combination of circumstances drove the whale—originally a land animal—into the sea; but conditions having that tendency are readily conceivable. Those who refuse to accept the doctrine of evolution, because all the steps and stages in the evolution of animals and plants have not been observed, and cannot be reproduced experimentally, occupy the illogical position of rejecting the evidence of an army of witnesses simply because of the absence of one or a few, the testimony of whom they hope, almost against hope, would be contradictory to those at hand. For the same reason we might refuse to accept all the sciences, and in fact all knowledge, not excepting theology, which, indeed, would be the first to fall by this test.

Since all the adaptation observed in Nature is fully and rationally accounted for by the theory of evolution—indeed, we might say, is required by that theory—it is plainly a violation of the fundamental laws of human reason to attempt to explain these relations by invoking miraculous agency—a cause unknown to science, and of the existence of which no proof can be given in this age.

Pushing aside for the time, however, all of these grave objections, which in themselves are fatal to the doctrine of design, let us see if the facts so much relied upon by Paley, Lord Brougham and others warrant, in any degree, the inferences drawn from them.

DESIGNED ORGANS SHOULD BE PERFECT.

As before remarked, any creature or organ designed and made by an omniscient and omnipotent creator should be absolutely perfect in every respect. What creature is perfectly adapted to its environment, or what organ performs its functions perfectly?

The eye on which theologians place so much stress, is very far from perfection. The number of persons seen with eyeglasses and other devices to aid ordinary vision, shows that this organ is, to say the least, very easily disordered in many different ways. Optically, the eye is not perfectly planned to guard against spherical or chromatic aberation, while in mechanical construction, it is inferior to the cheapest optical instrument in the market. Astigmatism, or want of sphericity of the cornea, is present in a greater or less degree in the case of every human eye, while the crystalline lens, seems to be even more imperfect than the cornea in this respect. Moreover; these refreacting media, the cornea and crystalline lens, are not truly centered, as Helmholtz has shown, on the optical axis of the eye. The refracting media of the eye, as the aqueous humor, the crystalline lens and vitreous humor, are not uniformly transparent, and hence, rays of light during transmission, undergo absorption and refraction, giving rise to various shadows, halos and fringes which fall upon the retina to the great impairment of vision. Even in the best of eyes there are numerous opaque, granules or floating patches in the humors, giving rise to moving spots or spectres so well observed and yet so annoying while using the microscope, especially if the field is well illuminated. Long-sightedness and short-sightedness are common difficulties arising from want of proper relation between the refracting power of the eye and its depth, or the antero-posterior diameter. All of these difficulties are practically overcome or avoided in even the cheapest photographic cameras in the market, and yet no one has ever claimed that the camera had a miraculous origin or that the wonderful design manifest in its mechanism proves its designer to have been a god. In the inner corner of every human eye is seen a little mass of flesh containing a little plate of cartilage. It is the vestige of the membrana nictitans or third eyelids of birds and reptiles, and is not of the slightest use to man. Why is it there? Its existence, which is inexplicable on the theory of design, is not only consistent with the theory of evolution, but is one among the thousands of unanswerable arguments in favor of that theory.

THE EAR VERY IMPERFECT.

The ear is, in many respect, as imperfect as the eye. There are in the structure of the external ear, and attached to it, ten muscles—all in a rudimentary condition, and all absolutely useless. Indeed, all of the ear visible to the eye, except a small shell-shaped depression immediately around the opening, and not so large as an ordinary teaspoon, is completely useless, and in consequence of its liability to freeze, is to some extent, injurious. For what purpose, then, was this mass of useless material formed. Does its beauty or its utility as an additional member on which jewelry can be worn justify its existence. The internal construction of the ear is quite as faulty as that of the eye; but for the present, we must content ourselves with only the observations that we cannot hear either very high or very low tones, and that we judge but very imperfectly of either the direction or distance of sounds.

THE TEETH CRITICALLY CONSIDERED.

Turning out attention now to other structures, we find, for example, on looking into the mouth of a child, a set of teeth beginning to appear soon after birth, and which continue to cut their way through swollen and tender gums from time to time, during two or three years. Hardly is the last one of these milk-teeth visible, before the whole set begins to vanish, before the incoming, so-called "permanent set." If the child is able to survive the toothaches and teething syrups and diseases of a dangerous character incident to this period, and largely caused by the cutting and shedding of one set of teeth and the appearance of another set, it may hope, by the time it is able to vote, to have cut its last wisdom tooth. But, as a rule, long before this time the service of the dentist is needed on the new crop of teeth. As a matter of fact, the dentist furnishes us the only strictly reliable and permanent teeth we ever have. No one can doubt that the process of teething, and the teeth produced, are far from bearing the impress of perfection. Indeed, few animals, having any teeth at all, are not better off in this respect than the human race.

THE EVIL OF VARIOUS ARRANGEMENTS.

Looking a little further down the throat, we observe a pair of tonsils, of no earthly use except as filling for a small amount of space which certainly might have been filled with some tissue not so liable to become inflamed and swollen, as in tonsilitis or quinsy. In surveying this region of the body we notice that the opening of the trachea, or windpipe, lies just below the opening into the oesophagus or gullet, so that every breath of air through the nostrils must cross the path of food to the stomach, and what is worse, every grain of food and every drop of liquid, on its way to the stomach, must pass over the opening into the trachea, thus endangering the life of man every time a mouthful of food is swallowed. That the danger is real, and not simply imaginary, is abundantly proven by the large number of deaths due to choking caused by the impaction of pieces of food, often relatively small, in the glottis during meals. Even when death does not result, the evil of the arrangement is apparent in the spasmodic coughing caused by the entrance of small crumbs or drops of liquid during meals.

THE WORKINGS OF THE STOMACH.

The arrangement of the various digestive fluids in the alimentary canal is far from being the best one possible. In the mouth, food meets saliva, an alkaline liquid having a tendency to convert starch into sugar, but this process is hardly begun before the food reaches the stomach, where it meets an acid liquid—the gastric juice—which effectually destroys the alkalinity of the saliva which had been swallowed, and thus at once and forever prevents its action. Even the ptyaline, the ferment principle of the saliva, is destroyed by the action of the gastric juice. After leaving the stomach food encounters two alkaline liquids—the bile and pancreatic juice, the latter secretion being simply saliva again. Here, digestion begun but not completed in the stomach, is arrested, and the kind which began in the mouth is again set up! Such an arrangement is not justified by any principles of chemistry or of economy with which we are acquainted.

These, and hundreds of similar defects, are wholly unaccountable by, and incompatible with any theory of theistic design, but they are in perfect harmony with the theory of evolution, which assumes that man has attained his present degree of perfection by the gradual modification and improvement of inferior organisms. His organization has been built up on the piece-upon-piece and patch-upon-patch plan, and hence is far more complex, in many respects, than it might have been had it been directly planned by an all-wise architect, or even by a good physiologist.

THE TIGER AND THE ANTELOPE.

Design implies purpose, as much as it does the existence of a designer. With this principle in view, let us glance at one or two sample facts in Nature.

For what purpose was such an animal as the tiger designed? This animal has been endowed with great strength, sharp teeth and claws, acuteness of sight and hearing, a favorable color, and remarkable cunning—all for what purpose? The only possible answer is, "to enable him to capture and kill other animals as food." But we find that the tiger's food has not been neglected. The antelope exhibits as much evidence of design as the tiger, but the purpose is evidently different. His acuteness of sight and hearing, and especially his fleetness, are designed to enable him to run away from the tiger! Here, then, is design working against design, and we are assured that "a house divided against itself cannot stand." If the antelope was designed as food for the tiger, why was he given such desire and capacity to run away and neglect his duty to the latter? Less design bestowed upon the antelope would have necessitated less elaboration of the tiger!

It is worthy of note, however, that of all animals on which tigers love to dine, man was most easily captured and slain, until his own ingenity gave him weapons for defense. Does this fact indicate that man was specially designed as food for tigers and lions?

THE PLEASURE OF THE DEITY.

But, seriously, why should one animal have been designed to eat up another? What possible profit or pleasure can the Deity derive from this world-wide and incessant slaughter? Every second of time records the dying agonies of thousands of animals to whom life was, apparently, as sweet as it is to us. Indeed, this universal butchery and murder seen on every hand throughout the animal kingdom is one of the chief hindrances to the refinement of men. It is impossible to learn mercy from Nature, and yet, without mercy, man is a brutal savage.

We are aware of the fact that, but for the existence of carnivorous animals, there would have been far less variety in the animal kingdom; but it is also evident that, with less variety, there might have been even a greater number of individuals in existence. If it is said that, but for carnivorous animals—including man for this argument—herbivorous animals would soon possess the earth and crowd out the human race, we answer, that a little design, causing them to multiply less rapidly, would have obviated that danger. If man was the chief object of the solicitude of the Great Designer, those troublesome animals might have been omitted altogether.

MADE FOR HIS OWN GLORY.

We have heard the explanation that God mode all animals, as well as everything else, "for his own glory," which implies that he is exceedingly fond of blood and carnage, and further, that, before he created them, he was not quite as glorious as he wished to be.

The old race of theologians—unfortunately not yet quite extinct—claimed boldly that everything in existence was made for the use and benefit of man, directly or indirectly. When Galileo announced the discovery of the moons of Jupiter, the clergy asked him if they were visible to the unaided eye? On his replying that they were not, he was told that, since everything was made for the use of man, and since these alleged moons were not visible, and, therefore, were of no use to him, it followed, as a logical consequence, that they did not exist at all!

With the view of testing this theory, let us cull a few sample facts bearing upon this question from Nature.

There are at least half a million species of plants in existence, of which man uses directly or indirectly, about one in every three hundred. Are the remaining two-hundred and ninety-nine simply passive and neutral? By no means. They drain the earth and air of the nutriment which would otherwise go to the support of the useful plants. There can be no neutrality in this matter. "He that is not for us is against us." What shall we do with such facts as these? Shall we admit their logic and say that the Great Designer fails three hundred times as often as he succeeds?

THE GREAT DESIGNER AND DISEASE.

But the whole truth is not yet told. Even in those cases in which plants evince the most evidence of design, the degree of success obtained is only partial. As articles of food, such fruits as crab-apples, wild cherries, May-apples, pawpaws, persimmons, etc., are very defective, both in taste and nutritive constituents, while, as remedies, the entire vegetable kingdom fails to present a single perfect specimen. If medicinal plants had been designed by the Great Designer, who also designed the diseases they were intended to cure, we should have found them to be perfectly adapted to that end. With perfect remedies, the practice of medicine would, long since, have been a very simple and certain operation. Having diagnosed the case, the doctor might dismiss it, leaving the labor of looking up the right remedy in the catalogue and its administration to the patient or to his friends.

A LITTLE TOUCH OF INFINITE DESIGN.

But even in the case of those plants found to be most useful as remedies, there is no relation between their place of growth and the use which is made of them. Thus, the cinchona tree, the most serviceable of all medicinal plants, is not found in low, marshy, malarious regions, where, as a remedy, it is most needed. On the contrary, it is found perched upon the top of a small area of the Andes mountains, a locality for a long time unknown, and now almost inaccessible to human beings. If we are told that the Creator put the cinchona in the best place for the welfare of the plant, we reply that man has since found a score of other localities in which it flourishes as well, and, in some cases, better, than in its original home; and, secondly, that a little touch of infinite design might have made it grow about Peru, Illinois, as well as in Peru, South America.

DESIGN WARRING AGAINST DESIGN.

But who designed the Palmella or ague-plant, but for which cinchona would have been far less necessary? Here we see an organism, and there are hundreds of similar instances, exquisitely designed to cause disease, and, on the other hand, we find a remedy imperfectly designed to cure it. Here is another case of design warring against design. Nature teems with similar instances. Evidently, less design bestowed on actinomyces, palmellae, trechina spiralis, the itch animalculae, tape-worms, etc., would have obviated the necessity of designing an elaborate materia medica.

Turning our attention for a moment to the animal kingdom, we find that we use a score or two of animals largely and in various ways, and that we use the skins or other parts, and sometimes the flesh of a few hundred more; but naturalists believe there are fully a million species of animals, great and small, in existence. Therefore more than ninety-nine per cent of the species of animals in existence are not only of no service to man, but are absolutely injurious. Here, as in the case of plants, neutrality is an impossibility.

THE DESIGN IN THE SNAKE.

Hundreds of carnivorous animals infest our forests and streams, while over three thousand kinds of snakes hiss and snap at us as we trudge along the path of life, including the copperheads and fifteen kinds of rattlesnakes, especialy designed and donated to us Americans. Oh, for a full appreciation of the length and breadth and depth of the beneficence manifested in the design of a rattle snake! To make our earthly habitation a more perfect elysium, it has pleased the Great Designer to make the air almost hazy with hornets, wasps, flies, fleas and mosquitoes, giving us Americans several new kinds, as if the hornets which stung the Moabites, the Jebusites, the Amorites, and the Hittites were not good enough or bad enough for us.

The truth is, just as it should be, according to the doctrine of evolution, that man is simply a member of the animal kingdom, and that, like all other subjects of that great realm, he must struggle for his life from birth to death. He must contend with climate, disease, and enemies of all kinds. In this unceasing battle, he avails himself of every help and means within his reach. He uses such animals and plants as he can for food and clothing and as servants, and fights, with all his power, against the remainder. His ingenuity enables him to turn so many things to good account, in this contest, that his egotism prompts him to the belief that all things were made for him. But, as a matter of fact, every other living organism struggles for continued existence in substantially the same manner, and might with as much propriety set up the same claim.

"IN GOD WE TRUST."

There are those in every community who affect to believe that everything that occurs is specially designed and directed by an overruling Providence, and hence, on almost every coin we see the motto, "In God We Trust," and almost every obituary notice begins, "Whereas, it has pleased an overruling Providence to remove Mr Blank," etc., and yet, as everyone knows, the pious and orthodox are not more exempt from accidents, disease and death, than are heretics. If an overruling Providence is managing these matters he ought to, and certainly would, make some plain distinctions in the distribution of his gifts and punishments. There are, throughout the country, probably ten saloons and other infamous houses for every church, and yet it is no exaggeration to state that lightning strikes ten times as many churches as it does saloons. Of course, the steeples and spires of churches are very tempting to electricity, but lightning, directed by Omnipotence, should be able to strike a basement saloon as readily as a church steeple.

Not long since, we read of a minister who was struck by lightning and instantly killed while praying during the regular Sunday services, also of a pious man who was struck and killed while reading his Bible. What shall we do with these and millions of similar facts? No one can harmonize them with the theory of design and an overruling Providence, except by assuming that, in some mysterious way, unknown to men, they are beneficial to our race. But the propriety and reasonableness of such an assumption are the very questions in dispute.

VISITATION OF DIVINE PROVIDENCE.

Recognizing the fact that the good are as frequently stricken with the "visitations of Divine Providence" as the bad, theologians have evolved two explanations by which to pacify their flocks. The first is that all of these calamities—and, indeed, all the evil in the world—are the works of the devil. But who is the devil; on whom the onus of blame is thus shifted? Did he, like God, create himself, or is he the creature, the agent, the employe of God? In the affairs of this world we hold the proprietor responsible for the acts of the employe. Indeed, God himself, if correctly reported, gave us the correct principle of action governing this matter, when he said, "But if the ox (which had gored some one) were wont to push with his horn in time past, and it hath been testified to his owner, and he hath not kept him in, but that he hath killed a man or woman; the ox shall be stoned, and his owner also shall be put to death." Why has not this terribly vicious ox, the devil, been "kept in" or "stoned" to death long ago?

The other explanation is by means of the argument of ignorance, which is usually sanctified and sugar-coated by the quotation, "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth," implying that the evil or calamity is, after all, but a blessing in disguise. The argument in full may be thus summarized: Many things and events are plainly beneficial; others, apparenty pernicious, finally prove to be advantageous; therefore, all things and events are blessings, either openly or in disguise. If, however, we invert this argument it will look as well, logically, and prove as much. "Many things and events are undoubtedly injurious; other things and events which at first seem to be advantageous, finally prove to be inimical; therefore, all things and occurrences are either openly or covertly hostile to mankind, and, therefore, essentially bad." The argument is as cogent in one form as in the other, and is but sophistry at best.

CAN HE NOT WRITE?

If God really wishes to prove to us his existence, can he not devise some proof not susceptible of any other interpretation? Can he not write? He is credited with painting all the exquisite colors and hues in Nature. If so, can not he write a single sentence somewhere, and in some manner, which could not be counterfeited or explained away by men? If he controls the winds and clouds why does he not sometimes arrange the latter into significant forms, or paint on them some words giving us some reliable information? We do not ask for much. Let him simply say, "The Bible is inspired," or, "Obey the pope," or, "Follow Talmage," or, "Believe in Joseph Cook." Any little hint will suffice to eradicate infidelity from the world, when we are certain that its origin is divine. The matter in the tail of a comet might easily be arranged into a few words which all men could see. No matter in what language the information came, its translation would offer no difficulties. The surface of the moon might have been variegated with a few texts instead of with volcanic craters. We are aware that God is reported to have written two editions of the decalogue on stone tablets, but, unfortunately for the credibility of the account, Moses had to wait, in each case, forty days for the completion of the work; and now, there are those so depraved as to suggest that in that length of time, Moses might have done the work himself.

WHY DOESN'T GOD SPEAK?

If God is really so solicitous in regard to the welfare of men, why does he not, at least sometimes, speak? He is said to have been very familiar and communicative two or three thousand years ago. Can he not talk now? The clergy will, of course, call these queries blasphemous, as they do everything which cannot be otherwise disposed of, but they are candid, and are serious thoughts of every one who permits himself to think upon this subject. A little four-year-old girl, belonging to an acquaintance in Ohio, was, some time since, heard to soliloquize thus, when saying her evening prayer: "Now, God, I have talked to you often enough. If you hear me, why don't you talk back?" Sure enough! Why doesn't God talk, or act in response to prayer? It is the disgrace of wood and stone idols that, however much they are appealed to, to speak or act, they maintain a stolid indifference; but, in truth, does our God behave differently? Hundreds of millions of prayers, in the case of President Garfield, failed to evoke the slightest sign of even the existence of a God. Had these prayers been addressed to Baal or Joss, the result could not have been more disastrous. Billions and billions of prayers for the conversion of the wicked and the heathen have been presented, and yet—although this is evidently the proper thing to do—the work is scarcely farther advanced than it was a thousand years ago. Indeed, no one in this age, not even the preacher, expects a prayer to be answered.

Those who have abandoned all the usual arguments in favor of a Supreme Being, based on the evidence of design, as intrinsically bad, but who still wish to fortify their belief in the existence of such a being, often assert that the mere order of harmony observable in Nature, offers them sufficient evidence. It is plain, however, that if Nature exists at all, some kind of order must exist, and that, whatever may be the course of events, some sort of harmony is a necessary consequence. If matter exists, it must assume some shape and occupy some position. If, however, the matter of the universe could be shown to be in the best possible forms, an argument for a supreme intelligence might rest on that basis, but he would possess a dull imagination indeed, who could not suggest numerous improvements in this respect, both in the form and quality of matter, as we find it on our planet. The climate, for example, might have been made more genial and uniform, and the soil, in many districts, richer. Fewer mountains and deserts would have sufficed, and with less water better distributed, our world would have been better arranged. Indeed, a small amount of matter might have taken the form of homes, food and clothing, with evident advantage to mankind. The labor of the human race is chiefly expended in re-arranging Nature. The convenience of photographers, for example, would have been greatly enhanced if light had been endowed with such properties that it would not affect a sensitive plate before its passage through a lens. If we are told that such a modification of light would unfit it for use as a chemical agency in many other respects, we can only reply that, while we cannot so load a gun as that it shall hit a bear but miss a calf, this is just what is to be expected from one with whom "all things are possible."

I freely admit that arrangement of matter and its qualities might have been much worse, but if they had been we should not have existed at all. In the case of our moon a worse arrangement is actually seen, and, as a consequence, life is believed to be absent from that body. Water might have been made to freeze at forty degrees above, or forty degrees below zero; with some advantages in both cases. Alcohol might have been made with a repulsive taste, or without its intoxicating properties, with evident advantage to mankind. Thus, we might proceed to point out changes and possible improvements in the form and properties of matter ad infinitum. Since it is possible therefore, to suggest improvements in the properties and state of aggregation in which we find matter, perfection in the order of Nature cannot be claimed, unless it is assumed that in some way or other, not always manifest, everything must be for the best, as we find it, which is simply the old argument of ignorance.

But if perfection in the order of Nature is not made a part of the argument, then the simple proposition remains, that the existence of matter in any state of aggregation, and with any kind of property, is sufficient to prove the existence of an intelligent designing Creator, who himself came into existence without any assistance or cause whatever, and then proceeded to create everything out of nothing! In the apt phraseology sometimes employed by gentlemen of the bar, those who use this argument go into and come out of the same hole.

So far as the doctrine of design implies the process of reasoning on the part of God, it is plainly absurd, because the divine mind can neither reason, nor learn, nor forget. Reasoning is that process by which finite minds glide by easy or difficult steps from the known to the unknown; but, since all possible knowledge is supposed to be ever-present in the infinite mind; this process is both unnecessary and impossible. Therefore, while an unreasoning God may appear to be a kind of theological monstrosity, it is clear that a God who reasons is no God at all, but worse still is a God who reasons badly.

Finally, we may be asked if we deny the existence of God? Our reply is, "By no means." To do so, would imply that we have positive knowledge on this point. We neither affirm nor deny the existence of a Supreme Being, because we have no definite and conclusive information on that subject. We simply maintain that the evidence which has thus far been relied upon to prove the existence of such a being, is insufficient and fallacious. If new evidence can be advanced, or if the old can be made more cogent, we shall be among the first to give the matter a full and fair reconsideration.

TOWSER'S SERMON.

"There are no dogs in heaven," I will make my present theme,
"No animals are wanted at the throne of the Supreme,"
Is believed by many mortals who assume the form of man,
But who still remain in spirit much below us in the plan.

I should rather take my chances with old Justice, as a dog,
Than a cruel, savage master or a selfish human hog,
But I firmly think in Nature, that each being has his place,
And no matter what the species, or the color, or the race.

If not as such intended we would never dogs have been;
If Eternal Nature made us it was surely not a sin,
For the same Eternal Nature made our masters of the clay,
And the most marked way we differ is, they stand another way.

They can scheme and plan great mansions on the earth for very show;
They can picture their own heaven in the future thus and so;
They can roll their eyeballs upward and send forth their soulful tune,
While we send up our petitions to the Master in the moon.

If there is a great All-Wise One who presides o'er all the earth,
We can neither ever fool Him in regard to proper worth,
And though rich with gold and knowledge, when his judgment he must face,
Man will find, with dogs in Nature, that each specie has its place.

If a Christian beats his horses or is cruel to his dog,
It will stay with him eternal as a gloomy spirit fog.
He has claim to mighty wisdom, great unfoldment of the mind,
But is often false and brutal when his dog is true and kind.

So upon the base of morals and of faithfulness and love,
Our great masters have not risen in unfoldment far above,
And if we, with only "instinct," are to loiter here behind,
We shall always think Jehovah is but human and unkind.

Let us gather in the moonlight and send up a mighty bay
For admission into heaven when our forms return to clay,
And put on our longest faces and in meekness shed a tear,
And if man gets into heaven we may also there appear.

We can hardly do the thinking that our masters have to do,
And we cannot ask the favors of a God we never knew,
But I know there must be justice in the great Eternity,
For the lower and the higher; just because there ought to be.

If all life is based on spirit as a part of One Grand Whole,
And the universe of matter should possess Eternal Soul,
Each shall share in Nature's forces just his little proper place,
Whether dogs or human beings filled with piety and grace.

But it cannot bring back youth-time with its joys, when they are old.
Let them put on robes and jewels and fine linen here below,
But they each must wear the garments that will fit where'er they go.

Now, you ask me how I know it, where I got such wondrous lore?
And I answer with my master, thus: "When I was here before."
I obtain it from the thought-world, from the universe of thought;
From the depth of all past ages I the inspiration caught.

I don't think the common Christian cares so much for that old tale
As he used to ere the coming of the Spiritualistic gale,
But while mankind is advancing it does seem so mighty queer
That they make themselves a heaven, while their pets must disappear.

RESTORES EYESIGHT.

Spectacles a Thing of the Past.

"Actina," a Marvelous Discovery That Cures All Afflictions of the Eye and Ear Without Cutting or Drugging.

A marvelous discovery has been made by that Scientist and Inventive Genius, Prof. W. C. Wilson. He has invented a restorer known as "Actina," through which all afflictions of the eyes and ear, such as blindness, granulated lids, cataracts, sore eyes, deafness, etc., are cured without cutting or drugging. It is a simple contrivance, known as the Actina Pocket Battery, and through it the patients cure themselves in the privacy of their own homes. It not only abolishes the butcheries and torturous methods practiced by oculists, and aurists, but at the same time perfects a positive and lasting cure.

Rev. W. C. Goodwin, Moline, Kansas, writes: "My honest opinion of "Actina" is that it is one of the most marvelous discoveries of the age. It saved my eyes from an operation."

Mr. F. W. Harwood, Springfield, Mass., says that "Actina" cured him of deafness of nine years' standing.

Mr. A. L. Howe, Tully, N. Y., writes: "Actina" has removed cataracts from both my eyes. I can read well without my glasses; am sixty-five years old.

Robert Baker, Ocean Park, Cal., writes: "I should have been blind had I Not used "Actina."

A party of prominent citizens have organized a company known as the New York and London Electric Association, and they have given this method so thorough a test on hundreds of cases pronounced incurable and hopeless that they now positively assure a cure. "Actina" is sent on trial postpaid. If you will call or send your name and address to the New York and London Electric Association, Dept. T. B., 929 Walnut St., Kansas City, Mo., you will receive, absolutely free, a valuable book—Prof. Wilson's Treatise on the Eye and on Diseases in General," and you can rest assured that your eyesight and hearing will be restored, no matter how many doctors have failed.

A NEW CATECHISM,

BY M. M. MANGASARIAN.

This is a new "Catechism" in the full sense of the word. There has as yet appeared in the world of liberal literature nothing like this most wonderful little book or reason. E. P. Powell, the well-known author, the reviewer and critic, says: "The remarkable thing about this 'Catechism' is that it tells the truth." It deals with the questions of God, Immortality—the Creeds, the Clergy, the Church, Prayer and Salvation, Jesus and his Teaching, the Growth of the Christian Scriptures, and many other philosophical, scientific and ethical questions with the utmost candor, courage and clearness. 188 pages. Cloth 75c; paper, 50c

PART I.--The Pentateuch.

Comments on Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers and Deuteronomy, by Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Lillie Devereux Blake, Rev. Phebe Hanaford, Clara Bewick Colby, Ellen Battelle Deitrick, Mrs. Louisa Southworth, Ursula N. Gesteveld, and Francis E Barr.

THE WOMAN'S BIBLE.--PART II.

Judges, Kings, Prophets and Apostles. Comments on the Old and New Testaments, from Joshua to Revelation. The comments are keen, bright, spicy, full of wit, the work of radical thinkers who are not ignorant of the higher criticism. There is not a dull page in either of these books, but each is a galaxy of the bright minds of the day and throw a new light on the Bible teachings relating to woman. Price of each, paper, 50 cents.

KEEP POSTED

In Current Spiritualistic and Occult News.

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH,

Or the Future Life According to Science. By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French by S. R. Crockee. A very fascinating work. This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author says: "There is a true and respectable idea in Spiritualism," and regards as proved "the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of earth." Price, $1.50.

SPIRITUAL HARP

A collection of Vocal Music for the Choir, Congregation and Social Circles. By J. M. Peebles and J. O. Barrett; E. H. Bailey, Musical Editor. New edition. Culled from a wide field of literature with the most critical care, free from all theological bias, throbbing with the soul of inspiration, embodying the principles and virtues of the spiritual philosophy, set to the most cheerful and popular music (nearly all original) and adapted to all occasions, it is doubtless the most attractive work of the kind ever published. Its beautiful songs, duets and quartets, with piano, organ or melodeon accompaniment, adapted both to public meetings and the social circles. Cloth, $1.25; postage, 14 cents.

LIFE OF THOMAS PAINE.

By the Editor of the National, with Preface and Notes by Peter Eckler. Illustrated with views of the old Paine Homestead and Paine Monument, at New Rochelle; also portraits of Thomas Olio Rickman, Joel Barlow, Mary Wolstonecraft, Madame Roland, Condorce, Brissot, and the most prominent of Paine's friends in Europe and America. Cloth, 75 cents.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

PSYCHOPATHY, OR SPIRIT HEALING.—A class in Psychopathy, or Spirit Healing, under the instruction of the spirit of Dr. Benj. Rush, through Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, is about to be formed. For further information inquire of Mr. Wm. Richmond, 3802 Ridge avenue, Rogers Park, Chicago, Illinois.

INDIANA STATE SPIRITUALISTS CONVENTION—The Spiritualists of Indiana will hold their state convention in the Spiritualist Temple at Anderson, Ind., Feb. 26, 27 and 28, 1904, at which time a State Spiritualist Association will be organized. There will be three sessions daily. Friday and Saturday morning and afternoon sessions will be devoted to the business of the convention. The evening sessions of Friday and Saturday and the three Sunday sessions will be devoted to entertainlectures, spirit messages, tests, etc. The best of talent has been engaged. The bet of talent has been engaged. Programs will be issued later. The public is cordially invited to attend all of these meetings. Let there be a grand rally from all parts of the state thereby making this, which is one of the most important meetings ever held in the state, one of the most successful. E. W. Sprague and wife, N. S. A. Missionaries, Rochester, Ind.

Will J. P. Sullivan, of Los Angeles, Cal., send his address to G. C. Schmidt, Soldiers' Home, Milwaukee, Wis.?

Dr. Juliet H. Severance will speak for the Englewood Spiritual Union, Feb. 14, at Hopkins' Hall, 528 W. 63rd street. Subject: "Is Mediumship a Psychological Crime?" This lecture was previously announced but postponed on account of hall being closed for repairs.

Premonitory dreams are scoffed at by the skeptic of matters psychic, but nevertheless some visions of this kind are related as truth by men of science and research. Camille Flammarion, the noted astronomer, in his book, "The Unknown," tells the following: "During a certain summer, one of my sisters had gone with her husband and her children to live in the little town of Nogent (Haute-Marne); my father had accomin regard to them. My mother dreamed in Paris. All the children were in good health, and no one felt any uneasiness in regar dto them. My mother dreamed that she received a letter from my father, in which she read this sentence: 'I am the bearer of a sad piece of news; little Henri has just died in convulsions, with hardly any previous illness." My mother, on awakening, said to herself: 'It is nothing but a dream; it is all imagination and deception.' A week afterwards a letter from my father contained precisely this very phrase. My poor sister had just lost her youngest child in consequence of convulsions."

Dr. Beverly writes: "At Lakeside Hall we had a great leap year party. Two hundred and fifty people were present, and all had a merry time till past midnight. Our next monthly party will be held at the same place, Saturday evening, Feb. 27. This will be better than any that have preceded it. Mrs. Murtha is still with us, and is drawing many into the ranks by her honest tests. Dr. Warne, the president of the State Association, spoke to a large audience, Sunday evening. He does not fear to declare the truth, and is in favor of aggressive work. Mrs. Dr. Stockham will lecture Feb. 14; Dr. Viroqua, the Mohawk Indian Princess, Feb. 21; Walter DeVoe, editor of Vitality, Feb. 28. Thus we have a fine program, and you all are invited."

C. J. Van Alstine writes from Long Beach, Cal.: "A few words about us here on this coast, where it is sunshine and flowers, but do not think for a moment that there are no shadows or thorns. Our little society here has been listening for seven Sunday evenings to Mrs. L. M. Allen, of Los Angeles, a dear, sweet, spiritual woman, who gave us good and practical advice, and the audiences increased to twice the size they were when she began."

Geo. Hamilton Brooks writes: "Dr. Juliet H. Severance will lecture for the Englewood Spiritual Union, at Hopkins' Hall, 528 West 63rd street, Sunday evening, Feb. 14. This means another large audience for Sister Severance is one of our popular radical speakers who knows the truth and is fearless in expressing her views. If the good sleighing continues there should be many in from the near-by suburban towns. The many admirers of Robert Ingersoll will be glad to hear one of his able co-laborers."

N. A. St. Clair, secretary, writes from Toronto, Canada: "Mrs. Nettie Holt Harding, of Bryantville, Mass., serves the Toronto Spiritualist Association during January and February, and is proving a very conscientious and industrious worker in the interests of our society and cause. Mrs. Harding has a very pleasing personality, and is very popular with our members and audiences. Her lectures are followed by spirit messages. Her private readings are giving excellent satisfaction, and reports regarding the same which come to us give undoubted evidences as to the genuineness of her mediumship. She will serve the First Spiritualist Society of Hamilton, Ont., during the month of March."

Mrs. Allie Perkins writes from Frankfort, Ind.: "Mrs. Alice Gehring since her return from the west, has paid a visit to Frankfort, and she has greatly aided our grand cause by the noble work she did while here. She only came for a rest, but she is so loved and appreciated by our people here that she could have been busy every hour of her stay. She is the one who started the work in this place."

Joshua Oakeshott writes from Deer Park, Ontario, Canada: "Our meetings are becoming more attractive as the season advances. Under the pastorate of Mr. and Mrs. Wallis Rippley, with occasional assistance from their sister, our audiences are getting fine spiritual and intellectual feasts, and the good cause of Spiritualism is being much advanced. The honest, straightforward work of these mediums is being much appreciated by the general public, and if we can but give them sufficient support much good will be accomplished. I am also happy to say we have three other meetings in this city, all well attended."

A. B. Fanning writes from Plymouth, Ind.: "We are glad to report an organization in this city. On Jan. 29, Brother and Sister E. W. Sprague came to us and remained until this morning, Feb. 1, giving us four meetings, organizing a society of seventeen members and creating a great interest in our beloved cause. On Saturday and Sunday evenings, people were turned away, because we could not seat them, many preferring to remain and stand through the entire service. The outlook is good here for a large society, many coming to us to-day regretting that they could not hear more of our beautiful teachings. Brother and Sister Sprague have won their way into the hearts of the people here, and are assured of a hearty welcome at any time they can return to us. Any one desiring to communicate with us, address our secretary, H. E. Grube."

Hypnotism, as the cause of, or excuse for, crime, works both ways it seems. While certain persons not dissociated from the police interests of Minneapolis are exploiting their belief that the ubiquitous Carlisle, now unhappily restrained of his liberty, has been given to the practice of hypnotism as a means of furthering his designs for annexing by marriage impressionable woman, another worker in the matrimonial vineyard turns up in New York who claims that he became a bigamist under the influence of the occult art. Herbert W. Talcott married two women within four months—a period of time that hardly permits of the securing of a divorce even in Rhode Island. Talcott announces with what cheerfulness of mien he can muster that he meant no wrong in marrying the second time, and that he can account for the marriage only on the theory that he was hypnotized by some wretch who aimed at his undoing. Among those who are skeptical may be mentioned both of Talcott's wives. The list of skeptics is, however, large. Something should be done to restrain the hypnotist from going about practicing his evil arts for the undoing of impressionable young men and women. He ought to enlarge the field of his exploits or quit. One never hears of a whiskered hold-up man who lays his desire to annex the goods of his fellow-citizen to a hypnotist. If he did make such a claim it would only have the effect of expediting his seclusion. Occasionally a murderer turns up who puts in the theory of hypnotism for a defense, but he generally gets short shrift.—St. Paul Globe.

When William Berlin, an eccentric old miser, residing at Little Silver, N. J., died a few days ago a search was made for the money he was known to possess, but not a penny could be found. William Wainwright, however, could not give up the hope of finding the money and obtained permission from Joseph V. Holmes, owner of the house, to tear it down. Every stick of timber was carefully examined as it was razed. No money was found, but Wainwright felt sure it was somewhere about the place. He says that a few nights ago he had a dream, in which the ghost of Berlin led him to the ruins of the old house and pointed out to him under the chimney a tin spectacle case. When Wainwright awoke in the morning his dream was still vivid, and he dressed in a hurry, went to the spot and found the spectacle case in the place pointed out by the miser's ghost. He opened it and $187 in bills fell out. Wainwright is not yet satisfied and believes he will have more dreams.

Mrs. Cora F. Alsip, heroine of many court cases in Cook county, has at last been adjudged insane and has been committed to the institution in Elgin. Prominent members of the smart set, who have previously used their influence to keep her from the asylum, appeared in Judge Ruth's court on Tuesday to testify against her Mrs. Alsip claimed to be under the influence of hypnotism, Spiritualism, and various other psychic powers. She also accused her relations of poisoning the mind of her husband and persuading him to get a divorce.—Chicago Journal.

Dr. Eugenie R. Eliscu, a Roumanian woman who has been in this country practicing medicine for several years, rather startled the staid, conservative members of the Medico Pharmaceutical League, New York, by announcing that in five instances she had succeeded in curing cases of consumption by the use of hypnotic suggestion. To back up her claim, Miss Eliscu produced three of her patients and used them as illustrations of her prowess during the lecture. She didn't convince her auditors that drugs and modern methods should be at once abandoned in favor of psychopathy, but she succeeded in stirring them into a discussion which became acrimonious at times. Miss Eliscu is a very interesting woman, who has been putting her theories into practice in this city for some time. She has not entirely abandoned medicine yet, but her principal successes, she says, have been achieved through obtaining control of the minds of sick persons.

Will Briscoe writes: "It is with pleasure that I say a word in commendation of your paper. I think it is the very best paper extant devoted to the interests of our beautiful philosophy, and the able discussions contained therein, emanating as they do from some of the brightest minds of the age, cannot be otherwise than elevating to the grand cause of Spiritualism. I wish also to say that Brother Frank T. Ripley, who has been lecturing to crowded houses the past month at Peoria, Ill., with great success, will rest a few days with his friends, Mr. and Mrs. Will Briscoe, at Tipton, Ind., and then take up his labors at Findlay, Ohio, for the month of February."

Teresa Roderiguez, noted along the Pacific coast as Santa Teresa, because of her ability as a healer, has secured a divirce from Guadalose Roderiguez, whom she says she married while under his hypnotic influence. She also made the charge that her husband was en emissary sent by the Mexican Government to this country to marry her, that she might be taken back to a Mexican prison. Santa Teresa is revered by the Yaqui Indians, and because of her influence over them has been exiled from Mexico for years. Her ability as a healer has been proclaimed among the Indians and Mexicans since she was sixteen years old. At that time she had an attack of typhoid fever and fell into a long trance. When she awoke she declared that she had made a trip to heaven, that she had conversed with the saints and that they had told her she would have power to cure the sick. She began her work with such success that she was soon canonized by the Indians and peons, while she won the respect and love of her own people. Her unfortunate marriage followed the decree of exile from Mexico.

Mrs. Isa A. Cross writes: "The rostrum of the Hyde Park Occult Society will be occupied by Mrs. Karcher, on Feb. 14, at No. 323 East 55th street. We know you will hear something good, friends, so come out and hear her. Come early. Services at 7:45 p. m. Take Jackson Park car, which passes the door. Mrs. Kline will also give messages."

J. M. Hodson writes: "Spiritualism doubtless is champion for the welfare of the human race, and uplifting of humanity, by living up to its teachings. It prepares men and women for better fathers, mothers, and citizens. I notice in The Progressive Thinker of Jan. 30, another grand offer for Spiritualists to procure a neat little sum of $1,000 offered by a company of men in California for one genuine materialization of a spirit. Now we need money to use for the distribution of free literature of the principles and teachings of our spiritual philosophy, and some genuine medium can obtain it. Why not?"

Elisha Waters, who lately passed to spirit life at Troy, N. Y., was, says a Troy paper, a grand old man—pure, honest, kindly, useful and intelligent. The sweet spirit, the beaming countenance, the essential lovableness of this octogenarian of beautiful white hair and flowing beard cannot be reflected upon paper. In religion Mr. Waters was a Spiritualist, and for half a century was identified with that movement, remaining president of the society until the day of his death—or liberation, as he would with perhaps greater insight consider it. Indeed, he long left a consolatory certainty of his familiarity with another sphere and former friends who tenanted it. He believed, with Keble, that

"Two worlds are ours; 'tis only sin
Forbids us to descry
The mystic heaven and earth within,
Plain as the earth and sky."

Elisha Waters loved life and enjoyed it, ever rising superior to the multitudinous trials and afflictions which came to him during the nearly ninety years of his terrestrial journey; but he had no more fear of death than of gliding across the Hudson in one of his light paper boats. His spiritual serenity, his faith in God, and his confidence that the future state was one of greater happiness and ampler beauty and opportunity for all true souls was never shaken. His philosophy was embodied in the verse:

"There is beyond the silent night
An endless day;
Death is a door that leads to light—
Love leads the way.
Longing to know and do the right,
I sought the truth, I found the light."

Mrs. M. B. Grunwald writes from Louisville, Ky.: "Why don't Spiritualists organize? There are ten thousand Spiritualists in Louisville, and no church or temple, all the different societies meeting in club-rooms. By all means organize and stand firm. Having belonged to the Christian church for so many years, it is natural to desire a temple to worship in. I call it worship for our souls commune with souls, and these messengers of love are our own fathers, mothers, sisters and brothers, and our little babies that we have pressed to our hearts. I have been a Spiritualist two years and a half, and from the first my aim has been to have a church in Louisville worthy of the cause of truth, and when this shall have been accomplished Spiritualism here will grow."

H. Voorhees writes: "Not a word has been said about the funny spirits in the great discussion. There is a great deal of waste time on the hands of the rabble class of spirits. They dearly love to play jokes on verdant mediums. I was brought up very strictly religious. I developed as a medium forty years ago. I never saw rough society. First I swore at a terrific rate. A person present said it was a perfect picture of a Wisconsin lumber camp. For a week I was a writer; then a ranting orator. I was destined to be a great man, etc.; finally after I apparently was a fit subject for a lunatic asylum, I awoke to the fact that a play-actor was having lots of sport at my expense. Under higher influence, I finally, in a long life, have been directed how to escape poor health, financial loss, etc. Mediumship has been of inestimable value to me."

B. F. Schmid writes from Indianapolis, Ind.: "The First Spiritualist Church of Indianapolis has not met with the usual success during the fall and winter of 1903-4. Why it should be so, no one seems able to tell. The indifference of Spiritualists in their support of the work, and the constant demand for sensational mediumship are leading causes contributing to the disorganization of the movement. October and November found us with Miss Elizabeth Harlow as speaker, she being one of the favored, whose discourses are thoroughly enjoyed by the thinking minds. January finds us with Mrs. Nellie S. Noyes, of Boston, a new worker in the west. She has labored under many difficulties, owing to the effects of a severe grippe attack, yet she has done her work well and satisfactory. She follows her talk of about 30 minutes with astrological character sketches, that prove interesting and attractive to a mixed audience. Societies seeking talent will make no mistake in engaging her. Our Ladies' Aid is the hope and encouragement of our church. Were it not for its untiring efforts the work must of necessity fail. The fair netted the ladies over $300, which speaks volumes. The noble impulses prompting the ladies in this direction are commendable, and may the angel world, guard, guide and bless them for their unselfish devotion to the cause that must fail, were it not for them."

Louise E. Zimmerman, secretary, writes from Elmira, N. Y.: "The Spiritualist Church and people of our city have been greatly favored by the presence of the veteran worker, Bro. Fred L. H. Willis, of Glenora, N. Y., formerly of Boston, Mass., and the younger brother, Cleon B. Nichols, of Andover, Ohio, in our midst. Brother Willis is widely known as an able exponent of the truths of Spiritualism, and has the love and veneration of all hearts for the years devoted to its cause, and although Brother Nichols has not seen the years of service as has Brother Willis, he is rapidly winning his way into the hearts of the people. The advent of Brother Nichols in our city gave many hungry, seeking hearts the positive proof and knowledge that 'the dead' can return, under proper conditions, and demonstrate themselves in the form, through the ever-potent law of materialization. During Brother Nichols' short visit, three very successful seances were held, the forms being plainly visible to all present; and he made many warm friends who wish him every success and god speed in the work of conviction and demonstration, that the doorway is ever open between the two worlds, hoping for a return visit in the future. Mrs. Clara L. Stewart has closed her engagement with us, taking with her the love and best wishes of all for future successes and a return. As ships that speak and pass in the night, so are we upon the river of life; may the speaking prove stepping-stones in our progression. Oscar A. Edgerly, of Lima, O., begins a two months' engagement, Sunday, Feb. 7, and we are looking forward to another treat."

Vine H. Hickox writes from Niagara Falls, N. Y.: "The first Spiritual Association of Niagara Falls is progressing under the leadership of Mrs. A. G. Atcheson, of Buffalo. A state Spiritual mass-meeting was held on Thursday, Jan. 28, three meetings, morning, afternoon and evening, in the Maccabee Hall. Mr. H. W. Richardson, state president; Mrs. T. U. Reynolds, vice-president, and that bright shing star of Spiritualism, Mr. Lyman C. Howe, the veteran speaker and poet, entertained large and appreciative audiences. Mrs. Atcheson, speaker and medium, was likewise on hand. This noble lady has had a hard struggle in her ministrations here to build up this society. The outlook appears to be at present very promising. The people seem to be taking a great interest in the grand truths of Spiritualism. The Progressive Thinker comes regularly every week to my address. I wish every Spiritualist in the land would read it; they miss a great treat this winter by not subscribing for the paper. There are not many Spiritualists at Niagara Falls. There are many who attend the spiritual meetings who are not spiritualists, but have a natural curiosity to receive messages through the mediumship of Mrs. Atcheson. But it sets the people to thinking and they talk among themselves of this phase of mediumship."

Correspondent writes: "The Texas State National Association of Spiritualists, with headquarters at the Spiritualist temple of Galveston, Texas, Mr. John W. Ring, local speaker, being president, has engaged Mrs. Isa Wilson Kayner for several months' work in the state, and she is now ministering to the societies in Galveston and Houston, where her work is most satisfactory. Localities wishing to arrange for her services should write LeRoy Hutchings, secretary, Spiritualist Temple, Galveston, Texas, for dates and terms. Dr. J. M. Temple, of St. Augustine, Florida, is also located in Galveston, and his work is thoroughly satisfactory. In addition to his private work he helps in the services at the Temple, and holds one or more spirit message meetings there during the week. There is always a full house when Dr. Temple gives messages. The Progressive Lyceum lately presented the comedy-drama, 'Hick'ry Farm,' which so pleased the public, who liberally patronized the young people's efforts, that it has been decided to repeat it on Feb. 22, in honor of Washington's birthday. The usual annual anniversary bazaar will be held the last of March, and the Ladies' Auxiliary solicits the donation of such articles as the friends are willing to send. The proceeds will be used for the Temple fund. Address all packages to Mrs. H. Heyne, Spiritualist Temple, Galveston, Texas."

C. W. Stewart writes from St. Louis, Mo.: "Our work here is still going on splendidly. Although the weather was execrable last Sunday, our hall was crowded to celebrate the birth of Thomas Paine, and to witness Mrs. Folsom's great psychic work. Her independent spirit writing is simply wonderful, taking place as it does before the eyes of the audience, in electric light."

Julius Wagner writes: "I have hypnotized skeptics time and time again, but I had to exercise all my will power in order to accomplish it. I caused them to do some of the most ridiculous things that a human being can conceive of. Spirits do likewise, and still more so, in fact. Evil spirits exist the same as good ones. Nature has not changed them to such an extent that they have thrown off all their evil tendencies. It takes time there to progress and reform the same as on earth. There is a chance for each evil spirit to grow out of dark conditions."

Dr. R. Greer of Chicago celebrated, on February 3, his 80th birthday, receiving many useful presents from his children and grandchildren, who with merry mirth and sweetest music made the occasion a delightfully happy one, and serving well to brighten the declining years of their greatly beloved ancestor.

Frank T. Ripley closed a very successful engagement at Peoria, Ill., and goes to Findlay, Ohio, for the Sundays of March. He can be engaged for March, April and May. Address all letters to Findlay, Ohio, General Delivery. Permanent address, Tipton, Ind., P. O. Box 326.

For five months Daniel W. Hull has been tied up to his wife's bedside, and being away from home has been at great expense. She has so far convalesced that he has been able to go with her to California where his daughter lives and would like to make lecture engagements anywhere within that state. Address him at 1410 Kellam avenue, Los Angeles, Cal.

Carrie L. Hatch, secretary, writes from Boston, Mass.: "The Massachusetts State Association will celebrate the 56th anniversary of Modern Spiritualism in Berkeley Hall, 4 Berkeley street, Thursday, March 31, 1904. The best of talent will be presented upon this occasion, and all are invited free.

Alice C. Barry writes from Clinton, Iowa: "A month ago I came here and found a society struggling for existence and almost ready to disband. Recognizing at a glance that there was material here for a thriving society, I determined to give the friends here all the aid in my power and seek to infuse into them new life and courage. My efforts have never been so ably seconded as during my four weeks' stay among these people. There are in this society several noble-hearted men and women, who stand true and staunch to the cause they love, even in the face of opposition and discouraging conditions. The proof of this has been their willingness to go down into their pockets for needed funds to assist in carrying on the meetings, for unfortunately nothing can be accomplished without funds. They have also given me the best conditions possible for work on the platform, both for speaking and psychic readings. During the month the meetings have greatly increased in attendance. The officers of this society are Mr. Pingle, a lawyer of Clinton, president; Mr. Kolar, vice-president; Mrs. J. Leavitt, secretary. I shall be with this society for a time and ask my friends to address me here."

T. W. Sherk will lecture for Church of Spirit Communion, Kenwood Hall, 4308 Cottage Grove avenue. Subject, "Angels."

Mrs. A. A. Averill writes from Lynn, Mass.: "Our meetings since last report, have been very interesting, and we hope productive of good. Mrs. Ida P. A. Whitlock, of Providence, was with us two Sundays in January; Mr. J. J. Morse and Rev. W. T. Hutchins one Sunday each, and all did good work, each in their own way. Our audiences have been large, considering the very unpleasant weather we have had. All the different branches of work conducted by the society are in a prosperous condition. The Ladies' Social Union holds a meeting every Wednesday, with a circle in the afternoon; supper and test seance in the evening. It is to hold a rummage sale on Feb. 12 and 14, which, judging by the way the old clothes are coming in, will be a big success. The afternoon whist party meets every Thursday afternoon, and is well patronized. The classes of instruction in singing and elocution for the children meet every Tuesday evening. They are at present preparing for a grand mistrel show in Cadet Hall, on Feb. 19 and 20. All this keeps President Caird and his assistants so busy looking out for the different lines of work that we have not time to consider, whether local societies are declining or not. During February we shall have Dr. G. A. Fuller, Mr. J. H. Foss, the able editor of 'The Gentleman From Everywhere,' followed in March by Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Kates."

Mrs. Alice Baker writes from Dallas Texas: "I have commenced my third month's service with the Truth Seekers' Spiritual Society of this city. This society, though small, is composed of noble, earnest souls. Perfect harmony seems to prevail, and there is a bright prospect for future work. Many intellectual people from the outside are being drawn to our meetings. The fourth Sunday in January I went to Oklahoma City, O. T., to deliver a course of lectures, giving spirit messages after each lecture. My son Milton, a boy 15 years of age took my place upon the rostrum here, which he did most acceptably, with Mr. C. Muchen, a local medium, following with messages. While serving the good people in Oklahoma a society of about 40 members was organized. There are many intellectual and talented Spiritualists in Oklahoma, and the outlook there for a large and successful society is very bright. I will gladly answer calls for mid-week meetings and officiate at funerals. Address me at 213 Bryan street, Dallas, Tex."

Dr. H. E. Ballard, president, writes: "The First Universal Occult Church holds regular services at its new hall, northwest corner 35th street and Indiana avenue. Afternoon services at 3:30; evening at 8. The pastors of this church will consist of the best philosophical speakers, with Mrs. Grace Aitken as psychic. A demonstration of the phenomena from reliable mediums; choir and solo singing; a program service embodying speaking, vocal and instrumental music, phenomena, etc., every second Sunday of each month under the direction of Mrs. C. B. Bliss, the materializing medium. The ladies' Auxiliary gives its tenth social Saturday evening, Feb. 13, at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Aitken, 253 East 31st street. The controls of Mrs. Bliss will phenomenize, if conditions are favorable. Other tests, music, speaking, and plenty of material angel food and coffee will comprise the evening's pleasure."

C. T. Schneider writes: "Spiritualist societies wishing for engagement with me during March, April and May, and camps, will please write to me as I leave Williamsport soon for other cities. I will organize societies where Spiritualism is not known, and will serve societies already organized. I leave my home, Feb. 20, 1904. My powers speak for themselves. I am an inspirational speaker, entranced. Address me at No. 246 William street, Williamsport, Pa."

Hon. R. Gilray writes: "The Universal Occult Society holds its meetings at 77 East 31st street, every Sunday afternoon and evening, the Hon. Robert Gilray, pastor. The renowned medium, Charles J. Peterson, psychic. Conference at 3 p. m. Regular services at 8 p. m. Sunday, Feb. 14, Dr. George B. Warne, president of the Illinois State Spiritualist Association, will lecture. A good musical program will be rendered. Other mediums are cordially invited to give demonstrations of the Great Truth. We have just received our charter from Springfield and will make arrangements in the near future to affiliate with the Illinois State Association and the N. S. A. We are now on a sound ground and wish to rise to the higher plane. Any suggestions will be thankfully received. The Doctor has submitted a legal question to me for solution, through your paper as to the validity of marriage solemnized by ordained ministers of the Illinois State Spiritualists Association."

Miss Nellie Turner writes: "The society in Niagara Falls is still alive and progressing nicely, thanks to the untiring zeal of our pastor, Mrs. A. G. Atcheson, who is also the president of this society. The state meeting held here on January 28 was a success in every way, President H. W. Richardson; vice-president, Mrs. Tillie U. Reynolds, and Mr. Lyman C. Howe were the speakers of the day, and everyone who has heard these able speakers know what a treat we enjoyed. Spiritualists from surrounding towns came to enjoy the day with us. Miss Holder, of Buffalo, pianist, and Mr. Jones of Akron, N. Y., vocalist, delighted the audience between the lectures. Recitations were given by two little girls. The society is much encouraged with the results of the meeting, and are grateful to all who took part."

F. Anlauf writes from Oklahoma City, O. T.: "The First Spiritualist Society of Oklahoma City has been organized with a membership of 36. Mr. C. C. Henderson, president; Frank Anlauf, secretary, and G. W. Anderson, treasurer. The society has rented a hall and will hold regular meetings. Everything points to a successful society. We have several members who are developed mediums, and much interest was manifested at our first meeting that was held on Sunday, Jan. 24. Mrs. Baker, of Dallas, Texas, gave a very interesting lecture and tests in the afternoon and evening. The good thoughts of all brothers and sisters are asked by us, to help us in our work which we hope will help to advance the noble cause."

Mrs. Dellinger writes from Joplin, Mo.: "Mrs. Weston has been holding meetings in the I. O. O. F. hall, corner Seventh and Main streets, every Sunday night since July. It is known as the First Spiritualist Church. She is ably assisted by Mrs. Paul. Mrs. Weston as a lecturer, is good; her psychometric tests as well as Mrs. Paul's are highly appreciated by large and attentive crowds. We expect to have a chartered society in the near future. I would also say that the Inter-State Psychic Club holds their meetings the first and third Tuesdays of each month. The literary work is becoming very interesting. We have a good membership and have four mediums, who give us light and knowledge from realms unknown."

Mr. and Mrs. E. W. White write from Lima, Ohio: "Mrs. White and myself have just closed a very successful five weeks work here. We held during the time twenty-one public services, lecture and test seances, to large and appreciative audiences, and have been greatly blessed in our labors. Many who knew nothing of the beautiful truth of spirit return and progressive life have been started on the way with proof positive as an impetus. We expect to return here in the near future for more work. We have met warm hearts and willing hands among the Spiritualist friends here. We go from here to Toledo; thence to Detroit for a short time. Societies in Michigan, Indiana or Ohio, desiring our services, may address us at our home address, 292 Harrison avenue, Detroit, Mich. We are also open for camp engagements except for the month of August, during which month our time is fully engaged."

F. H. Rice writes from Boston, Mass.: "The weekly meeting of the Ladies' Spiritualistic Industrial Society was held to-night at their rooms, 514 Tremont street, and was patronized by a goodly number. Among those who contributed to the evening's entertainment were Mrs. Dr. Caird, of Lynn, Mass., with tests, which were very satisfactory; Mr. Fred de Bos, whose remarks are always entertaining; Miss Orrissa Smith, with a recitation which was heartily received. Mrs. Barnes, of Worcester, favored us with vocal and instrumental music, and Mr. Archibald made a few pleasing remarks. Owing to a misunderstanding notice was given last week that Mrs. Katie Ham would be with us Feb 4; it should have read Feb. 11. It can positively be said that she will be with us on that date, and we hope there will be a large audience present to receive and listen to her. All are cordially invited."

F. N. Burk writes from Denver, Colo.: "The people of Denver are congratulating themselves on the extended visit of Georgia Gladys Cooley, who has been prevented from filling her engagement in Chicago by the closing of the halls in that city. Chicago's loss has been Denver's gain—so think those, and there are a great many of them, who have been favored by her grand teachings of our beautiful philosophy. Several of different denominations, have, for the first time investigated Spiritualism, and become convinced of the continuity of life and spirit return. They all express themselves as being highly pleased with Mrs. Cooley's mediumship. It is a pleasure to see honest work appreciated. As long as we have that kind the future of Spiritualism is safe."

John Mullen writes: "The fourth annual mask ball given under the auspices of the Metropolitan and Chicago Spiritual Alliance Societies, is a thing of the past, but the memory of it will linger with those who attended. It was a howling success; everybody enjoyed it; there wasn't one thing to mar the pleasure of the occasion. The dance hall was filled to overflowing. It was found necessary to secure another hall in the same building to accommodate the people that came to hear the various mediums; even then we had not room to accommodate all who came. The costumes were superb. Too much cannot be said in praise of Mr. Elmo, who was the general overseer of the evening; his was no easy task, but he performed it with great credit not only to himself but to all the guests. The Hon. Robert Gilray, a prominent lawyer of our city, and pastor of the Universal Occult Society, took charge of the mediums' meeting. Those assisting were: Princess Viroqua, Dr. Burgess, Mrs. Powderly, Mrs. Kerschner, Mrs. Cutter, Prof. Ray, Mrs. De Long, Mrs. Clifford and daughter, Miss Bessie Reaver, of Columbus, Ohio, Mrs. Nellie Kusserow, J. H. Smith, and many others. The large audience listened with rapt attention to all the mediums, whose individual work was received with well-merited applause. It was midnight before the chairman could persuade the people to disband and join in the dance. The thanks of two societies is tendered to all who helped to make this fourth annual meeting the success it was, especially The Progressive Thinker for the notice it gave us; the prizes the friends donated, and the mediums for their aid. We trust that when another year comes around we will as Spiritualists, not only be united in the social part of the work, but united in the effort to spiritualize humanity."

$ THOUSAND $ THOUSAND $

Skeptical Spiritualists Taking a Decided Stand.

Good! They are offering a thousand dollars for the production of "ONE MATERIALIZED SPIRIT." This offer to "any person" who will produce just "one materialized spirit," is made by Los Angeles Spiritualists, men and women of integrity, "determined, by earnest seeking, to know the truth." All honor to them. They are now convinced that materializations of the "so-called dead" are "all fraudulent." Having the courage of conviction they dare to say so in so many words. In the interest of truth they change a conviction, a comforting conviction, too. This corroborates what I have said all along, that there are Spiritualists who love the truth for its own sake, and have the moral bravery to speak it, equal to any class on earth, and when these California Spiritualists say Spiritualism embodies "the grandest principles of truth that have ever dawned upon the mind of man," a materialist, or agnostic, who would deny it shows he has not studied the subject, or is bigoted. When Spiritualists say, as these do, that "the truth can never be realized through fraud," it goes to show that they put truth above any ism or ology.

As The Progressive Thinker well says: "This is a splendid chance to settle this great question."

A Chicago lady writes me an excellent letter, saying there is a genuine materializing medium right there. Why should he not accept the offer? The fee is munificent.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Mrs. Nellie L. Pierce passed to spirit life, January 31. She was one of the best known mediums in Chicago, having lived and worked in the Spiritualistic field for forty years. She was a member of the Rising Sun Mission. As a true friend and loyal worker she will be greatly missed by a large circle of friends.

Elisha Waters, one of the oldest residents of Troy, N. Y., died at his home in North Troy at 5:30 o'clock Jan. 28. He had been ill only about a week. At the beginning of his sickness pneumonia threatened, but was conquered. A general breaking down of the system supervened, however, at a time when it was thought the venerable man might rally, and he gradually failed. Mr. Waters was in many respects a remarkable man. He died in the fullness of years, almost a nonagenarian and almost to the last in the complete possession of an active mentality. He was prominent as a Spiritualist.

Passed to spirit life, at the infirmary, at Dunning, Prof. J. Willsey, aged 76. Prof. Willsey had been a sufferer for several months, and often expressed himself as ready to answer the call from up yonder. He leaves a daughter, son, and many friends to mourn the absence of the voice they loved, but we rejoice that another has been relieved of the sufferings in this life. Services at Mount Olive, by the writer.

M. L. SCHAEFFER.

My husband, Zachariah Van Horn, passed to higher life, from his late residence 555 Fifth avenue, Milwaukee, Wis., January 22, 1904, after an illness of many months. He had been a Spiritualist for more than twenty years. Shortly previous to his transition he held sweet converse with many of the dear ones gone before. We mourn his earthly presence, but the sweet consolation of true Spiritualism comforts as nothing else could.

MARY E. VAN HORN.

Very suddenly, at Canadian Soo, Mrs. Violet A. Robinson, wife of Thomas Robinson, and only beloved daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Oakeshott, of Deer Park, aged 26 years. Although not a pronounced Spiritualist, she was well acquainted with the philosophy as given by her parents, who have been staunch Spiritualists for upward of twenty-five years. The mother has been mediumistic since childhood. The deceased leaves a husband, little daughter, one brother and parents, who realize she is not far away. COR.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

This department is under the management of

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin, Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. Jacob Fulmur: Q. Father Perrier, at a funeral, after reading prayers in Latin, said: "As there are a good many Protestants here, I will explain why it is that we read our prayers in Latin. It is because our blessed Lord and Savior Jesus Christ always prayed to his Heavenly Father in Latin." Is this true?

A. Christ praying in Latin, is parallel with the New Testament written in Greek by uneducated Jews who understood no language but their own! Christ was a Jew, spoke the language of the country people, if he spoke at all. It might as consistently be said that Julius Caesar delivered his orations in English.

No, the prayers are in Latin, because when they were written, Latin was the tongue of the people and of the church. As the efficacy of prayer is, according to church belief, in saying over the words, and not in their understanding, these Latin forms are applicable among all nations, races and tribes. The fact that the hearers do not understand adds to the mystery and fosters superstition.

This story of the "Holy Father" reminds one of the contention once hotly waged, by theologians, as to the language of Adam! It becomes of deep interest to know in what tongue Adam proposed to Eve, and God talked to them! It was conceded that it must have been Hebrew, and for ages that language was called God's language.

One of the narrowest, obscurest forms of speech, could be thus exalted only by superstition. If a learned Rabbi of the first years of the Christian era were to be placed in the present, and should attempt to describe what they saw, the development of modern life, their language would completely fail for they would have no words to represent the new things and new ideas. The best Hebrew scholar could no more translate a modern scientific book into that language than a Hottentot into his "click" lingo.

G. R. Bicknell: Q. I have repeatedly listened to remarks from intelligent people since the Iroquois fire at Chicago, and they assume that those people who lost their lives had finally met the fate in the manner that had already been planned since their birth. In other words it was their time to die. Please give us your ideas and oblige?

A. This conclusion would apply to all events and affairs of life, and is the position of the fatalist, the foreordinationist, and believers in predestination, fate and destiny. It is an ancient doctrine and has been widely received. If it be true, man is in the hands of providence, and it is idle to resist.

It cannot be denied that he is a creature of conditions, and his life's course is a series of causes to effects, and of underlying forces beyond his control. Yet he is more than a creature of causes and conditions. By the centralization in his individuality, he becomes a separate and distinct center of influence, with a will that changes the course of causes by becoming superior to them, and of itself a cause. Then is manifested free-will in antagonism to destiny, and unless clearly considered, confusing and apparently conflicting.

That there is any "plan" laid out for a person at birth, is a fancy without support. Restore everything as it was three hours before the accident and there would have been a change in the audience. Many there who were not, and many away who were there. Then it might be said that they came not because it was not their time, others came because it was theirs! and out of this vicious circle we cannot get, because everything done is so ordered, and everything undone the same!

Even when we say the will dictates and changes events, it may be said in reply that this will is only another cause, perfectly calculated by the planner of events.

But we believe that this independent will factor would be difficult to account for, if not impossible to determine beforehand its activity; and the mental processes in selection routes, would be equally indeterminable. Yet by this intellect and will, people go and come; meeting or avoiding accidents, and another factor, it is said, is added to the tangled thread of life, that is all.

Hence while it may be correct to say that every event in life is an effect of all that has gone before it, it would not be correct to infer that each individual has his life "planned," at birth, and must follow the line of irrevocable destiny. For "planned," implies a planner, a personal intelligence outside of and superior, and the "planning" of the majority of lives, does not favor the idea of an omnipotent or all-wise intelligence.

Robt. P. S. Simon: Q. In the Home Circle how can we ascertain whether the questions are answered by an honest spirit or one inclined to evil?

A. Ninety-nine times in one hundred when communications are received, erroneous, or contradictory, it is from imperfection in the conditions of transmission, a want of knowledge on the part of the communicating spirit, and not from evil intentions. The circle should receive everything on its merit, and if messages are not accurate, and answers found erroneous, the members should not be swift to refer them to evil-disposed spirits. Make all allowance for imperfections first, nor expect infallible answers.

There will come to a circle no influence not fostered in the spiritual atmosphere of its members. If really an evil influence comes, treat it as an evil-disposed person here would be treated, and do not let the falsehood it may utter occupy your thoughts to the exclusion of all the truthful messages received. It is well messages are not infallible and all-comprehensive. We should be led, instead of thinking for ourselves. It would be "thus saith the spirits," for "thus saith the Lord." Every message and answer must be taken on its merit. Receive communications from evil-disposed spirits as well as the purest, and sit in judgment, undisturbed thereon.

Historian: Q. Is it true that the Puritans of New England seriously proposed to sell the Quakers into slavery?

A. It is only too true, as is shown by a letter of Cotton Mather, the famous Boston minister, the original of which is in the possession of the Massachusetts Historical Society:

"To ye aged and beloved John Higginson:—

"There be now at sea a shippt (for our friend Elias Holdcroft of London did advise me by the last packet that it would sail sometime in August) called ye Welcome, which has aboard a hundred or more of ye hereticks and malignants called Quakers, with William Penn ye scamp at ye head of them. Ye General Court has accordingly given secret orders to Master Malachi Huxett of ye brig Porpoise to way lay said Welcome as near ye coast of Cod as may be and make captives of ye Penn and his ungodly crew so that ye Lord may be glorified and not mocked on ye soil of this new country with ye heathen worshipps of these people. Much spoil can be made by selling ye whole lot to Barbadoes where slaves fetch good prices in rumme and sugar and we shall not only do ye Lord great service by punishing ye wicked but shall make gayne for his ministers and people.

"Yours in the bowels of Christ,
"COTTON MATHER."

Could religious hate and bigotry go further? He would have the entire company of immigrants, men, women and children, because of a difference of belief, captured and sold into hopeless slavery on the plantations of the West Indies, and gloated over the gain, with a miser's cupidity! Luckily for Penn and his company they were not captured. Lucky, too, for this country that a religious element was introduced contrasting with the narrow bigotry of the Puritans, who never were happy unless miserable, and making others the same. This letter should be placed among the curiosities of literature.

JOAN OF ARC MADE A SAINT.

And as Such She Will Cut a Great Figure in the Catholic Church.

After nearly five centuries of misrepresentation and of calumny, the Congregation of Rites of the Roman Catholic Church has taken the first steps toward the canonization of Joan of Arc. After having suffered in her lifetime from the greed of her own countrymen, represented by her sale to the English by the duke of Burgundy, by royal ingratitude represented by the indifference to her fate of the worthless Charles VII., for whom she saved his throne, by the church itself as represented by Cauchon, the bishop of Rouen, who, after declaring her guilty upon unproved charges of heresy, witchcraft, and communication with evil spirits, turned her over to the secular authorities for burning at the stake, which neither the French nor the English prevented, she is now declared fit for beatification.

It is probable that from the historical point of view the real story of the peasant girl of Domremy, who left her father's sheep at the command of "the voices," and obeyed the instructions of Saints Catherine and Margaret by revealing her mission to the worthless dauphin, by raising the siege of Orleans, driving the English from most of their French possessions, and finally by conducting the dauphin to his coronation at Rheims, may never be told in all its details Even contemporary historians differed according to the extent of their individual beliefs in supernaturalism. Those who were guilty of her betrayal and surrender invented all sorts of charges to excuse their action, and later historians, unable to account in a material way for her marvelous career, found themselves either forced to concede that that career was full of miracles or to doubt her very existence, which some have done even in the face of hard facts.

From the religious point of view it is clear that great injustice has been done to her and to her memory. There never was a more devoted adherent of the church, perhaps never a more deeply religious visionary than Joan of Arc. No one can doubt she believed she saw the figures of her two favorite saints in the clouds, heard their voices and their answers to her when she spoke to them. There was no point in her career when she did not seek spiritual guidance or believe she was under the protection of the saints, until after securing the coronation of the dauphin, which ended her mission, she remained in the field at his order and herself acknowledged that her saints had forsaken her. She was sold for gold by a greedy duke, one of her own countrymen, in alliance with the English. She was delivered by her purchasers to a malicious bishop, one of her own countrymen, who, when he failed to convict her of heresy, condemned her upon charges of intercourse with evil spirits, and delivered her to the civil authorities of Rouen, who soon regretted their action and eventually erected monuments to her memory.

The archbishop of Orleans accepts the beatification as an honor to France. It may be so. In any event, it is an honor to the church, though it has been a long time coming, that it will add to its list of saints a peasant girl who followed the commands of the voices and liberated France from English rule, and for that service died the death of a martyr.—Chicago Tribune.

Divining by the Name

Your Name and Character Color—Another System of Divination.

As set forth in the New York Sun, it seems that in the domain of the occult there is more in one's name even than was set forth in the theory of its relations to numbers and fate that was printed in the Sun last Sunday. Now, it figures in having one's chromoscope drawn.

A chromoscope, say the students of the occult, reveals one's character, the past and the present and the mysteries of the future as clearly as a horoscope. The laws which decide the shape and number of its lines, the width and tints of its color bands, are held to be as exact as those which govern the heavens.

Chromosophy, according to the rules of which chromoscopes are drawn, is really not a new discovery; merely the blending of three ancient systems of divination. It is based upon the date of one's birth—the exact moment is desired if it is possible to have it—and one's name. From the name can be learned one's character color, keynote and number.

A New York woman who is much interested in chromosophy has, she says, made a new and most important discovery in connection therewith—namely, that every one's initials may be found written in the fine lines in the palms of one's hands. Not only one's own initials, moreover, but also those of the person one is to marry, and of other people who are seriously to influence one's life are so inscribed. Whether this influence is to be for good or evil, and what part the owners of such initials are to play in one's life, are indicated by the position of the letters.

"Show your your initials before I even know your name?" she said smiling, when a visitor asked her the question a few days ago. "Surely."

And then as she bent over the hand extended for her scrutiny, she continued to answer other questions which the visitor had asked before.

"No, this is not chromosophy," she said. "This is a discovery of my own. But it has a great significance to anyone interested in drawing and reading chromoscopes.

"You see, in chromosophy so much depends upon the name. It gives us a complete portrayal of a subject's character, in the first place, and foretells much about the career.

"Some people scoff at the idea. Suppose a child gets a name that stands for everything noble and prosperous, they say, 'Will that change its natural and inherited qualities? Do you mean to say that its life will be molded to conform to its name?'

"Of course we don't mean to say anything of the sort. What we teach is that a child cannot be named anything that its parents wish.

"Every spirit coming into this world has a certain name which will typify and express its nature and career in this incarnation, and by which it is to be known here. The spirit of the child magnetizes or attracts that name to itself irresistibly; often under seemingly strange circumstances. The story of the son of Zachary being named John is constantly being repeated, though the angel does not appear and the divine command is not heard.

"Not long ago a mother complained to me that she could not understand her son, a boy about 16 years old.

"'He isn't a bit like his father, or me, either. He is so queer,' she complained.

"On questioning her I found that the boy had been christened George Grover, while the father's name was as dissimilar to this as James Smith would be.

"'For whom was he named?' I inquired.

"'For none of the family,' she said. 'You see my people thought he should be named for me, and my husband's family thought it would be dreadful if his father's name was not given him. He was our first child, and positively the families almost came to blows about it. So, rather than creat a feud, his father and I decided to give him a name not in the family at all. We selected George as a first name and added Grover because Cleveland was President at the time.'

"I made a simple mathematical calculation of the name George Grover, and told the mother all about the character and tastes of her son. She was amazed, and said I was perfectly correct.

"Then I explained to her that she had given the boy names outside the family, because he was to be so unlike any of the family. Their names would have been impossible for him.

"A little while ago, too, a friend of mine had a baby boy whom all the family wished to bear his father's name. At the christening, however, the woman who stood as godmother suddenly remembered an uncle of the mother's, who was old and all alone in the world.

"Thinking what a happiness it would be to the old man to have this child named after him she gave his name to the clergyman at the last moment. Now the family are blaming her foolish impulsiveness; but I tell them the boy received his proper name. The godmother was but the instrument of fate.

"So you see how important, in proving that a child's name is preordained for it, is the discovery that it is born with the initials of that name in its hand, as well as those of the person it will marry, and of other people who will influence its life, though many of them may be still unborn.

"You perceive that the central disk is dark blue. That, to one versed in chromosophy, is the keynote to the character of the man.

"It reveals his personality to a great extent. And this keynote to the character is different from the musical keynote, which is also found in the name and which determines what people will be in harmony with each other.

"If I were drawing your chromoscope, I would begin by painting a black central disk. All people with O as the first vowel letter of their names, are black centers.

"Such people are extremely ambitious, strong of will, determined, with ability and power for great things. They are people who can't be hurried; they must take their time to work out their own ends.

"They must be controlled with tact and kindness; they can not be bossed or driven. Here we have our Johns and Josephs, governing and ruling or going before to prepare the way.

"Red centres are ambitious, too. They are impulsive, ardent natures, with a keen sense of justice.

"The blue centers, such as the subject of that chromoscope, have E for their first vowel. These are analytical, critical people, truthful and eager to know all truth. At a scientific or New Thought meeting, nine out of ten people will be blue centers.

"Different and numerous as these people are, the type is easily distinguished. I can pick out blue centers far more readily than I can the other types. The other day a lady came in to see me.

"'Of course, I know this is all nonsense,' she said. 'But I have a curiosity about such things, and thought I would see what you could tell me.'

"'Well, I can tell you at once that the first vowel letter of your first name is E,' I replied.

"'No, it is not,' she said.

"'I beg your pardon, but it is,' I persisted.

"'It is L,' she said.

"'I did not say the first letter. I said the first vowel of your name,' I replied.

"'Well, I declare, you are right,' she exclaimed. 'My name is Lenore.'

"She seemed amazed that I could tell; but such a thing is easy to the student of chromosophy.

"White-centered people are the artistic type. They are full of philosophy and ideality. On the stage you will find that nine out of every twelve people will be white centre, two blue, and perhaps one black.

"An interesting fact revealed by the examination of criminal records is that there also nine out of twelve names are white centers. This shows that the same nature which we know as artistic and which leads the subject into all forms of original and unconventional thought and action draws people with bad inherited tendencies or whose spiritual development has been neglected or whose social surroundings have not been fortunate, to set at defiance civil and moral laws.

"White centers are the people who are discontented—out of gear with the universe, and who fly at right angles to the existing order of things, instead of moving quietly in the orbit of the life about them. When the spiritual side of white centers is highly developed, however, it produces very beautiful characters—the rapt sanctity and spiritual attitude of the saint.

"The color centre but gives the keynote of a character, and is modified by every letter in a name, and by every name which the subject possesses, both individual and inherited. Every letter has an individual meaning.

"For instance, the initial letter of your surname being D shows that you inherit your intellectual qualities from your father. You will follow more his bent of thought than that of your mother. D is a letter which always signifies intellect.

"G is the profit number. A George will generally, make money. H in a name represents a little hedge which the owner builds about his inmost self. Such nature are reserved and self-sufficient in some degree. N is always an unfortunate number.

"Chromosophy is all a matter of vibration. The difference between two things is a difference of vibration, and everything, even a letter or a number, has a vibration of its own. It is by calculating the difference of the vibrations of the letters of a name, together with that of the birth dates, the keynote, and the numbers, that we can determine the colors and lines of a chromoscope.

"Given everything that will aid in doing so, even the exact moment of birth, it takes about two hours to complete such a chart. Some are quite simple, with few colors, which lie in circles of varying widths about the color center. Others are complex, of many colors, which radiate like beams. All, however, to the student of chromosophy, are readable at a glance, revealing not only the character of a subject but the secrets of his past and future."

The musical keynote which determines which people will agree with each other, and which enters also into the chromoscope, is found through the same number; and this is found by a very old mathematical calculation, in which the letters of the alphabet have the following values:

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I
J.	K	L	M	N	O	P	Q	R
S	T	U	V	W	X	Y	Z

Thus take the name John Henry. John represents the numbers 1, 6, 8, 5, which added make 20, which again added gives two. Henry has 8, 5, 5, 9, 7, for its numerical values, which sum up 34, or 7. The 2 of John and 7 of Henry added, make 9, which is therefore the principal number of the name John Henry.

Two and 7, the number of the last name, and the numbers of the month, year, and day of birth, are also supposed to be fortunate and eventful ones for the subject. It is 9 which gives us the key note of this name. Beginning at A, the ninth note of the scale is B. B, therefore, is the musical keynote of the man named John Henry.

"Music will please one best, and prove most soothing, when written in one's own key note," said the chromosopher. "If a man is nervous or overworked, out of harmony with existence, listening to music played in his key will do much to restore him to his normal condition.

"A person gets along best with people having the same keynote, or one which harmonizes well with his. Such people have often entirely different color centers, and dispositions.

"No one should marry a person whose key is not in the same chord as his own; and a woman should take care that the number of the name she will assume when married is to be found among her fortunate ones.

"Naturally a name which is adopted later in life, for business or professional purposes, cannot change the character of an individual. It may, however, seriously affect the success of the undertaking pursued beneath it.

"If the numbers of such a name are not those of the correct name of the subject; if its keynote does not harmonize with his rightful one; or if the colors in the chromoscope of the adopted name are different from his natural colors, he cannot hope to succeed while using it."

Wheat and Tares.

To the Editor:—The words I have chosen for a text on which to base a short sermon, were suggested by an account in your brilliant paper of Jan. 23, of an exposure of a fraudulent medium.

The kingdom of heaven, which Jesus compared to a field, was a spiritual institution. He was a medium; and he chose twelve mediums to carry on the work of spiritualizing the world by teaching and demonstrating that this world and the world which the so-called dead have entered, are in close touch and perfect accord with each other. He foresaw that for filthy lucre mediumship would be prostituted by some and simulated by others; that tares would spring up beside the wheat, and he warned his disciples of the danger they would encounter of rooting up the wheat if they should attempt to root out the tares. That this danger is very great is evident to observing investigators of spiritual phenomena. I have realized this in my own experience of more than thirty years. What, then, shall we do? Accept the above text as our guide, in its broadest, or in a limited and discriminating interpretation.

I have pursued the latter course. When I find a person posing as a medium, who I am convinced possesses no medial gifts, I give my friends the benefit of my discovery personally, and through the press. When I am convinced that a medium supplements his or her genuine phenomena with fraudulent phenomena, I follow the same course. I regard a fraudulent medium as lower in morals, and more damaging to Spiritualism than the one who is a fakir pure and simple. I have encountered some of both classes. When I find a medium who is genuine wheat, I deem it a sacred duty to give my friends privately and the general public through the press, the benefit of my discovery.

Some fifteen years ago, while spending a summer at Onset Bay, I was induced to attend a seance of Mrs. C. C. Bliss, the then, and still famous materializing medium. I was favorably impressed, though no spirit came to me. During the years that have flown since then, I have attended more than fifty of her seances, in Onset, Boston and Chicago. I am convinced that she is an honest woman. I have met my mother and other dear ones in her seances, so perfectly clothed in temporary forms as to be readily recognized, and have received from them messages of love, and other proofs of identity which made doubt impossible.

In October, 1897, my friend, Mr. B. O. Wilson, a prominent wholesale druggist of Boston, came to my home in that city one day to see some spirit picture and to attend with me Mrs. Bliss's seance at her residence but a few blocks away. He had never been at a seance, hence he was a skeptic. His father, who died at the age of 91, materialized his form and features, but could not speak. Mr. W. asked, "Who is it?"

"It is your father," I said.

"Well, he does look wonderfully like father, but why don't he speak to me?"

"This is probably his first experience of this sort, and he cannot talk," I said. The old gentleman bowed to me, and smiled his thanks for my explanation.

The next to come was a lady friend of mine whose portrait Mr. Wilson had examined before we started to the seance. I introduced him to her, and giving him her hand, she said:

"I am pleased to meet you, sir. I am always glad to meet the friends of my friend Thomas"—giving me the name she had called me by when she knew me on earth, forty years before.

After resuming our seats, I asked my friend if that woman resembled the portrait I had shown him.

"Oh, that is the original of the portrait undoubtedly, but it is incredible that she is a spirit. I never saw a more natural woman in my life, or one more elegant in form or charming in manner."

Since the publication of my book, "In the World Celestial," quite a large number of my Chicago medical friends, on reading it, have asked me to direct them to a good medium, I direct them to Mrs. Bliss; 3212 Prairie avenue, and and I am happy to know that quite a number have through her manifestations, become convinced of the truth of Spiritualism. How a Woman Paid Her Debts.

I am out of debt, thanks to the Dish-washer business. In the past three months I have made $600,000 selling Dish-washer. I never saw anything sell so easily. Every family needs a Dish-washer and will buy one when shown how beautifully it will wash and dry the family dishes in two minutes. I sell from my own house. Each Dish-washer sold brings me many orders. The dishes are washed without wetting the hands. That is why ladies want the Dish-washer. I give my experience for the benefit of any one who may wish to make money easy. I buy my Dish-washers from the Mound City Dish-washer Co., St. Louis, Mo. Write them for particulars. They will start you in business in your own home. L. A. C.

HAS JUST BEEN ISSUED, ENTITLED

THE NATURE CURE

BY PHYSICAL AND MENTAL METHODS, ILLUSTRATED.

A Bridge from the Old to the New; the Dawn of a New Day in Medical Practice. A Clear, Short-Cut Treatise on the Cause and Cure of Disease.

By MARVIN E. CONGER, M. D.
Assisted by ROSA C. CONGER, M. D.

Nature Cure teaches how to heal by simple home remedies.
It teaches how Nature cures.
It does not use poisonous drugs.
It does not endorse dangerous experiments with the surgeon's knife.
It will save money in every home.
It is entirely free from technical rubbish.
It teaches how typhoid and other fevers may be cured at once.
It teaches how pneumonia, la-grippe, diphtheria and other forms of disease considered dangerous, may be cured in twenty-four hours.
It is, as a medical book for homes, THE BEST, and is up-to-date in every particular.
There is no similar book, no medical, hygienic or reformatory doctor book that compares with THE NATURE CURE.

The light is turned on to objectionable medical mysteries, latin prescriptions, dogmatic theories and dangerous experiments of the present expensive medical practice.

Every pains has been taken to make the leading points so plain that all, young and old, may easily understand. Condensed facts, short, clear-cut paragraphs are some of the attractive features of THE NATURE CURE.

The new and better methods of curing the sick and preventing disease, have never been so clearly stated in plain English for the plain people, as in NATURE CURE.

Our Definition of Medicine.—Any method or remedy that will remove, alleviate or modify pain and restore the sick to normal condition, is practical medicine.

Stripped of mystery and deception, the study and practice of medicine can be carried to success in every intelligent home. NATURE CURE will lead the way to certain success.

The best medical practice is the one that will cure in the least time with the least risk and expense.

Nature Cure is a true exponent of the practice of medicine as defined, and stands squarely upon truth and demonstration, rejecting theories and experiments wherever health and life are endangered.

The book contains 375 pages, and is finely illustrated; the mechanical and artistic work are the very best. Bound in fine English cloth, marble edges, $2.00; common cloth $1.50.

LIFE BEYOND DEATH

Being a Review of

The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,

Leading to the Question as to Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

8vo. Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "otherworldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BEYOND THE VAIL

A Sequel to "Rending the Vail."

The two volumes together as a record of practically obtained facts demonstrating the claims of Modern Spiritualism as to post mortal survival, are unique and overwhelming.

Every communication is from a full materialized spirit form, in good light, and either spoken audibly or written in full view by the form. There is not an automatic or trance message in the book.

It is illustrated by several engravings, the originals of which were drawn in the presence of the circle by a full form materialized spirit artist.

BEYOND THE VAIL is, as a rule, the experiences of spirits in both worlds—their own account of their lives on earth and their progress after death to their present condition of freedom from earth conditions. The narratives are intensely interesting, instructive and often highly dramatic.

Coincident with these are the profoundly philosophical comments of the controlling spirits of the seances. Prof. William Denton, Thomas Paine, Dr. W. H. Reed and others—covering, law, medicine, jurisprudence, theology and metaphysics. There are no books in existence of like character or of higher authority. Price, by mail, $1.75.

CELESTIAL DYNAMICS,

Being a Normal Course of Study in the Astro-Magnetic Forces of Nature.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE LIGHT OF EGYPT," "THE LANGUAGE OF THE STARS," ETC.

A magnificent and complete course of Astro-metaphysical study, embodying Vital Principles of Life, Mental Force, Sickness and Disease. With the only true and really Scientific method of treating the sick successfully.

Mental Healers, Meta-physicians, and all who practice the Healing Art Divine should give "Celestial Dynamics" a thorough and impartial study and thus learn the real cause of their frequent failures.

No Astro-Student can afford to be without this work, if he would understand the Meta-physics of Astrology.

This work was specially prepared for publication to meet the demands of a large and very earnest class of people who cannot afford to pay for a regular course of instruction under a qualified teacher. And those who can afford this privilege will find the work an invaluable text-book to their studies.

History of the CHRISTIAN RELIGION to the Year 200,

BY CHARLES V. WAITE, A. M.

Fifth Edition—Revised, with Much Additional Matter in Appendix.

A standard and reliable history of the earlier period of the church, giving facts that are not found in the so-called histories written by churchmen. This latest edition has been carefully and thoroughly revised, and it is a reliable magazine of facts, such as the honest inquirer wants. It opens up to the investigator and student a wide field of historical research in matters of fact wholly ignored by the regular church historians, and throws a bright glare of light on points heretofore carefully shrouded in darkness.

SAN FRANCISCO TO SYDNEY

Life for Three Weeks on Board an Ocean Greyhound.

On December 10, I boarded the steamer "Ventura," at San Francisco. I found the cabins small but clear, those on the upper deck have plenty of fresh air and a fine view of the ocean. Life on an ocean steamer is one of idleness; you spend your time eating, reading, sleeping and chatting.

At 7 in the morning delicious fresh fruit is brought to each cabin sharpening your appetite for breakfast. A delightful tepid salt water bath is then prepared. At 8 o'clock a cornet solo warns you that you have but half an hour for dressing, and at 8:30 another tune means that breakfast is ready.

The purser assigns a place for each guest at the table. The food is well prepared and of as good a quality and variety as found in the first-class hotels in America. After breakfast the passengers repair to the upper or promenade deck, each has his or her own steamer chair which is secured by paying a nominal sum and after a walk on the deck, reading or visiting is indulged in. At 11 o'clock the deck steward refreshes the passengers with hot bouillon and toasted crackers or fruit as you may fancy. Lunch is served at 1 o'clock, after which a siesta is indulged in.

At 4 o'clock tea and cake is served in the dining-room. You enjoy another cornet solo at 6, which is repeated at 6:30, the latter meaning that dinner is ready. At 10 o'clock you can have light refreshment and tea if desired, and if any passenger retires hungry it is certainly not the fault of the steamship company. Among the favorite pastimes are games such as quoits, cricket, and progressive euchre, with an occasional diversion of a concert or literary entertainment. A favorite sport with the gentlemen is to get up a pool of the run of the ship every day. The numbers are sold and drawn. At noon the captain sends in a report of the number of miles the steamer has run for the past 24 hours, and the one holding the correct number is from $50 to $75 ahead, according to the size of the pool. The daily run was from 378 to 400 miles. On Sunday morning religious services were held in the social hall on the upper deck and in the evening in the second cabin.

Among the prominent fellow passengers were Sir Tatton Sykes and Madame Louise, the Countess De Lichterwoldo of London, Honorable N. Barnard, a member of parliament from Victoria, Canada, with his wife; Honorable W. Armstrong, another M. P., from Brisbane, Queensland; Mrs. J. H. Allen, whose grandfather, father and brother have all served in parliament from Sydney. She and her husband were on their wedding trip. There were over one hundred first cabin passengers and about an equal number in the second cabins and steerage. I have never in all my experience in traveling found greater efforts made to please the passengers than on the "Ventura." From the captain to the cabin steward all were doing their utmost to serve our comfort and add to our pleasure. I found that a large number of the cabin passengers were round-the-world travelers, several having made the journey two or three times before.

You have little idea of what it means to equip a ship like the Ventura for such a long journey. This splendid steamer is one of three sister ships of the Oceanic Steamship Co. It is a twin screw steamer of 6,200 gross tonnage, with 100 cabins and three bridal chambers. It takes 140 tons of coal a day to feed it, and 160 men compose officers and crew. When it is understood that nearly all the provisions needed to feed passengers and crew for three weeks are shipped from San Fransico, you will understand that it takes tons of meat, fish, vegetables, fruit, butter and milk. Each of these is stored separately in huge refrigerators. In addition it carries all the fresh water needed for drinking, cooking, and toilet purposes, in huge tanks. The ship manufactures its own ice and electric lights. It carries the American and English mail to the Australian colonies, keeping two mail clerks busy on board sorting the same, and 1500 bags were left at Auckland, New Zealand, the balance taken to Sydney.

The meals are cooked and served and the cabin cleaned by men. Three stewardesses attend the ladies who may be indisposed and serve their meals in their cabin. The work on board is regulated by "bells." At half-past twelve one bell strikes; at 1, two bells; three bells at half-past one, and so on at each half-hour until eight bells strike at 4, at 8 and at 12, when the crews change. The passengers soon fall into the habit of going by the bells instead of consulting their watches.

Seven days after leaving San Francisco we landed at Honolulu. On nearing the island you see a range of mountains stretching several miles into the ocean; these are really extinct volcanoes and barren. Honolulu is the capital and principal port of entry of the Hawaiian Islands, justly called the "Paradise of the Pacific," and remarkable for their scenic attractions and the presence of the world-famed volcano of Kilauea.

Honolulu has a population of about 40,000 people and is enhanced by tropical beauty and splendor which meets the eye everywhere. It has a fine electric car system and beautiful drives for miles around. The cottages are very artistic, buried in gardens of floral beauty. Cocoanuts, bananas and other tropical fruits were ripe, and tasted fresh from the trees are quite different from what we get in Chicago. On leaving Honolulu I felt as if I had made a visit to Fairyland. This marks the entrance into tropical clime and on taking breakfast the following morning on the ship I found that many of the passengers and all of the officers and crew were dressed in white from cap to shoes, giving a dainty, pleasing appearance. The warm weather continued and we crossed the equator on Sunday, Dec. 20, at 9 p. m. Contrary to our expectations, however, the day was not excessively warm.

On Wednesday, Dec. 23, we stopped for a few hours at Pago Pago, one of the Samoan Islands. Robert Louis Stevenson lived on this enchanted isle and is buried there. We found the natives of fine appearance and well-developed. The men were better looking than the women. Their dress consists of a tappa cloth made from cocoa which is bound around their loins, while their ornaments consisted chiefly in shell necklaces. These kind-hearted natives seemed very hospitable, and everywhere you heard "talofa," their greeting, meaning "love to you." At 5 p. m. we steamed towards New Zealand. I had the novel experience of spending Christmas on the Pacific Ocean. Christmas eve the passengers decided to spend by playing progressive euchre. As my experience is decidedly limited, I preferred not to inflict myself on any unsuspecting partners, but as a lady was needed to fill out a tenth table I joined them. Have you ever played progressive euchre and won a prize? If so, you no doubt remember it with great pleasure. I won the booby prize. But not all the briny waters of the Pacific can wash out the memory of the agonies of that night. Should I write a history of how I won that prize it would be a succession of chapters of agonies. I simply could not win. If I had a "lone" hand the bell would ring before I could finish it. Three times there was an even number of points on each side and the ladies were to cut, the highest card winning. Each time I cut the lowest card. I began to grow cold—from my head the chills crept down my spine. My marrow stiffened and my blood jellied, while the hair seemed to rise on my head. Things grew black before my eyes, the jacks danced with the queens while the spots left their accustomed places and danced all over the cards which assumed all the hues of the rainbow except the right one, for if my partner called hearts or diamonds there was not one in my hand and if by accident I had the right or left bower I was so anxious to use it that I played it to win my partner's trick. Of course I couldn't expect to win under such conditions and when the game was over and I won my prize I was so weak I could hardly speak. The prize consisted in a bottle of Worcestershire sauce. I used to like it, but now I could not look a bottle calmly in the face, much less enjoy its contents, nor will I till I can learn to forget the misery I went through Christmas eve while winning the booby prize.

Christmas day dawned beautiful, the weather was ideal and the sea calm. A bountiful breakfast made everybody feel in good humor, and while no doubt the majority were very homesick, the feeling was repressed and everybody tried to be cheerful. The dining-room was beautifully decorated with hangings and ornaments in red, white and blue, also a number of flags, conspicuous the Stars and Stripes. The American flag never looks so beautiful as it will when you get away from home amongst strangers. At dinner the electric lights in colored globes added beauty and brilliancy, favors were placed at each plate, a sumptuous dinner was served and general merry-making was the order of the hour. At the close several toasts were given to the "Officers," the "Ladies," and so forth—and as we were all away from home, and "all in the same boat," all did their best to help make this a happy yule-tide.

On Saturday, the 26th, the boat passed the 180th meridian and 24 hours has been lost in time from San Francisco. Until 12 o'clock noon, it was Saturday, but the afternoon was called Sunday afternoon. The following day, Monday, Dec. 28, we arrived in Auckland, N. Z., where the ship loaded and unloaded over 700 tons of freight. They carry mostly oranges, apples, onions, canned fruit and vegetables, machinery and bicycles for Australian ports, returning with skins, mostly rabbits, sheep pelts, hides, glue stock and hardwood lumber from Sydney, and flax fibre from New Zealand. Auckland is a frontier town and does not impress you as favorably as expected. Little attention is paid to style or beauty. The people walk all over the streets as well as on the sidewalk. I found lovely domestic fruit ranging 20 to 40 per cent higher in price than our own, while one dollar was asked for California oranges per dozen.

On Tuesday morning we started at 6 for Sydney; the journey was very pleasant, and on Jan. 1. I landed about 2:30 in the afternoon in Sydney. The passengers were examined by the government physician before they were allowed to land, and your baggage is next examined by the customs officials. I arrived on the first day of the new year in this new country, having sailed 7210 miles without feeling sea-sick or losing a meal.

Sydney.—I could fill pages describing the beauties of Sydney; it has one of the most magnificent harbors in the world. It contains about one-half million inhabitants, with the largest and finest town hall in the southern hemisphere, seating 5,000 people and containing one of the largest and finest-toned organs made. Free organ recitals are given here twice a week. It has the cleanest streets and finest public parks I have ever seen. They cover about 800 acres. I have never seen finer scenery in connection with any city; it seems that everything has been done which nature and man could do to elevate the tone of the people and still I found saloons filled with people, waited upon by barmaids, who were some of the most modern and best dressed women I saw.

Sydney is a fine, enterprising city withal, about 20 years behind our times, the people have little artistic taste. The gentlemen all wear "store clothes" and the ladies are decked out in laces, fringe, and furbelows which look as if from Seigel & Cooper's left-overs from four seasons back. They "do" their hair in most unbecoming wads and wear nets. The trim shirt-waist is an unknown article, but fancy "blouses" take its place. It is midsummer here, but the weather is very pleasant.

I lectured on Sunday evening in Leigh Hall under the auspices of the Psychic Society of New South Wales. Mr. W. Adams is the president. This society has a flourishing lyceum under the direction of Mrs. Hughes. The hall was crowded to the utmost and finely decorated, the audience enthusiastic in welcoming the stranger. They listened with closest attention and were in perfect rapport with the speaker. I have never had a more cordial reception nor found a more delightful audience to address than the hospitable people in the beautiful city of Sydney.

On Jan. 10 and 17, I speak in the Bijou Theatre in Melbourne, and have just received a wire from Mr. W. H. Terry there, informing me that he has arranged for a reception and tea at his home on the evening of the 9th.

But I must close, for the Ventura is returning, and I wish it to bear my "Talofa" to the Spiritualists in America.

Happiness.

What is your opinion of Happiness?

What are the essentials upon which you think it depends? Money, love, health—nine out of ten persons would say. Reverse the order of the three and you'll have them as they should be. You cannot be happy if your health is bad. Neither can those around you. Ever notice how grouchy a man or woman is who has dyspepsia or any form of stomach trouble? They cannot help it. It's the result of weakened nerves. Don't judge him too harshly. You cannot expect to find a sunny disposition where pain is gnawing away the body, mind and nerves.

Some of them try to get cured—try hard, but finally give up in despair. Vernal Palmettona (formerly known as Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine) has restored more of these people to health and happiness than any other remedy on earth.

It is a purely vegetable remedy which roots out the cause of the trouble at the very start. It is a positive and permanent cure for ailments of stomach, liver, bowels, kidneys, heart and blood. It doesn't act like harsh purgatives and cathartics. It does its work gently, thoroughly and with no shock to the nervous system. We want you to try this grand remedy at our expense. Write for a free sample bottle to-day. Gladly sent postpaid. Learn for yourself what it will do, before you buy. We know what it has done, what it will do. You do not. We take this way of showing our confidence in it. Address, Vernal Remedy Co., 452 Seneca Building, Buffalo, N. Y.

STOMACH TROUBLES CURED.

We Can Positively Cure Any Case of Stomach Trouble Not Caused by Cancer. Do Not Take Our Word. TEST IT YOURSELF.

FREE TEST TREATMENT

Do you suffer from indigestion, dyspepsia or stomach trouble in any form? If you do why not let us cure you? We do not mean HELP you by giving you a Soda Compound Tablet or some of the other patent "Dyspepsia Cures." We will positively and permanently cure you. We will go to the very foundation of your trouble; will remove the causes, strengthen and tone up the stomach, and make you strong and healthy as you ever were. We could give you testimonials by the thousands of those we have cured of stomach trouble in all its forms and stages; but they would not be facts or proof to you—only words of thanks and praise. The only absolute proof is in the treatment itself. And believing that a practical test would be more convincing to sufferers than all the testimonials we could print and absolutely prove its great merits, we will send anyone desiring it a full two weeks' trial treatment absolutely free.

If you have stomach trouble and have failed to get relief, write us at once and learn by practical test what we can do for you. Address Dr. Peebles Institute of Health, Ltd., 23 Main Street, Battle Creek, Mich.

POWER OF CONCENTRATION.

Devotee of Occult Wisdom Tells How to Acquire It.

For some time now the study of the art which enabled the people of the Orient to mystify the people of the Occident has been quietly and unobtrusively pushing its way to the front, until finally the mysteries of the East have resolved themselves into a recognized educational enterprise.

Western teachers speak of this occult wisdom as the unfolding of the inner consciousness. It is not, as is generally supposed, a new science, but the oldest existing one, though the popular way of teaching it is altogether new.

"You must either unfold your own mental powers, or remain an automaton," explained a devoted and popular teacher of occult wisdom in a recent interview. "This is what happens to the average individual who simply follows what he has been taught. No one ever succeeded in copying another. Our mission, and a glorious one it is, too, is simply to get out that which is within. The person who is always copying is sure to be in despair; while the one who is continually unfolding is ever surmounting difficulties and casting aside heavy weights.

"Every human being is capable of becoming just what his ideal demands of him, if he sets about it in a scientific way. You cannot divide yourself up into parts, and be in two or three places at the same time, which is just what you try to do when your hands are doing one thing, and the mind is jumping ahead to the two or three next things to be done; for whatever is accomplished on the plane of action must be first wrought out on the plane of thought. If you are going to keep busy at something with your hands, you must keep your mind on what you are doing. And as soon as the mental habit of concentration is perfectly well formed, you have obtained the key which unlocks the door to all knowledge."

There is no power of either body or mind, so the adherents of this new education maintain, which cannot be fully developed by the study of occult wisdom, which consists principally in drills that must be constantly gone through with. Practice, and nothing else, makes perfect. Whatever one would be, painter, artist, singer, writer or poet, there lies within one the wisdom and power to attain one's end.

In striving for this, no rule can be deviated from. There must be a special hour and a special day for the performing of every lesson or drill. The same straightbacked, comfortable chair, placed always in the same spot, facing always the same way in a pleasantly lighted and well ventilated room, must be used by the student. He must assume a position which locks out, as it were, every particle of floating mind stuff that the brain is open to receive before he attains to the power of concentration. By properly placing the right foot over the left, clasping the hands together with the fingers of the right hand resting on the wrist of the left, the student thus locks out the physical senses and enters the realm of the psychic ones. Before doing so, however, the imagination must be brought into full play. Imagine to the heart's desire; for while the student is rising mentally into the desired realm, the creating power is going forth through the unfolding of the inner consciousness to accomplish what the ideal asks for.

Another method is to trace a heavily marked black ball on the wall of the room directly in front of the eyes of the student, who excludes from his mind all but the idea of gazing upon it until the heavy speck melts out of his sight. The student then holds any article whereof a mental picture is desired at the centre of the forehead until it is obtained.

So trivial a thing as gazing into a crystal is said to be of momentous importance in the study of occult wisdom.

Great care must be observed by the student always to shut himself in a room where all is quiet, assuming a position of rest, that the mind may have no disturbance by discomfort; for after entering upon this study the physical body must never be allowed to be a weight upon the mind.—New York Tribune.

And other Essays. By Charles Bradlaugh. With the story of his life as told by himself, and the history of his parliamentary struggle. With portrait. Paper, 50c.

Can Telepathy Explain?

By Minot J. Savage.

Dr. Savage, in this book of 243 pages, discusses problems that have vexed intelligent minds probably to a greater extent than any others, saving those of the religious life. He states a great number of well-authenticated instances of spiritist revelation or communication. His discussion is frank and fearless, and merits the widest reading for he deals with facts and experiences. Price, cloth, $1.00.

New Testament Stories

COMICALLY ILLUSTRATED. Drawings by Watson Heston, with critical and humorous comments upon the texts. Heston's drawings are incomparable, and excruciatingly funny. One must see the book to appreciate it; the pictorial satire cannot be told. It will make you laugh heartily. Price in board, $1.00; cloth, $1.50.

The Nemesis of Chautauqua Lake

This fascinating Book by the well-known Author and Scholar,

HON. A. B. RICHMOND,

Should be in the hands of every Spiritualist in the land. It is based on a historical fact, but through the narative is woven a psychic line of thought in the style so natural to the great criminal lawyer that one can feel the author's very presence during its perusal. It is certainly interesting. Price, cloth, 75 cents.

The Influence of the Zodiac Upon Human Life,

With Character Readings of Persons Born Upon the Cusp.

The principles found in this volume are both a science and religion, for a better and a far happier human society. It points to the planets as an index to the human character and liability to diseases; also gives the gems and colors suited to temperaments evolved under certain planets. But the author, ELEANOR KIRK, lays special stress upon the fundamental principle that "All maladies known to man can be entirely dominated, forever cast out, by those who realize that mind is the master and body the servant." Price, cloth, $1.00.

Longley's Choice Collection OF BEAUTIFUL SONGS.

Here is a book of songs for public meetings and the home that is full of music and poetry that reach the soul. The book is just the right size, neatly constructed, plainly printed on a splendid quality of paper, and contains 76 songs.

WORDS THAT ARE TRUE.

"These songs are adapted to the needs of societies and to the home; they are spiritual, and breathe a tender sentiment to the cultured soul. —Lyman C. Howe.

"This collection of songs breathes a pure spiritual harmony, and has an uplifting tendency."—Dawning Light.

"The songs and music are of a nature to inspire those who hear them with new and higher resolves." D. W. Hull.

"There are some things in our personal history that never fade from memory. One in mine has been fresh for fifty years. I went one night to hear the eloquent lecturer, Prof. S. B. Brittan, but I have no recollection of a thought he advanced or a word uttered. But with him was a young man who sang, 'What shall be my angel name.' The man, the song have been singing in my consciousness ever since; the man was Prof. Longley, the song, one of his earliest compositions."—J. S. Loveland.

Longley's latest book of songs comprises the cream of all his former books and many new ones, and can be had in decorated covers for 60 cents; plain, 40 cents.

Practical Methods to Insure Success.

A valuable little work, full of practical instruction in matters pertaining to physical, mental and spiritual health. Worth many times its cost. Price 10 cents.

The Center of Creation

BY CHARLES DAWBARN.

Nature, taking a certain amount of space for her target fired at it with arrows. When she scored, that made a sun, and perhaps a planetary system. But when at last she hit the bull's eye fair and square, out popped man. Such may be taken as a brief synopsis of Alfred Russel Wallace's new book entitled Man's Place in Nature. That book is the text for the following article.

From the time that man began to think, he has thought about himself. His own past, which we call history, has interested and often perplexed him. But the worst problem of all has been as to what became of him after the body was dead. By many, that has been counted the end of him, just as his birth was the beginning. But to others have come experiences that in these later days have led them to proclaim a new birth into a new life as the natural and certain result of passing through the process of death.

There has been no point yet discovered at which thought meets an impassable barrier, so the thinker of to-day finds himself facing an entirely new problem. He is now asking himself how many are to share this assumed eternity of immortality? He has accustomed himself to think of space as infinite, and bestudded with innumerable systems of suns and planets. He has said to himself, "There must be intelligent beings on many another world, who will find innumerable opportunities in space for evolving a manhood at least equal to that of our little earth. They, like ourselves, will die, and pass on and up to a still higher manhood in their own spirit spheres."

This has seemed both reasonable and probable, especially when the belief has been accompanied by a half scientific acknowledgement that since no two planets would be alike, therefore their evolved forms of life would surely differ from anything we could imagine or conceive. And since man was the capstone of evolution here, so superior beings would occupy a like favored position in those other worlds.

It has seemed to the thinker that such must be the meaning of the innumerable worlds of space, many of them basking in the glory of suns far larger and more glorious than our own. Nothing could apparently be more certain than that myriad intelligences are thus voicing the glory of their creator, and like ourselves, dying into higher stages of existence.

The man who dies must have a body to die out of, and it is of course assumed that the inhabitants of other planets have some sort of soul clothing, which they leave behind when they die.

Except to the pure materialists of the Buchner and Haeckel variety who believe that man is just a will o' the wisp, going out with a puff, there has seemed almost a certainty that, whatever might be the future for man, it would be shared by souls from other planets. Occultists have from time to time interviewed intelligences claiming to have lived and died in Mars, Saturn and even outside worlds, whose visits have been accepted as natural, and according to the law governing spirit return. Seers have claimed to make visits, while in the superior condition, to gatherings in other worlds where they have found charming hostesses and intelligent hosts to give them cordial welcome. These foreigners were always described as just men and women, but with a difference that charmed the curiosity-seeker. These facts have been written and printed in cold type for our children and our children's children to read, if the gates ajar to-day should presently swing to, and the key be turned in the lock.

But alas! and alas! now comes our own Alfred Russel Wallace and solemnly declares that man as existing on this planet was the one object and ultimate of every star, nebula and galaxy in Cosmos in general, and of our own solar system in particular. To make it still worse, he has an inconvenient method of capturing and arranging facts, just as he captured and arranged butterflies in the Molucca Islands in his pre-Darwinian youth. And these facts, when turned upside down, and inside out, are found to be explosives which "go off" and destroy the old beliefs deemed almost sacred.

The reader who likes good solid reading will find it in "Man's Place in Nature," just issued from the press to the glory of Alfred Russel Wallace, and the probable bewilderment of the public. Whether the individual reader purrs or growls will depend upon his early training, and the violence of his present beliefs.

A very brief summary of the argument must suffice for the present article and its readers, after which we may, perhaps, endeavor to discover if the asserted facts contain a lesson of value for ourselves.

The increase in telescopic power, aided by the camera, has added millions of stars to the few thousands visible to the unaided eye of man. But the process has seemingly come to an end. The camera may now look for hours right through the Milky Way into the depths beyond, and find only nothingness and space. So it becomes evident that mighty Cosmos is itself but a speck in infinite space. We may even speak of it as "our Cosmos," for perchance there may be another Cosmos beyond our ken. This Cosmos is declared by astronomers to be a huge ring, so vast that light traveling at the rate of 180,000 miles a second would require 30,000 years for its little trip, and we suppose as much more for its return journey. This ring is the well known Milky Way, with comparatively few stars or systems above or below its plane. In the very center of this plane is a cluster whose stars are somewhat nearer together; and of this cluster our solar system is but a speck. Distances are so vast in space that solar or stellar movements will not affect this position in millions of years. We are very nearly in the middle of this scenic display on Nature's stage and there we shall remain.

The import of this position consists in the fact that away from this center a perpetual celestial Donnybrook Fair is going on. Gravitation is the one eternal Irishman with a chip on his shoulder, looking for a row. So we have collisions and explosions galore, leaving some stars bright, many more dark, sometimes two or three almost touching, then a sudden flare up, and a change of partners for the next dance.

In a word, outside our center there is no place for a sober-minded planet to become mother of a human family, and bring them up as such a family must be brought up if it's ever to become a race of archangels. This demands a hundred million of years, more or less, with sufficient quiet for the children to grow up in their nursery. So the student will please observe that Cosmos is really of no account, save that as a volcanic outburst at one place is favorable to peace and quiet somewhere else, so our center gets the benefit of the rumpus going on outside. It is thus evidently of no use to expect a heaven filled up with spirits who have been born and died in these outer spheres, for the conditions therein won't permit any advanced forms of life. So it's good-bye to all dreams of human intelligence outside our center.

Having thus rather summarily disposed of Cosmos in general and the Milky Way in particular, the learned doctor and F. R. S. returns to the central cluster, amid which roams our tiny planet earth, the present abode of man. He next details the conditions needed for life to work upward to such a capstone as man, and, first of all, there must be comparative quiet for untold millions of years. This condition could only by any chance, be found in the central region of the vast Milky Way. Again, the temperature within which human life is possible is very limited. There must be an atmosphere, containing certain gases, for man to breathe. But gases, like everything else material, are subject to gravitation, so unless the planet is large and solid enough to hold them, some of these gases may escape and pass out into space. Day and night seem essential, that is to say, periods of rest are necessary to man, as we know him. So the planet must turn on its own axis at regular short periods, as well as revolve round the sun. Both water and air are essential to life as we know it, and both are mixtures of certain gases. Without that mixture the conditions would be unfavorable for man. Of course, without hydrogen there would be no water, but if hydrogen were roaming round loose, a slight mixture with oxygen would produce dangerous explosions. But it happens that hydrogen is the lightest of our gases, and the earth is just too small to retain it by gravitation, and almost all, not needed for water, escapes into space beyond our atmosphere. So, we see, that a planet must be just right size, neither too big nor too little, or man could not breathe.

Taking such facts as these, with many others, the learned scientist proceeds to search for manhood outside the earth, but within our solar system.

From the Spirit Realms.

Spirit Carlyle Petersilea.

While on Earth Mr. Petersilea was a medium for the transmission of important letters from those long in spirit life. Now, having become a freed spirit himself, he will convey his best thoughts through the mediumship of his devoted wife, and we are sure they will prove interesting to our readers.

LETTER NUMBER TWO.

Now I must have remained in this condition for about seven hours, as earthly time is counted; when I opened my eyes and saw my father standing near me.

For a short time I was dazed, forgetful that I had passed through the change. I arose to a sitting posture, putting my hand to my head.

"Where am I, and what has happened?" I asked.

My father looked at me seriously, and with a great degree of solicitude.

"Carlyle, dear boy," he asked, "how do you feel after your rest?"

"I think I am all right," I answered, "but where is my wife? I want my wife."

I tried to rise, but could not stand alone. My father came to my assistance, helped me to my feet; but still I could not stand without his support. Now dear friends, believe it or not, as you please, but my sensations were those of one recovering from a long and severe illness. I was not able to stand alone. I could not see distinctly. I could hardly distinguish one sound from another. All sounds seemed to merge into a soft roar, as one hears the moaning of the ocean. But one thought, and one alone, was in my mind. My wife—my darling wife! Where, oh! where, was my wife?

"Carlyle," said my father, gently, as he assisted me to a seat; "recall your scattered thoughts, my child. We will go to your wife presently; but you must first gain a little more strength, and partake of some refreshment."

I now remembered that I had passed through the change, and when my father spoke of refreshment, it did not surprise me, for I remembered that it had been written, when I was in the material body that spirits partook of refreshments; and I was curious to watch the proceedings of my father. My father's form appeared quite distinct to me, but all else seemed to be in a mist or soft haze. I kept brushing my hand across my eyes, but the mist would not clear. My father placed a little table in front of me, he spread over it a white cloth, he brought from somewhere a dish of fruit and a silver pitcher filled with what seemed to be milk, he then produced two plates, two glasses, knives and forks, and then took a seat opposite me at the table. But I felt irritable and disappointed.

"I want to take breakfast with my wife," I said.

He looked at me with loving, serious eyes.

"Carlyle," he said, rebukingly, "are you not glad to see me after our long separation—me, your own father? Will you not take breakfast with me once more?"

He spoke to me as one would speak to a sick and fretful child. It brought me once more to my senses, and I remembered that I was, or had been but a short time before, a man of fifty-nine years; and then I smiled as I thought how a short time before the change I had asked my wife how old I was; was I eighty? was I seventy? for time, even then, was merging into eternity, and I could not remember how old I was; and then I thought of her patient answers:

"No, dear; you are only fifty-nine."

I knew that I had asked and she had answered that question a great many times. My father's gentle reproof filled my eyes with tears. Oh! I was weak, very weak. A great wave of love and gratitude now filled my being. "Father, forgive me," I said; "but oh, I do want my wife."

"Be patient, dear son," he said; "and now let us breakfast together." Then he filled my glass with milk, and placed bread and fruit upon my plate.

"Father," I said, "I know all about spiritual fruit, because it was once explained by you, years ago, when you wrote or spiritually dictated the writing of the book called The Discovered Country, but you said nothing about milk. You certainly cannot have cows here that give milk?"

"Taste it," he said.

I did so. "Why, it tastes just like milk," I said, very much surprised.

He smiled quizzically. "Do you remember," he asked, "how Judge Edmonds wrote, in one of his books, that, as he roamed in spirit life, a spirit lady offered him a glass of buttermilk, which he quaffed with great gusto and was greatly refreshed thereby?"

I laughed. "I did not read it myself," I replied, "but I have heard my wife speak of it often, and it seemed perfectly ridiculous to me."

"Did it, indeed!" said my father. "So it did to most others, who could not understand spiritual things. Drink your milk, dear boy—drink your milk, while I explain."

I obeyed him and the more I drank the stronger I felt, and the mist began to clear away, but I was very curious. My father sipped his milk leisurely, and then said:

"You have read also, how Jesus turned water into wine, at a marriage feast?"

Yes; but I never believed it."

"And you did not believe about Judge Edmonds' buttermilk, either?"

"No, certainly not."

"But you believe that you are now drinking milk, do you not?"

"It certainly looks and tastes like milk," I answered.

"Well, Carlyle," he said, "I have just manufactured that milk for your especial benefit. Milk for babies, strong meat for men. You are a weak, newborn babe, just now, and need milk. If Jesus, while still on earth, could turn water into wine, I, who am a spirit, can easily turn water into milk. But I cannot now explain to you the method by which it is accomplished; that is something you must learn in the future. And now that you are nourished somewhat, we will go and see your wife; but you must gather all your courage and strength for the ordeal."

I arose eagerly, but could not yet stand without his support. He immediately came to my assistance.

"Lean on me," he said, "and we will descend. It is not far. I have taken you but a little way from your wife and your earthly home. Come," and he linked his arm in mine and gently assisted me. As we floated, rather than walked, downward, it seemed to me that we were going down a hill which was not very steep. The grass was waving green and tall, all besprinkled with flowers. At length we were floating in those green fields, and I caught my breath rapturously as the soft, refreshing breeze struck my face. My wife—my wife! I was going back to my wife. This was the song my soul sung.

"Courage, now," said my father; and we floated in at the open door. Oh! what a commotion reigned. Strangers, or those whom I had known but little, filled the house. My wife sat stupefied and nearly crazed with grief, sighing and sobbing broken-heartedly. We paused directly in front of her as she sat, and my father said: "Now, we will try to make her see and hear us."

But I readily comprehended that I could not do this without his higher wisdom and assistance. I saw my father waving his hands above her head and before her eyes, and I realized that he was using spiritual mesmeric power—that is, partially paralyzing the material brain, or putting it into a mesmeric sleep. This drew her spirit a little from the body, and I knew at once, that she saw me. Oh, how glad I was!

"Carlyle! Carlyle!" she exclaimed. "Is it really you or am I deceived? Do I imagine that I see you?"

"No," I said, "you really do see me."

"Oh! tell me about it," she said. "Where are you? How is it with you?"

"I am standing right here in the ether before you. I cannot see very plainly yet, nor hear very distinctly, and cannot stand alone."

She cried out: "O! my dear Carlyle, have you see your father yet?"

"Yes, the old gentleman's got me sure enough; but for him I could not be here or stand alone, for he is holding me up."

My father whispered: "She does not see me. I have kept myself invisible to her. It is enough at present, that she perceives you. She cares for nothing now but you and consequently can see no other spirit."

My father said that it was impossible to hold my wife in this superior condition very long, her mind was so clouded and deadened by grief, and we had done all we could for this time.

"Would you like to see your body?" asked my father. I assented, and he supported me to the parlor, where lay my body, that was, on the undertaker's cooling board, and my father said that it had been embalmed—and here I wish to emphasize a great truth: The cast-off material body is very disgustful to the living spirit. I glanced at it once or twice and then, with a sickening sensation, turned away. I went back to my wife, and her terrible grief filled me with sorrow and despair. Oh, my friends, and readers of The Progressive Thinker, do not mourn when your friends cast off the mortal body, but be cheerful and hopeful, and help them to rise up brightly in their new condition. But I will not blame my poor wife. She tried to do the best she could. I would not leave her and so, my father aiding me, I was able to speak to her once or twice more during the day. I told her that I was as much surprised as she was to find myself out of the body, but, as it was inevitable, we must both make the best of it. I also told her that perhaps it was better so, for I could now write my experience through her.

"My darling," I said, "I told you many, many times, that if I should go first, I would never, never leave you; and I will keep my word. I will not leave you for all the bright angels there may be in the spirit world."

At this she cried out: "My dear husband, I will not hold you to such a promise. Do you remember, dear, that I said to you, at such times, that if I were to go first I would not promise to stay by you all the time, for I should want to go and get wisdom enough to prepare a beautiful home for you?"

Friends, my wife was right and I was wrong. She has not held me to that promise, and it is well for me, and for her, that she has not; for, if she had, I should have very little to write about. I should not even know how to control her to write.

When my wife said that she would not hold me to such a promise, my father looked at me with a smile.

"Come Carlyle," he said, "let us go that you may get a little strength. You would like to be able to stand alone, would you not?"

But still I was very reluctant. I had always considered my word as a bond, but my wife had exonerated me, and with backward, lingering glances, I followed my father.

"We will return again this evening," he said.

An Object Study in the Home Circle, Illustrating Pleasant and Unpleasant Incidents That Are Apt to Occur in the Course of Investigation.

AN ACCOUNT OF PECULIAR AND WONDERFUL EXPERIENCES, AFFORDING AN INTERESTING FIELD OF THOUGHT FOR PSYCHIC STUDENTS AND PHILOSOPHERS TO CONSIDER.

To the Editor:—As you have from time to time through the columns of your valuable paper requested a report or short history from those who have been, and are now, holding home circles, I give you some incidents in connection with ours.

My wife, a neighbor lady and myself first began sitting at a stand or small table about ten years ago, and have, with the exception of one year, been sitting on an average once or twice a week ever since that date. All three of us are inspirational mediums. The stand moved, answered questions and spelled out messages from the very start. We then procured a planchette which worked like a charm. Then we purchased a psychograph which worked with great speed, and we received messages galore—some from those who had passed out so long ago their graves were sunk and moss-grown.

We added more members to the circle, off and on. We had at times grand light, and almost materializations. After four years, our guides as we afterwards learned, caused us to move about twenty miles into a rural district, and place us with an obsessed family on purpose to break up our circle for a time, because where we were before our environments were such that we could advance no farther; and here I want to say that we have learned since we have advanced to the supreme degree, that there are three degrees: the subordinate, the grand, and the supreme; and this is why so many circles progress no farther than the subordinate degree. They come almost to a stand-still. They sometimes write to Brother Hudson Tuttle, and he wisely tells them to discontinue their sittings for a time, and then when they start up again they will have a new set of higher guides. So it was with us. They placed us where we could not hold a circle for one year. Then they (the guides) moved us to this town where we have been holding circles for nearly six years, and have succeeded in developing some useful mediums.

These mediums seemed to be sent to us by some higher power. One young man whose name is Chase, said he seemed inspired or directed to come to our house to procure a room in order to attend the Normal School. The first night he sat in our circle his hand began to tremble, and seemed to be trying to reach for a pencil with which to write. We placed a pencil and paper on the stand and he made a few unintelligible scribbles. The next week he was controlled by Salmon P. Chase, who said the medium was a distant relative of his, and traced the genealogy of himself and the medium clear back to the landing of the Mayflower at Plymouth Rock. He also said he acts as president of what is known in the spirit world as the "Silver Crown Circle," and that they would make this medium a grand worker, a bright and shining light in the political department of the New Dispensation. Then Warren Chase, Lorenzo Chase, and the medium's spirit father, Vincent Chase, began to control. Warren Chase informed us he had been watching over this medium from early childhood, and that time would prove that he was a chosen instrument.

Soon others were sent to us for development—sent by the spirit world to us for a special purpose, and that to assist in removing obsessions from spirits and mortals, and especially Catholic obsessions.

It will seem mysterious to many to learn how some of these mediums were sent to us for development.

In the spring of 1901 I wished to rent the south half of the house in which I lived, containing four rooms; but somehow there would no one apply except those of immoral character or of intemperate habits, and I would have none such. Well, it ran on in this way until the last of March, and as April 1st was about here, I had given up all hope of leasing it to the proper parties, when in the afternoon of March 31, there came a poor, weakly, delicate-looking lady, with a sad, but honest and intelligent-looking countenance, and said that she must move her goods out of the house in which she then lived by noon the next day. I was not at home when she called, but my wife told her she could have our rooms, doing this under inspiration, as she never before did such a thing without first consulting me.

I left off my work the next day, procured a team, and assisted her in moving. After a few days we asked her to sit in our circle.

"Certainly," she said; "I am a Spiritualist, and a medium."

She was controlled the first evening she sat with us; but we soon observed that she was obsessed by a Catholic priest and a whole band of Jesuit spirits.

Now this priest was cunning. He could assume the role of Martin Luther, St. John the Divine, and many others. Well, we decided at once to have this old chap removed, as he and his band were sapping the very life out of her. We gathered all of our own forces, and sent to an adjoining city for three more mediums, and at the first sitting this priest came with a long lying message through her, and as soon as he had finished, we began telling him who and what he was, and then commanded him to "come out of this medium."

Then began a struggle and scuffle. He fought like a demon; but we, with the aid of our bands of Indians, and the Supreme Powers, made him come out, and his band were all made prisoners in our hands. We enlightened them all, and the next day this priest controlled this same medium and confessed that he had been in this medium's "aura" for several months, and that they were going to gradually undermine her physical frame, or, in other words, kill her, and then cause her two little girls to be placed in a convent.

From that time on this medium began to improve in health and in mediumship, and in a few weeks was sufficiently developed to receive the Catholic spirits and have us enlighten them. This priest whom we removed was Father de Francis, who was years ago pastor of a Catholic church in Rochester, N. Y.

In a short time after this we were informed by Samuel H. Hoar, who was President Lincoln's first attorney-general, and also by James G. Blaine, Senator Stanford and others, that as we had progressed to the Supreme Degree, they would withdraw for a short time, and that others would take their place and prepare us for receiving our "Supreme Guides."

Well, in a day or so there came two, Lyman Beecher and Samuel Bowles. They put us through a series of instructions several times a day, and also at night, how to "vibrate." We would form in a circle, standing, then catch hands and swing our hands and arms back and forth, "vibrating" like the pendulum of a clock, and also keep time with our feet to the same vibration; in fact our whole bodies vibrated. Then at a given signal we would throw up both hands and all clap them at once. This, they (the guides) said, was done so as to give the Gods or God-guides a chance to come in.

Now, gentle reader, don't bulge out your eyes at these latter expressions, for you will hear a great deal about these "God-guides" before we get through.

After a few weeks of this training by Beecher and Bowles they seemingly withdrew.

In a day or two my wife was controlled while doing her morning housework. She was not entranced, but spoke in a very loud full voice for several minutes. Her eyes seemed to bulge out and flash in a manner different than we had ever seen before. This unusual loud talk soon brought the other medium (Mrs. B.) from the other part of the house. She was astonished to see my wife controlled, as she had never been entranced, and considered herself only an impressional medium. Well, her control announced himself as "Daniel," and after we questioned him, a few days afterward he said he was "Daniel of old"—yes, the prophet Daniel. Then Mrs. B. was controlled by one who seemed to have great power, as her eyes kept open, but she never winked during his message of about 15 minutes. He announced himself as Elijah, and in a few days she was controlled by Elisha. He said this medium is a "corner stone."

Well, I thought to myself, who is to be my celestial or God-guide? Well, in a short time Senator Hoar announced that King Solomon was my celestial guide and that he (Solomon) wished to make an announcement through me. I made myself passive, and gave what I was inspired to tell.

Now, right here I wish the reader to understand that these old prophets are not Gods; they are archangels. But these Gods or God-angels spoken of before must precede them, and make it possible for them to remain on the earth-plane and do the work through mediums, to bring about the millennium, or reign of universal peace.

Now, the Mrs. B., who lived in the house with us last year, had been parted from her husband by those obsessing influences, and cheated out of her home of ten acres of land in an interior county in the state of New York. She asked these Supreme Guides to restore to her her home and husband. They said it should be done, for her husband was her true "soul-mate." In five or six months from that time, they (the guides) with our aid restored to her the husband, and they now have the matters concerning her home well in hand, and in a very short time she will be living on her home, restored to her by the aid of spirits without resorting to the courts.

These prophets and some of the twelve apostles are with us. Their first work seems to develop a special set of mediums, to capture the cardinals, popes and leading Catholic spirits. Daniel and King Solomon have had their headquarters with us for over a year. We do not have to sit for control, they can take hold of us at any time, of our feet at our work, or at the table while we are dining. They have a "prison pen." The Indians call it the "bull pen," and in the last year our three circles have captured and enlightened two cardinals, seven popes, scores of priests and thousands of the Catholic laity.

And, oh, if you could hear these popes and priests express themselves, using such words as "Oh, the church! the church! the holy church! She must have the power. She must rule this country and the whole world." Some of these have to be kept on the medium for over an hour. The spirits of the nuns and spirits of the babes born in the convents come up before them, and then such words as "Oh, take them away. My God, take them away!" Then when he gets sufficiently humbled, some pope whom we have enlightened will control one of our mediums or myself and talk to him and explain wherein their church is, and has been always wrong. Some of them will believe and go into the light with another pope. Some of them demand that Jesus of Nazareth come and talk with them, and sometimes in a few minutes Jesus of Nazareth will control my wife or another medium and talk—oh! so grand, yet firm. I have seen those popes get down on their knees before Jesus and humbly ask forgiveness; and sometimes I could hear a voice almost audibly: "Every knee shall bow and every tongue confess that Christ is the Lord."

And, now, Mr. Editor, to write in detail all the proceedings of this kind since our circle came in to the Supreme

A Trip to Troy—A Model Crematory—Albany and Utica.

Arriving at 248 N. [illegible] street, Buffalo, from Niagara Falls, about one o'clock a. m., Jan. 29, I found a dispatch from Troy, N. Y., announcing the funeral of Elisha Waters, Saturday 2 p. m. It was his request that I conduct the last rites over his deserted body. Arriving at Albany at 7 p. m., Friday, I was met by the genial presence of E. H. Doty, formerly of Lockport, now in the Comptroller's office in the service of the state, and soon we were at rest in his pleasant home at 33 Elberon Place, where with his son-in-law, Wm. Scott, and his daughter Mary, and Edwin the little sunshine of the household, I found an atmosphere of refinement and social warmth that is so restful and sweet to a weary pilgrim in the service of truth. The hours went swiftly by, laden with love and light, and I am richer in spirit for the visit.

En route to the late home of our beloved Brother Waters, I found Dr. Harry Dalton and his genial companion, whom I knew seven years ago at Lily Dale. He was a victim of the Johnstown flood. As he relates it, he was dug out of the debris, supposed to be dead, and for many hours unconscious. But he came to consciousness while they were washing the sand out of his eyes. He knew nothing of Spiritualism, but when dead to the world of sense, his mother came to him and with joy he recognized her and wanted to go with her to her heavenly home. But she motioned him back, saying, "Not yet, my son. You have a work to do on earth before you can come to my home to stay." The return to physical life was painful.

But since then he has been a Spiritualist. He was, he says, worth sixty thousand dollars when the flood burst upon the town, but when he awoke to consciousness he was homeless and penniless. He has done a good work in Troy as a healer of the sick, and a message bearer from the land of souls. He organized a meeting, hired his hall, paid all expenses, and has conducted meetings with regularity, thus keeping a nucleus for the Spiritualists to rally to, according to their needs, desires and spiritual aspirations.

On Sunday evening, Jan. 31, in company with Brother Doty and his amiable daughter, I visited Brother Dalton's meeting, and heard him and Brother F. P. Edgerton, of Albany, give psychic reading and messages to the apparent pleasure of a very respectable audience; and those addressed usually acknowledged the truth of what was given. It was the first time I had visited a Troy audience in 29 years. From 1872 to 1875 there was a good strong society in Troy, with Benjamin Starbuck, for president; E. F. Rogers, treasurer, and Elisha Waters, secretary. All of them substantial men, and devoted to the cause. With Brother Tibbits I stayed the last month I spoke in the city. His daughters were at the funeral Saturday.

Elisha Waters was one of the handsomest, noblest and best of men that I have known. He was with the Fox girls in 1848-9, and through their mediumship he was convinced of the truth of Spiritualism and has never wavered for a moment in his serene faith, based upon knowledge. He was the inventor of the famous paper boat, which led all others in races thirty years ago. He had apparently, not an enemy in the world, for he was kind, just, and generous to every one. Nevertheless, his boat factory was twice or three times burned, and apparently by a vicious incendiary. Not because of any ill will to Mr. Waters, but through jealousy of his superior boats. These fires practically ruined him financially. But nothing disturbed his serene faith in the All-good, and the "world of sweetness and light" that awaited him. His family did not share his faith, and it is to their credit and honor that they faithfully carried out his wishes by calling a Spiritualist to serve at his funeral, and they seemed anxious to have it all as they knew he desired it to be. They were pleasant and cordial to me, and appeared pleased that I could respond to their call. His wife has been a constant trial, being afflicted with softening of the brain for years, requiring the care of an infant and much more; and he has been devoted and faithful to her needs—watching by her almost constantly day and night. Yet she is in body, apparently well and quite strong. Looking at his silent face in the casket, she could not remember who it was. But the messenger will deliver her from this sad eclipse and lead her out of the chaos to join him in glory.

The crematory where his body was taken, is a private property, and the most elaborate and beautiful that I ever saw. It is free to all denominations for meetings, burial services, etc., whether they cremate or not. If they wish cremation they can have it for the moderate sum of $25. In that charmed seclusion we left the body of our beloved brother as in a hallowed dream of heaven.

Returning to Albany I visited with Brother Noyes and wife, who are located for the season in the Capitol City and liable to remain a year or more. From Albany I made Little Falls, where I met my oldest sister's oldest child whom I had not seen in twenty-five years. I found her ill, with prospect of crossing the great divide ere long. From Little Falls to Utica, where twenty-five years ago I put in a month and was the guest of David Jones, the editor and published of the Olive Branch. Now, after twenty-five years I am in the city that was the home of Roscoe Conkling, and the guest of C. H. Swift, and there is a stir in the embers with prospect of some spiritual work, if this initiatory meeting awakens the interest that is anticipated. Mrs. Swift is a medium and very earnest in her efforts for the cause, being prompted by her spirit guides.

CLAIRVOYANT FINDS MISSING DOCUMENT.

He Astonishes City Hall Officials With an Exhibition of Strange Ability.

The deputies employed in the office of Clerk of Courts Rogers were given an exhibition of clairvoyancy yesterday which they are still talking about but unable to explain.

A Minneapolis clairvoyant, secured for the purpose, went into the file room of the clerk's office and located certain papers which had been misplaced and which it would have been almost impossible to find by any ordinary method.

The missing paper had to do with the estate of William R. Edgerly, and one of the attorneys interested in the case is W. S. Cilley, of Minneapolis. Ten days ago Mr. Cilley came to St. Paul to look over the papers, but they could not be found. After a thorough search the task was abandoned, and Mr. Cilley returned to Minneapolis.

Yesterday the attorney came back to St. Paul, accompanied by a clairvoyant, a man past fifty years of age. The clairvoyant was taken into the vault where the files are kept, and was given the file number of the missing document, together with an outline of the matter it contained. The file number was 86,575, but in giving the number to the clairvoyant the attorney made a mistake and gave the number 85,575.

Finds Wrong Number Has Been Given.

With this number in his mind the clairvoyant began his work. He appeared to go into a trance and became very nervous. After walking rapidly from one part of the file room to another, he approached Attorney Cilley and told him that he had made a mistake, but did not say what the mistake had been.

The attorney declared that he made no mistake, but the clairvoyant was sure that he had, and then it was discovered that the wrong number had been given the man. When the correction had been made the clairvoyant went to work again.

His eyes took on a gloomy appearance and he rushed up and down the file room, where there are more than 90,000 envelopes similar to the one he was in search of.

"It's not here; it's not here; it's up higher," mumbled the mysterious man, as he ran his hand over the file cases in his mad rush up and down the room.

Suddenly he stopped; he reached his hand high above his head and withdrew an envelope.

"Here is your paper," he said confidently.

Chief Clerk Robinson and several of the deputies who witnessed the strange performance, stepped forward and looked at the envelope. Then their faith in the clairvoyant's ability faded. The number on the envelope was 46,133.

"You have made a mistake," said Deputy Gronewald.

"You'll have to try again," suggested Deputy Bazille, and a look of incredulity passed over the faces of all except the clairvoyant.

He Finds the Document.

He opened the envelope, and in the midst of a number of divorce papers he withdrew the lost file, which had nothing whatever to do with the papers in the envelope in which it had been found. The clairvoyant modestly handed the paper to Attorney Cilley and offered no explanation of the apparent superhuman power.

"Mental telepathy," he suggested, but it was argued that it could not be mental telepathy, because no other person knew where the paper was located.

"It was one of the strangest things I ever witnessed," said Maj. Robinson, chief clerk of the office.

"I cannot see how there could be any fake about it," said Deputy Bazille. All agreed that the clairvoyant had performed what they considered a remarkable task, and none attempted to explain how it was done.

In the file room, where the missing paper was found, are almost 100,000 files, each in an envelope, and the envelope in which the missing paper had been placed was one which had no more bearing on the case than had 90,000 other envelopes.

The greatest care is taken in the office to prevent the misplacing of files, and the only explanation that can be offered is that the file was placed in the wrong envelope by some attorney who last referred to it.

Had it not been for the success of the clairvoyant it is probable that the missing file would have been given up for lost, as the envelope in which it was found contained papers in a case already settled, and it might have remained untouched for years.

When asked why he secured the clairvoyant, Attorney Cilley explained that the man had once before, some months ago, told him that his child would live, after the doctors had given up all hope for its recovery. He had also demonstrated his power in other ways, which led the attorney to have some faith in his ability to perform such strange feats.—St. Paul (Minn.) Globe.

SONG OF THE COMET.

["Prof. Kronliff, of Norway, predicts the appearance of a comet of great brilliancy about November of this year, 1904."—Press dispatch.]

I come from the regions of Star dust—
From the Holies of Infinite light,
And I leave a burnished pathway
Gleaming like Radium bright.

I hold the Keys of Wisdom—
The Keys of the Infinite Whole,
And I offer complete Redemption
To every doubting Soul.

I am an Electric Messenger
From the outermost Circle of Space,
And I bring a message of Freedom
To an earth-bound, doubting race.

The message of Law Unchanging—
Of Wisdom's unchanging ways,
The process forever proceeding
In the Mind of the "Ancient of Days."

I salute the Sentinel Arcturus
That stands supreme and alone—
And reflect my light to the Pleiades
That wheel around Alcyone.

I rush onward towards Orion,
The God of the Southern Stars,
And speak the word of Love and Peace
To the fiery planet Mars.

To Earth, in its throes and convulsions—
To Souls struggling up from the Sod—
I give Brotherhood's Hope plain-worded,
And the One-ness and Goodness of God.

Farewell! I go on my mission,
When I call, on my circle again,
May Earth, transmuted and holy,
Be the Peace habitation of Men.

Demoniac Obsession.

A Question That Will Remain at the Front.

While Spiritualists, for the last forty years, have in sweet tones sung the praise of Spiritualism, they have kept in the background, as if screened by a curtain, the lamentable fact that spirits, demoniacal, malicious, or densely ignorant, have at times taken possession of mediums, and wrecked their lives; and while thus afflicted they have had hinted to them by Spiritualists the "bitter consolation" that they are impure, that "like attracts like," and that they alone are responsible for their sad condition. Admitting that statement to be true, then their bad condition is intensified, rendered twofold worse by spirits coming in contact with them, thus committing a very great crime, and aggravating their conditions, making them a hundred per cent worse than they would otherwise be. In whatever light one may view the question, the work of reformation is rendered difficult bv the spirits themselves, who in such acts become criminals of the darkest hue.

Spirit Hypnotism Seen Clairvoyantly.

To the Editor:—In many of the recent articles of our spiritual writers I note the claim that mediumship and psychology, or hypnotism are either wholly beneficent, or injurious.

The spirit editor James M. Finck, of the Reformer and Humanitarian Magazine, Galveston, Texas., having been in the spirit realms the infinite number of twenty years is declaring through its pages that evil spirits are returned as nonentities to the great ocean of universal life, and there is no obsession.

We think it wise to advise this spirit editor to become acquainted with Spirit Samuel Bowles, Aaron Knight, Prof. von Marx and the author of A Wanderer in Spirit Lands and thousands of others who have been investigating for centuries through spirit realms and inform us of existing evil-minded spirits and their abodes; yes, interview the spirit guardians of Dr. J. M. Peebles, of San Diego, Cal., of Dr. G. Lester Lane, of 872 Huntington avenue, Boston, and others who have proven beyond a doubt the fact of obsession, and have relieved many, many persons hypnotized by injurious spirits; read The Seers of the Ages, Immortality, by Dr. Peebles, A Wanderer in Spirit Lands, and then in his mission earthward investigate.

I can travel Chicago's 23 miles and not see a drunken man, nor hear an oath, and yet there are thousands swearing, drinking, drunk. I simply have not investigated existing conditions, but my lack of investigations does not give me the right to declare that no such conditions exist.

I have been clairvoyant but ten years, but have learned that Dame Nature does not snuff out individual existence either good or evil, nor did I have to go to the haunts of sin, or the holy of holies to see them, but in church and hall, on the streets and in homes I have seen both classes.

What a blessing are the true and the good, robed in ethereal white, beaming with love and spirituality, radiant with that higher intelligence, Orientals and Occidentals, bearing peace and harmony, soothing the sorrowing, healing the afflicted, teaching through the various phases of mediumship the truths of a higher, spiritual, happier life, guiding and guarding those of earth life, ever a blessing and a truth, some as companions talking and suggesting to their sensitives, others working independently, only requiring the more material magnetism of a mortal person, as an aid, others psychologizing to full control, while others control from within the brain using the vocal organs independently, the sensitive being fully conscious, which, if remaining too long, according to nature's magnetic law they become unable to leave the atmosphere of the sensitive and grow sad and burdensome.

Yes, I have seen the true and loving spirits striving with will power and philosophic wisdom against those of evil design in the presence of a sensitive of sincere, spiritual aspirations.

I have assisted the higher forces in breaking the hypnotic power of injurious spirits. In one instance I seemed impelled to go to the home of a friend on Lake avenue of this city; on arriving I found the daughter, a fine sensitive, suffering from nervous prostration and great depression. I described to the family the spirit of a relative who in life had attempted their financial ruin, there he was hovering near the daughter, and projecting the most injurious vibrations that he could command. I was told to walk back and forth through the rooms and break his vibrations by sweeping the atmosphere with my hands. In a short time the daughter was as well and joyous as ever, and there is not a purer, nobler young lady anywhere than she, lovely parentage and rearing. The cause lay not in her mediumship, or her character, but in the malicious nature of the obsessing spirit, and without assistance her case could have been most serious.

The wife of an acquaintance, who knew nothing of control, became clairaudient, and thinking that only the good could communicate she gave heed to their advice, and within two days it became necessary to call in a physician and a healer.

While in the home of a friend I met a noble, virtuous young man; I saw a monk control him to repeat poetry, and to give the name of Edgar Allan Poe, as his name; having read a description of Poe and some of his writings, there was no comparing the two; then another, claiming to be Tennyson, spoke through him; finally he passed into a trance condition, becoming cold and white as in death, and an ordinary spirit claiming to be Christ spoke to us, not as the Christ would, but as an impostor, not knowing we were clairvoyant.

I once saw an investigator stretch out his arms so that his form represented a cross, then he remarked, "As this is emblematical of the cross, so was I crucified, I am the Christ."

In looking back of this person I saw two very dark spirits psychologizing him to do and say what he had.

Another party was hypnotized to believe himself greater than the president, and was impelled by unseen forces to go to the station to purchase a ticket to Washington, D. C. The public would have called these persons insane, not seeing the spirit psychologizers.

I would like to mention one other too trustful a sensitive; spirit claiming to be her loved ones, through deception gained control, and only through the removing and restoring powers of Dr. G. Lester Lane's spirit physicians and healers was she saved from paralysis and insanity, and is now serving the spirit world as a medium for human progress.

While traveling on a railway train I glanced down the aisle and coming from the farther end was a most debauched spirit, he was met by higher forces and ejected from the car; another time on entering a car I was attracted to a person I felt sure was a sensitive, and at the same time a spirit force seemed hurled across my forehead like an electric shock and my brain felt grasped as it were; conscious of the source I sent out all the resistive will power I possessed, and the loving voice of my guardians assured me that they would take charge of the offending spirit, while a prayer went out from my soul that the stranger sensitive was also protected. It was a spirit earth-bound, desperate, without a sense of justice, or feeling.

Again when traveling I have seen beautiful spirit children in the laps of their parents, with clinging arms about their necks, and spirit loved ones sitting beside the living, and to me it seems as natural to see both as to see only those the world calls living.

These are truths that an eternity of discussion can not change, but may stimulate to deeper thought and investigation.

Mediumship is a glorious blessing, and not the source or cause of injury to the medium.

Individualized spirit possessed of the evil principles of mankind and the knowledge of hypnotism, asserting those principles and hypnotic power to the injury of mortals, is the one great cause of much human suffering and crime.

Responsibility rests upon every individual knowing these truths; then let us place a helmet of true knowledge about the brain of every developing young sensitive, that he, or she, may as far as possible be self-protective—then only can we be blameless.

BARTON STEWART.

Chicago, Ill.

Something the Whole World Has to Contend With.

To fully test the reliability of the sympathy, and assumed disinterested, lofty spiritual wisdom, of an obsessing religious spirit, I once traveled, back and forth, all the way from Boston to Chicago, and from Massachusetts to Maine, losing time, health, money and sense.

Demoniacal obsession—in my own case—implied the actual existence of an intentionally deceptive, malignant, spiritual entity, capable of actually creating auditory hallucinations; and which hallucinations—in my private opinion—were created by this spiritual entity, solely for the purpose of gratifying a fiercely mad love of power and cruelty.

To make the malignity of the deceit still more horrible, the entity only appealed to the loftiest, the most divine, and altruistic passions of my nature.

Concerning all such and similar experiences, I have come to the following conclusion:

Demoniac obsession, either of the New England traditional, virulent, witchcraft type, or of the modern mediumistic sort, implies the existence in vital phenomena and psychology, of a destructive, dissolutive principle in human nature, and also in all animal and vegetable life.

Obsession is a fact. Every fact demands an explanation. Correct explanations are correct theories; because explanation is the respect which reason pays to facts.

The actual laws relating to demoniacal obsession, must therefore, first be explained, because the explanation of such a vital law is the only rule or key by which man can rationally unlock the combination of the safe of human nature. To try to open the safe in any other way is either to confess yourself a burglar, blunderer or block-head.

It is my duty, therefore, first of all, to point out that the destructive principle implied in demoniac obsession—when operating on its normal plane in vital phenomena—operates according to two laws, considered as subsidiary to the evolution of the medium, and of all animal and vegetable existence.

(a) In the first place the law of destruction or dissolution is the forerunner of the evolution of the medium's own body.

Not only is every white corpuscle of the medium's blood endowed with a vulture-like hunger, actuated by which, it tears to pieces the old decayed cells, but the medium is endowed with disintegrating and poisonous dissolving acids.

Fingers which take the place of claws.

Canine and molar teeth by means of which the medium tears apart, rends asunder, destroys the former forms of and thereby dissolves the old food forms.

The operation of the destructive law within the medium (in this way) being the only condition whereby the lower forms of inanimate matter, of the medium's nutrition can be prepared to be evolved into the blood, and nerve cells of the medium, viz., to eat is to destroy.

In this sense, dissolution is the forerunner of evolution.

The relation of this principle to demoniac obsession, we shall see, when we reach the psychological and spiritual plane.

(b) In the second place the law of destruction or dissolution is the protector or conservator of acquired forms of evolution.

This law is expressed in all animal and vegetable poisons; horns, fangs, quills, beaks, teeth, thorns, stings.

Some organs serving a double purpose, i. e., to get as well as to keep.

As the human body has no set of destructive moral organs related strictly to the moral destructive passions, there has to be a doubling up process, by means of which a morally destructive passion is forced to explain itself through the organ of a lower destructive physical passion.

Thus the organs expressing the tearing of flesh by the passion of hunger, are the same organs which express the imaginary tearing to pices of an idea in a fit of moral anger.

But when any form of dissolutive life force acquires and maintains its ascendancy because of its own love of domination and power, instead of remaining helpfully subservient to the universal law of evolution—and thus loves to destroy for its own sake—that form of life is what we call malignant.

It is this form of the desire for destruction which so often expresses itself in the demoniacal obsessions of modern and traditional life.

The psychological principles animating the destructive spirit, whether excarnate or incarnate (when abnormal or wicked) are the love of domination or power for its own sake—anger, fear and lust; and hence the exquisite pleasure of cruelty.

To say that I am not in a world in which there are thousands of incarnate spirits, animated solely by these cruel destructive psychological elements, is to tell me that I have no nose on my face.

Remember, I have lived forty-seven years.

For you to tell me that countless millions of human and lower destructive spirits have not passed out; and that such spirits were not animated all their lives by the insane love of power, the pleasure of cruelty, anger, fear and lust, is for you to ask me to disregard the testimony of all the earlier ages of the human race, and the records of the carnivora.

Psychologically considered, however, the destructive or dissolutive forces of incarnated or excarnated human nature—when normal—are expressed, first, as the forerunner of the universal passion to produce forms, i. e., as in the creative passions of hunger and sex.

Secondly, the destructive psychological principle is expressed in the universal passion to preserve forms, i. e., as in the passions of anger and fear; the former being the offensive passion of self-preservation, the latter, the defensive. Any form of education, culture, militarism or religion, that has a tendency to simply develop the destructive principle, i. e., as anger, hate or lust, or insane love of power, is simply letting loose at death a horde of excarnate fiends.

Demoniac obsession will always be possible on earth wherever ignorance is stronger than knowledge, and credulity is mightier than the loftiest altruistic science.

As examples of what I will term cases of malignant demoniac obsession, I offer the following:

"A very intelligent man," says Wigan, "had the power of putting his double (demon) before himself. He used to laugh loudly at this double (demon), which would also laugh in return. For a long time this was a subject of amusement to the man; but the final result proved lamentable. By degrees he became convinced that he was being haunted by himself. This (demon) other ego taunted him, worried and mortified him incessantly. In order to put an end to this sad existence he arranged his private affairs, and being loth to begin a new year, on December 31, at midnight, he shot himself in the mouth."

Dr. Ball gives an account of a man who wished to know the profession and habits of his (demon) questioner, and where he lived. But the demon would never consent to give any other information than simply his name.

The demon grew more and more tyrannical, ordering the man "to throw his newspaper, watch and chain into the fire. To take care of a young woman and her child whom he had poisoned, and, eventually to throw himself through the window of a third floor, whence he fell, and was killed upon the pavement below."

SALVARONA.

A CASE OF OBSESSION.

Exhibiting the Unpleasant Character of the Same.

To the Editor:—Taking advantage of your invitation in The Progressive Thinker, to send particulars of obsessions, I will try to give as briefly as I can the case of my sister, which has continued for seven years. She is 39 years old, unmarried and keeping house for myself and father. Eight years ago, September last, we lost a brother through so-called death, and knowing nothing about Spiritualism. The following spring my sister was considerably wrought up over strange rappings in her room at night, which frightened her (not knowing what it is was), and which continued for a week, when she saw her mother clairvoyantly in the room with her, which frightened her more than ever.

Having heard of a lady in our town who was a medium for table-tipping, I made arrangement with her for a sitting, which subsequently gave us an insight into Spiritualism, and we were also informed that my sister was a medium, only lacking development. We were advised to sit for development, which we did for some time together, without much result, when we ceased sitting together, but during this time my sister would continue sitting at a small table for tipping, which she could do by herself, and in the meantime she was getting so sensitive to any influence that would come around her, that she became so nervous and irritable that she was unable to rest at night, or be herself in daytime, until finally she asked me to use my hypnotic influence over her, which I had been told I possessed, to entrance her, which I succeeded in doing. One morning when she became entranced, some influence talked through her to me, claiming to be my brother, but which I later found out was not him.

This was the beginning of seven years of trouble and worry for myself and my aged father, for from that time on she wanted to be alone, did not want me to have anything to do with her in regard to Spiritualism, did not want anyone to come to see her, and for three years I could not prevail on her to leave the house for any purpose. I always declared that after a certain time she would be able to go out again. At last I became desperate and compelled her to leave. She went to Chicago and stayed three days; then came back and went in the country for two weeks, and then returned, being much brighter and better for some time, but soon the environments at home brought the old conditions back again. During those three years she had become clairaudient and clairvoyant, and all the trouble she has caused has been her listening to the influence that controls her, and doing their bidding—said influence bringing SUCH A HATRED AND MALICE TO BEAR UPON HER against me, that she will CURSE ME AND ABUSE ME as well as her father. When we try to reason with her, her reasoning powers are nil, and because I am a Spiritualist, which she disowns and hates, she accuses me of being the cause of all her troubles by bringing other influences home with me to bother her.

Her reason has not flown, for she is rational in everything else, and attends to the household duties all right, but it is certainly unpleasant to be around a person when you can not carry on a conversation, and do not know what minute she will turn on you and curse you for something you do not know anything about. Such have been the conditions in my house for seven years, and the end is not yet, although she is somewhat brighter in the last two weeks, and during this summer she has been going to the grocery store herself, simply because she would not eat anything I bought.

I have tried different ways to break the influence, but have been unable to accomplish anything, as she resists all help whatever. While I know such cases can be helped, yet as long as she fights against it, the case seems hopeless to me. Should there be any way or method brought forward through the discussion of The Great Psychological Crime in your paper, I would eagerly avail myself of it to give it a trial, as I would do most anything to break those influences that control my sister.

Hoping to hear of some good accomplished through your invitation, SOME POOR SOULS RELEASED OUT OF A LITERAL HELL, you will be doing a great work and your reward will be in that geater world to which we all are traveling. JACOB CHRISTIAN.

Litchfield, Ill.

Letter From an Energetic and Capable Missionary.

After being snowed in for some time, I have again dug out and started on my travels, and as it ever seems to be my lot, I have been guided into fields where other spiritual workers have failed to go. This town, Baroda, Mich., which is only about fourteen years old, has many very liberal minds, and they are now ripe for genuine spiritual mediums; none others need apply. I came here a stranger, and they eagerly accepted my proposition to give them a lecture, although I am the first representative of our philosophy to appear among them publicly. At my first lecture they greeted me with an audience of eighty people, and if the roads had not been so bad I am told my audience would have been more than doubled. I was invited to remain and give two more lectures on the following Sunday, Jan. 34. Two better audiences greeted me than I have many times seen on a fair day in cities when prominent spiritual speakers were the attraction. I was persuaded to try once more. I am glad I did, for the weather was fine, and the audiences at both the services, afternoon and evening of Jan. 31, taxed the full capacity of the hall.

There are many little hamlets and villages all over our land where our philosophy and science has not been taught, the people at such places are ready for it. In such places the churches are already established, and they hold services every Sunday. Periodically they take a spurt, and have a protracted meeting, and then relapse into their former sluggish condition. The masses of the people in such places become tired of such repetitions and so the church congregations gradually decline, and something better is wanted.

Just here shows where the work of the Liberalist or Spiritualist commences, especially the Spiritualist. There are many mediums in our cities who are struggling for a scanty living, and are capable of doing our cause great good. In these places where the churches are on the decline the people desire to know of Spiritualism; they become eager listeners, and any person honest, truthful and willing to work for the glorious cause of our departed friends, will be welcomed, royally entertained, and by so doing help to further drive the errors as they have been given during the past centuries, from the minds of the people. I have been doing this for many years. I expect to continue to do it for many years yet. I only want people to call me and I will respond. Please direct for the present, Galeno, Mich.

"KICKING" SOMEWHAT.

SPIRITISM AND SPIRITUALISM, OR PHILOSOPHY AND PHENOMENA.

Spiritualism now having formulated a creed and declared itself a religion, like all its predecessors, proceeds to "throw mud," and its adherents declare themselves holier than their mother Spiritism.

President Barrett is reported to have said: "This convention should declare to the world the religious side of Spiritualism, and place it squarely and reverently upon the basis of scientific theism."

Webster defines theism thus:

"The belief or acknowledgment of the existence of a God."

Were some one to ask Spiritualists what they mean when they say "God," doubtless they could not tell, but like all other believers in the assumption called God, would tell their interrogator that they were impertinent, and say, "I don't choose to cast pearls before swine" (Spiritists). But every intelligent person knows what is meant is that monstrosity of the Bible; and a great many cannot believe in anything of the kind, and so are excommunicated from the Spiritualist church.

One can hardly go to a Spiritualist meeting now without hearing more or less of God and that other myth Jesus, our elder brother, the grandest man and medium that ever lived, etc., and fulsome praise of the Bible. "Why," they say, "I don't see how anyone can claim to be a Spiritualist and not believe the Bible; it is full of Spiritualism."

Well, yes, it is full of accounts of spirit return and communication; but that is Spiritism pure and simple—nothing else.

Others will tell Spiritists that we ought not oppose the Bible, it hurts the cause and keeps people away (and their dimes also), besides there are good things in it.

Yes, it would be hard to put so much in a book without getting a little good in it; but I think I never saw another book that contained so little good or truth to the amount of falsehood and rubbish; and what little good is in it, loses its force by being associated with so much that is bad.

WHY GO TO THE BIBLE FOR GUIDANCE WHEN SO MANY INCOMPARABLY BETTER BOOKS ARE ALL AROUND US?

There is often a bit of good bread in a garbage barrel, but like the good sayings in the Bible, it is tainted by the garbage.

I would rather go to a bakery and get a clean, fresh loaf instead of hunting in a barrel of garbage for a crust; so I would rather go to Paine, Huxley, Spencer, Ingersoll, or some modern philosopher for truth and morals than to the Bible.

Our churches, societies and camp-meeting associations generally send away and import some grand inspirational (?) speakers to entertain us (and they as a rule try harder to entertain than instruct), pay their fare both ways, entertain them while at camp, and pay them usually about $20 a lecture, besides, which is no more than right; they probably earn it. Certainly they do if they use good grammar while entranced and turn their eyes up reverently when speaking of God, and make a good long "invocation" prayer). They will then spend twenty minutes telling what a beautiful place it is, and what nice, smart people Spiritualists are—all inspirational; then twenty minutes more in what they call the philosophy of Spiritualism; thirty more denouncing commercial mediumship, spiritists, phenomena and fraud hunters, and tell how long and hard they have worked for the cause, and now this grand religion is being dragged down by commercial mediums, and mean Spiritists, and how much higher and grander the philosophy is than the phenomena; and they have earned their $20 and board and room and carfare, and lots of flattery.

The commercial mediums pay their own fare to the camp, rent a room or tent, and board themselves. Then each spends an hour giving some bereaved anxious soul a message from loved ones gone before, and makes them happy, and charges—actually charges, a dollar for it.

Now we would like some good Spiritualist to explain why the woman who pays her own expenses and charges one dollar for an honest hour's work, is more of a commercial medium than the trance medium who has all expenses paid, and charges twenty dollars for an hour's work?

In my opinion those trance speakers (?) who are denouncing Spiritists and phenomena hunters are trying to tear the foundation from under their philosophy. Besides their philosophy is often quite contradictory. One inspirational trance speaker will tell one thing of the future, and another quite a different story, as much at variance and as contradictory as their Bible they so love to quote, and defend its vile sayings, contradictions and absurdities by saying it doesn't mean what it says. And since "the powers that be" have declared Spiritualism a religion, I am proud to declare myself only a Spiritist, for I think that the farther any man or nation gets from religion the better off they are.

The more religion, the more illiteracy, cruelty and crime.

In Russia the Christians continue to massacre the Jews.

Christianity has reduced once classic Italy and Spain to a hand organ and a fiddle, and held Mexico to the wooden plow.

In conclusion I wish to say I believe Spiritism and the phenomena is as much superior to any religion (I care not which one—they are all virus from the same old poison—superstition) as truth is above falsehood, as fact is above supposition.

A. SCHOPENHAUER ESSAYS.

Translated by T. B. Saunders. Cloth, 75 cents. "Schopenhauer is one of the few philosophers who can be generally understood without a commentary. All his theories claim to be drawn direct from facts, to be suggested by observation, and to interpret the world as it is; and whatever view he takes, he is constant in his appeal to the experience of common life. This characteristic endows his style with a freshness and vigor which would be difficult to match in the philosophic writing of any country, and impossible in that of Germany."—Translator.

ECHOES OF THE SYMPOSIUM

LYMAN C. HOWE. MRS. FLORENCE HUNTLEY.

The Great Psychological Crime

A Comparison of Views and the Reasons Therefor.

Lyman C. Howe, the veteran Spiritualist Lecturer and Medium, a man well and favorably known as one of the foremost thinkers and writers in our ranks, will Champion the Cause of Truth as reflected in Spiritualism, while Mrs Florence Huntley, the well-known Author and Journalist, will defend all the statements in The Great Psychological Crime, which Mr. Howe will dare to assail, making a series of articles instructive, suggestive and inspiring, and which every Spiritualist should most carefully read.

LYMAN C. HOWE REPLIES TO MRS. FLORENCE HUNTLEY.

My Dear Mrs. Huntley:—

Your last letter got down to business, and makes your position clearer than any of its predecessors, and comparing it with my answer written before I had seen it, shows a correspondence of thought which implies telepathy, or coincidence, in a marked degree. I shall be glad, indeed, if it shall "turn out" that there is not much difference between us; but there seems to be a good deal yet to fix before that can be realized. The one thing that has all the time given the author's definitions almost unlimited scope, and which I have been trying to bring to a definite understanding, is his classification of mediums and their phases. You express the opinion that the mediumship of which Mrs. Longley and Hudson Tuttle write, is NOT MEDIUMSHIP AT ALL! But both of them have acted in the capacity of receivers and transmitters of thought, and messages from spirits, which has had more or less of the quality of CONTROL of their organisms, by the will of their spirit guides. But they have not been made abject slaves to spirit authority; for they have exercised some choice as to when they should be the recipients of messages, and what use they should make of them. But Mrs. Longley has been VOLUNTARILY SUBJECT TO THE WILL AND DICTATION of John Pierpont and John Warren, and as she reports it, has lain in a profound trance, subject to the will of her guides, from two to forty-eight hours at a time. She may call this a "superior condition," and I think it was, but it seems to me it comes within the author's definition of MEDIUMSHIP.

Of the three stages of the mediumistic process, as defined by the author, control of the WILL; the VOLUNTARY POWERS and SENSORY ORGANISM, but very few ever represent them all in any perceptible degree. It was for the purpose of a definite interpretation of the significance of each of these processes separately, and together that I questioned you as to when and where the process began, and how we could determine if it began at all.

Your answer disregarded the questions, and said it was not important to know when it began; that poison is poison, as much before its effects were realized as in advanced stages. My point was that in numerous instances the WILL OF ONE PERSON acts upon the WILL of another to change and mould it, and to ultimate in a change of action, without any knowledge or thought of any hypnotic process by either party.

The will is very closely allied to the voluntary powers, and these to the sensory organism; and it seems to me that in some degree the identical process is active in almost all our relations in life. Hence, if hypnotism and mediumship are so baneful in every stage of development, it seems to me important to know in what way to determine what they are, and how to differentiate them from all other conditions in which one will acts upon another will in all the walks of life. If in your shoe-deal your will and acts were changed by the will of the salesman, was the "poison" in that deleterious to your intellect or your health? In this connection I desire to make plain my thought on the special experience I have referred to, and which you seem to regard as a point against my position. To get the matter before our readers so they may not be misled by my language, I will quote from your letter:

"What is your idea or judgment as to the desirability of such a relation or state of being as that which existed during the period while your voluntary powers were subject to the will of your controls? Do you regard it as a normal relation or state of being? Do you regard it as a desirable relation or state of being to cultivate or encourage? Do you look upon it as a morally healthy and proper relation or state of being which you could recommend to others for their improvement? Do you believe that any person while in a state of such complete subjection to the will of another is himself personally responsible, or morally accountable for what he does during the period of such subjection? Is that the kind of DEPENDENCE to which you refer when you say without qualification or reserve I believe in the ABSOLUTE RESPONSIBILITY OF EVERY HUMAN SOUL, and this not because man is free and independent, but because he IS NOT FREE AND IS ALWAYS DEPENDENT?"

As I have said in another letter, I relized no "subjection to the will of another" in that moment of suspended action. There was no sense of any CONTROL of my WILL, or of my voluntary powers, or my sensory organism. I as, so far as I realized, in full possession of my body and soul. My DESIRE to move, was by some means suspended—perhaps by some subtle action another's will, but the only feeling I was that of TOTAL INDIFFERENCE. There was NO INCENTIVE to

One of the points I have been conding for is that NO VOLUNTARY ACTION EVER TAKES PLACE WITHOUT A MOTIVE, AND MOTIVE IS NOT CREATED BY THE WILL, but rather, CREATES THE WILL. If I were in an easy position resting, and contemplating some light chores that I must attend to, and you should offer me one hundred dollars to remain quiet for twelve hours, you would successfully PARALYZE MY DESIRE TO RISE. The few light chores which had acted as an incentive to effort would at once lose all their influence, and I COULD NOT change my attitude, because I could not DESIRE to. But let the hundred dollar incentive be withdrawn, and the demand of the chores would become active and I should again DESIRE to arise and attend to them. In this case YOUR WILL ACTED UPON MY INTENTIONS by means of the money, just as effectually as if you had hypnotized my will, through my desire in any other way. Would I then be responsible for neglect of the chores? There might be some serious consequences following my neglect, but if I regarded the results of less importance than the money, I should ignore the chores, and TAKE THE CONSEQUENCES. In my experience I was as really responsible as in any other act of my life. But would it be desirable to cultivate such a state? Not as a permanent condition. Nor would I recommend any one to lie on his back continuously. But for a purpose, to demonstrate the possibility of such a suspension of desire, I see no harm in it. I would not recommend any one to cultivate any subjection to another's will, as a permanent condition. PENALTIES ARE BUT CAUSES EMPLOYED TO CHANGE THE MOTIVES THAT IMPEL TO WRONG CONDUCT. Rewards are causes employed to change desires, and control the will, by controlling the motives that actuate it.

In my case there was neither reward nor punishment in view; but simply total indifference, whereas to make an effort, be it ever so slight requires some incentive, however weak. A man that is intoxicated and commits crime is held responsible; but he is no more free and independent than I was during that short moment. There is much more that might be said in this relation but space forbids it here.

I think all of the witnesses I have introduced, or shall introduce, are MEDIUMS within the author's definition. I am quite surprised at your testimony to the effect that of all the mediums you have known there is not one that has not shown evidence of injury, either intellectual, moral, or physical! Whereas in all my knowledge of mediums. I do not recall one that has been injured in any way that mediumship can be held responsible for. I have known of some cases of apparent obsession, in which the medium seemed to suffer, and in those cases there may be injury physical or mental; but I am not sure that it was not due to pre-existing conditions in the medium's organism. But if there is in such cases real permanent injury to the medium, they are a very small per cent of all the mediums I have known. In view of your startling statement it seems the more important to present the testimony of mediums who are competent to testify. Prominent among mediums well and widely known is Maude Lord Drake. Accordingly I addressed a series of questions to her, and I herewith present them with her answers:

Question.—How long have you been conscious of mediumship in your own experience?

Answer.—Have been a medium all my life; actively before the public forty-three years.

Q.—Are you ever entranced?

A.—Yes. Nearly every day of my life and many times a day.

Q.—In the seances for phenomena are you conscious of being in any abnormal condition?

A.—I am in my normal condition in all seances for phenomena.

Q.—How frequently have you been under spirit control?

A.—Would probably average from three to five times a day.

Q.—Have you ever realized injury to your physical health as a consequence of mediumship?

A.—No. I have never realized any injury physically or otherwise. On the contrary it has been the means of giving me perfect health all my life. I use the words perfect health advisedly.

Q.—Have you realized any injury to your intellect as an effect of your mediumship?

A.—No injury whatever. On the contrary it has given me comprehension and insight into all sciences and philosophy, so much so that it has astonished students and scholars in all departments of science. It has strengthened will and increased the power of concentration."

Q.—Has mediumship weakened your memory?

A.—On the contrary it has strengthened memory. Made memory more perfect and accurate, covering many years. It has enabled me to recall names and details after a lapse of twenty years.

Q.—Has mediumship so affected your brain, or mental faculties, as to injure your powers of independent thinking; or weakened your ability to concentrate your mind in any of the affairs of life?

A.—On the contrary I have never received any injury. It has augmented or increased the power of concentration of mind or thought. It has aided me in discussions, in analysis and comparison. (Here Mr. Drake adds: "I will here say, Mr. Howe, that I have never come in contact with one more positive and independent in thought and action, in all the affairs of life, than my wife.—J. S. Drake.")

Q.—Has mediumship ever seemed to weaken your normal faculties in a way to render you incapable of resisting the hypnotic efforts of another's will?

A.—No. There has never been any weakening of normal faculties. I have been able to resist any and all hypnotic efforts of others.

Q.—Have you ever realized any influence from spirits that tended to immorality? If so were they arbitrary, or easily repelled or resisted?

A.—I unhesitatingly say no to these questions. On the contrary I have always received the highest moral advice and been assisted to the highest moral efforts of life by all spirits with whom I have come in contact."

Q.—Have you ever experienced any annoyance from obsessing spirits?

A.—I have never been annoyed by spirits or mortals unless I choose to be.

Q.—Have you known any cases of genuine obsession?

A.—I have known quite a number of cases, and have mentioned several of them in my book.

Q.—Have you known cases of reform of drunkards or other vicious habits in which spirits and mediumship have acted as the reforming agent?

A.—Yes, I have known many, very many cases of reform of drunkards, cigarette, cocaine and morphine habits, and have all my life used all my ability in this line in which I have been assisted by my controls, who have guarded and protected the weak and unfortunate in this respect. I could name hundreds of these cases, some of whom are respected and honorable citizens to-day, both men and women.

Q.—Have you known cases of insanity induced by mediumship?

A.—I have never known any such cases, but on the contrary I have known many of insanity being cured, absolutely by the development of mediumship in such cases.

It should be borne in mind that these testimonials are not selected from a mass of conflicting evidences, but are just as they come to me from the persons addressed, and the average, therefore, must, at least approximately represent the general experience of the most prominent mediums known in Modern Spiritualism in the United States. I do not think any of them are of the class the author calls independent. If mediumship is destructive to health and intellectual life, and paralyzes the brain, it would seem to me it would manifest its baneful effects in the course of forty-three years of continuous daily practice of spirit control. The author's statistics must have been obtained from a different class of mediums, who may have been by heredity and temperament predisposed to insanity, or intellectual debility and a morbid diathesis of body and brain.

Hudson Tuttle advocates culture, and individual effort and co-operation with spirits. Nevertheless HE IS A MEDIUM, and was for several years CONTROLLED to give messages, names, and various tests that convinced skeptics. But instead of being victimized and degraded, he grew in intellectual strength, and his normal condition advanced instead of declining, and he says: "I have grown stronger in will, in memory, in the ability to reason." He has written many volumes of scientific and philosophical value, ranking with the ablest scholars and scientists in the world. His books have been translated into several languages, and quoted by prominent authors in Europe and America; yet he always writes subject to spirit control within the author's definition, I think. But he says: "I believe mediumship in this phase tends alone to strength of character and righteousness." And also: "I have never experienced mental decline, loss of memory or will from the exercise of mediumship." That his health has not suffered from mediumship is evident from the fact that he has been in active service of the cause AS A MEDIUM for fifty years or more, and is able to do a vast amount of work yet, and his pen shows vigor of mind and independence of character as marked as any normal writer.

Dr. Bland reports a wonderful trance in The Progressive Thinker, January 9, and a remarkable result of spirit control in the complete restoration of the medium to vigorous health, from a frail anemic invalidism, and "her friends thought her days on earth were numbered." That trance experience did not injure the health of the medium, but the reverse.

In conclusion I would say that I do not disagree with much that I find in your last letter, and I thoroughly approve the idea of self-culture, and all efforts to develop and perfect a well anced individuality; and MEDIUMSHIP has in many cases effectually aided in such development. With best wishes and sincere regards, I remain,

Cordially yours,

LYMAN C. HOWE.

(The End.)

WHEN I GO.

When I go from this world I have wrought in,
As sometime we all of us do,
To search for the one I have dreamed of,
And life's best essentials renew;
When I see, as my longings have pictured,
That land, with its angels in sight,
And know I have not over-dreamed it,
Words never can tell my delight!

As I think of it now all my being
Withdraws into silence complete;
I harken, up-reach, but am wordless—
The thought is so wondrously sweet!
All doubts will be left with the bygones,
Heaped up with Love's debris below,
And I shall have solved the great problem,
For only to die is to know!

It will not be the grand or the gorgeous,
My soul will be longing for most,
But the calls, and the home-coming welcomes
Of those whom I feared I had lost.
I shall venture a few explanations
Of things which I failed to do here,
And tell them how, during their veiling
From mortals, I oft felt them near.

My feelings will be as dear friends feel,
When living countries apart,
They meet after wearisome travel,
Again face to face, heart to heart.
It will be of the small things, and dear things
My glad soul will hasten to speak;—
A pleasure, a pain, an uplifting,
A hand-clasp, a kiss, a fair cheek.

A vain soul may picture its entrance
Unlike what is given to me;
He may look for his robing, and crowning,
And dream where his plumage will be;
He may fancy some great demonstration
To usher his soul to its place,
And a seat near enough to the Throne Hill
To look in God's glorious face.

But I shall expect to behold Him
In marvelous beauties, and sweet;
Elaborate landscapes of heaven,
Which mortal words paint incomplete,
The asphodels speak His existence,
The roses and lilies His touch;
The amethyst hills, bright with angels,
O! Earth has slight semblance of such!

Leastwise, that is what I am dreaming,
The while I have life in the flesh,
And work at the loom of endeavor
Brocading bright blooms in life's mesh.
I wonder, and wonder, and wonder
What lies in the mist-hung Beyond;
But, I think, to our infinite longing
An Infinite God will respond.

Certain Aspects of Spiritualism

Spiritualism, pure and undefiled, brings consolation to thousands. It has brightened the homes of those who have carried to the tomb some one dear to them. It has dried the tears of the mother who has lost her darling child. It has cheered the disconsolate and sorrowing, and made bright the pathway of many who were in the darkness of despair. Pure and undefiled, it is glorious; but when degraded or defiled by mediums, or miserable contemptible fakes, who claim to be controlled by spirits, to advance bogus mining schemes and other questionable speculations, it then loses to a great extent its exalted aspect and sacred character in the estimation of the world at large, and the prestige which only honesty can give, is for a time held in the background.

Unpleasant Features for Spiritualists to Consider.

What Spiritualism Has to Contend With.

Mrs. M. E. Williams has been for many years posing as a materializing medium in New York. While she was in Paris, France, it was demonstrated beyond a shadow of doubt, that spirits there did not materialize in her presence, her elaborate paraphernalia being captured. Her career in France proved to be of no financial injury as she returned to this country, and commenced holding circles, which were well attended, any number of spirits "being recognized" the same as at the materializing circle in this city held by one Clifton, where the spirits were in every case confederates, as now admitted. We have for a long time believed that her methods would become bolder and bolder until an exposure would follow, and such has been the case. As a general rule when spirits advise an investment in stocks, bonds, mining schemes, or any speculation whatever, great trouble and disasters usually follow. Many have been irretrievably ruined by the advice of spirits in matters pertaining to the investment of money, hence we have lately refused to advertise any scheme for money-making if advocated by spirits. It is now common for speculators in mining schemes to employ some one to act as a medium in order to fleece Spiritualists of their hard-earned money. One mining scheme employs a medium who has been indicted, and we may spread her entire record before our readers. Spiritualism has a high and holy calling—TO BRING COMFORT TO THE BEREAVED MOURNER, TO GIVE CONSOLATION TO THOSE LEFT BEHIND when death enters the home, and to redeem the world from sectarian bigotry and ignorance. In that direction it has done an IMMENSE AMOUNT OF GOOD.

Mrs. M. E. Williams' Materializing Circles in New York City.

MRS. M. E. WILLIAMS' CAREER—AN UNFORTUNATE EPISODE IN CONNECTION WITH HER LIFE, AFTER A SERIES OF INVESTIGATIONS THAT HAVE EXTENDED OVER SEVERAL MONTHS—SPIRITS SELLING STOCK—LIVE MEN MATERIALIZED AT THE SHOW IN LARGE NUMBERS—TIPS CONVEYED BY PROF. HALL, WHICH WERE REGARDED AS EXTRAORDINARY TESTS—THE "GRAND CIRCLE" TO COMPRISE SUCH MEN AS DR. I. K. FUNK, AND OTHER MEN OF EQUALLY HIGH SOCIAL POSITION.

Spiritualism's high priestess in New York, Mrs. M. E. Williams, was last night summoned to appear in Magistrate Pool's court at 2 o'clock to-day to answer to the charge of obtaining money under false pretenses, preferred by Thomas Beet.

The service of the summons last night at her home at No. 162 West Eightieth street, just as Mrs. Williams was about to begin her usual seance performance, was the final action in a series of investigations that have extended over several months, during which time Thomas Beet and I. W. Rourke, of the Greater New York Detective Agency, have been constantly engaged in collecting evidence as to the methods of Mrs. Williams.

Following the charge of obtaining money under false pretenses, it is said, Mr. Beet will prefer a graver charge against Mrs. Williams and those connected with her who have been attempting to sell, through the assistance of the spirits she drags from the cabinet, shares of stock in a company promoted by a member of her household.

This promoter last night sought out Mr. Beet after the service of the summons and pleaded with him to shield him from prosecution or publicity, assuring the detectives that the efforts of Mrs. Williams to procure money from the complainant in the case had been without his sanction or authority.

Spirit Urged Investments.

Mrs. Williams, through the spirits developed within her cabinet, had repeatedly urged Mr. Beet to buy this stock, the spirit of his father having said to him on many occasions that he could not rest quietly in spirit land unless he knew that his son was on the high road to wealth through his son's investment in the company promoted by the Spiritualist and her friends.

The spirit of his father was the only spirit of any person really dead who appeared to Mr. Beet. A number of spirits of persons thought by the Spiritualist to be dead appeared at the seances and joined the father in urging upon the detective such an admirable investment.

In many cases the men whose spirits were called from the cabinet sat beside Mr. Beet in the seance or were met in the flesh by him every day. He did not in any other case meet any person in the materializing seances who had really passed over.

Assisting Mr. Beet were several other members of the Greater New York Detective Agency, among them the superintendent, I. W. Rourke, who was also to invest a large sum in the company promoted by the medium.

Nearly Faints at Summons.

Mrs. Williams, when served with the summons last night, nearly fainted. She reeled against the wall, her knees sank under her, and for several minutes she was unable to speak. Her friend, Mrs. Mason, who conducts the seances for her, was with her at the time, and the two disappeared into the upper part of the house, while twenty-four expectant visitors waited below for the seance to begin.

It was after 9 o'clock before Mrs. Williams was able to enter the seance room and commune with the spirits. Fearing that there were other traps for her, however, she refused to give a materializing seance, and no spirits came from the cabinet. She gave what is known as a "test" seance, the three "controls" of the cabinet, "Mr. Cushman," "Dr. Holland" and "Little Bright Eyes," calling out the reports from the spirit land to those gathered in the room, without appearing in full view.

At the close of the seance, which is about an hour shorter than is usually the case, "Dr. Cushman," from within the cabinet announced that hereafter the methods of the medium would be changed.

"The dear lady has been unable to work to-night as she should," said "Dr. Cushman." "There has been an unkind feeling of opposition in the audience, and this prevented the spirits materializing. Hereafter these seances will be restricted to those who are known to this dear lady, and no strangers will be admitted to these seances."

It was a case of locking the garage door after the automobile had been stolen, however, for during the past few weeks evidence has been collecting not only showing that the spirits of at least twenty-five living persons have been called forth from the cabinet, but that these spirits were engaged in booming the stock of a company whose securities are not listed in the Stock Exchange and which are not as yet accepted as collateral in the banks

Seance Was a Fraud.

That the Spiritualistic seance proper was a trick of the rankest sort was clearly shown by the clever devices of the men in charge, while the method by which the medium procured her information was also discovered.

Chief among those engaged in assisting Mrs. Williams was a tall, thin, ascetic looking man of mincing gait and dainty manner, who styled himself "Professor Hall, of Columbia University." It was through "Professor Hall" that the tips were conveyed to Mrs. Williams by which she made her wonderful tests. Circulating through the audiences gathered in the reception room each night before the seances, he gathered bits of personal gossip, picked up names and connections and otherwise procured material which made it possible for Mrs. Williams to show a wonderful knowledge of the affairs of her clients.

"Professor Hall" also made a practice of continuing his friendships after the seance had closed, and by his trips to a nearby restaurant with the acquaintances he made in the reception room he was enabled to keep in close touch with all Mrs. Williams' clients.

"Professor Hall" was the only really intellectual person who mingled in the affairs of the house of ghosts on West Eightieth street. It was he who talked grandiloquently of the formation of the "Grand Circle" of Spiritualists who were to have begun their work within a week or so in Mrs. Williams' house.

Noted Men Were to Attend.

This "Grand Circle" was to comprise, according to "Professor Hall," such men as Dr. I. K. Funk and other men of equal social position and standing. Andrew Carnegie was also to be brought within the influence of the "Grand Circle," and Bobbie Burns from the cabinet frequently urged that haste be made in getting Mr. Carnegie within the sphere of ghostly influence.

Three men who were seen after the close of the seance last night, who had gone to the place as earnest seekers after knowledge, told a reporter of the American last night that they were convinced that the entire imposture was a crude and coarse bit of deception.

These men—Edward S. Matthewes, of Washington, who has been spending the winter in New York; Dr. H. S. Rawlston, of Syracuse, who has attended a number of seances, and Robert Deane—all stated that they had been quietly investigating the seances at the Williams house for several weeks and that they had developed the fact that fraud was practiced wholesale in the work of the medium who insisted upon having them talk with the spirits of friends and relatives who are not only alive, but very much so.

Live Man's "Spirit" Talks.

The specific charge upon which Mrs. Williams was summoned to court was that of obtaining money under false pretenses from Thomas Beet, in charging him $5 for a private seance, at which he was put in communication with Charles Graham, a man working in the same office with him. The spirit of Graham also urged Beet to invest all his money in the company of Mrs. Williams.

Mr. Beet was to be made managing director of the company after he invested $25,000 in it. This money was to have been invested last week.—New York American, Feb. 8, 1904.

Can Telepathy Explain?

Results of Psychical Research.

By Minot J. Savage.

Dr. Savage, in this book of 243 pages, discusses problems that have vexed intelligent minds probably to a greater extent than any others, saving those of the religious life. He states a great number of well-authenticated instances of spiritist revelation or communication. His discussion is frank and fearless, and merits the widest reading, for he deals with facts and experiences. Price, cloth, $1.00.

THE LIFE RADIANT.

BY LILLIAN WHITING.—In this book Miss Whiting aims to portray a practical ideal for daily living that shall embody the sweetness and exaltations and faith that lend enchantment to life. It is, in a measure, a logical sequence of "The World Beautiful," leading into still diviner harmonies. It is calculated to render the soul in harmony with the universe. It is truly an inspiration. Price, cloth, $1.00.

"AS IT IS TO BE."

A VERY SUGGESTIVE WORK.

It Beams With Spiritual Truths.

This is a beautiful book, by Cora Lynn Daniels, and it scintillates with grand spiritual thought. An idea of this work can be obtained by reading the titles of a few of the chapters therein:

The Process of Dying; Light and Spirit; The Law of Attraction; Senses of the Spirit; What Is Unconscious Will; Fear; Astrology; The God-Soul of Man; The Drama; A Day in Heaven. Price $1. For sale at this office.

Discovery of a Lost Trail

BY CHARLES B. NEWCOMB,

Author of "All's Right with the World." Cloth 270 pages. Mr. Newcomb made a distinct success with "All's Right with the World," which continues in the front rank of the Metaphysical books that are now so popular. The great number who have been cheered and strengthened by him will welcome another book by the wise teacher whose words of help are doing so much to make the world better by making men and women better able to understand and enjoy it.

"Discovery of a Lost Trail"

Is a simple study of that strange and beautiful thing called life, but grand in its scholarly simplicity. It will be in demand by many who have not previously read metaphysical writings. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

ANTIQUITY UNVEILED.

The most important revelations concerning the true origin of Christianity. Reader, in bringing to your notice "Antiquity Unveiled," it is with the sincere hope that you are earnestly looking for the truth, regardless of any other consideration. THE SOUL OF THINGS;

Or Psychometric Researches and Discoveries. By Wm. and Elizabeth M. F. Denton. A marvelous work. Though concise as a text book it is as fascinating as a work of fiction. The reader will be amazed to see the curious facts here combined in support of this power of the human mind, which will resolve a thousand doubts and difficulties, make geology plain as day, and throw light on all subjects now obscured by time. Price, $1.50. In three volumes, cloth bound, $1.50 each. Postage, 10c per copy.

BODY AND SOUL.

BY CLEGG WRIGHT.

This volume consists of a course of lectures delivered in the trance state, and is certainly no small contribution to the study of the soul. It is a good work to open the eyes to the difference between the deductive and inductive process of mind. Bound in cloth, $1. For sale at this office.

The Religion of Spiritualism.

Its Phenomena and Philosophy. By the Rev. Samuel Watson. This work was written by a modern Savior, a grand and noble man. Price, $1.00. A valuable book for the money.

GREAT INDUCEMENTS! NEVER BEFORE OFFERED BY ONE PAPER.

OUR PREMIUMS.

BEAR IN MIND.

Remember, please, that we send many of our Premium Books by express. If you do not receive your order promptly by mail, inquire at the express office. If not there, notify us at once.

Remember, please that it costs ten cents to get a personal check cashed at a bank in Chicago. If you send a personal check, add ten cents to the amount sent.

Remember, please, that we have only two books which we send out now for 25 cents each. We cannot allow you to select any other book or books in their place.

Remember, please, that you are not entitled to any of these Premium Books unless you send in with your order a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker.

Remember, please, that the safest way to make a remittance is to secure a postal order.

Read our Premium Offer, AND DO NOT WRITE TO US FOR ANY OTHER TERMS. You must send $1 for The Progressive Thinker when you order one or more premium books. Please bear this in mind.

Remember, please, that mistakes and trouble may be avoided by dealing direct with this office, instead of through a news agent.

Every person who sends in a yearly subscription to The Progressive Thinker can have until further notice, the two following books for 25 cents each: "The Religion of Man and Ethics of Science," by Hudson Tuttle, and "Seers of the Ages, or, Spiritualism Past and Present," by Dr. J. M. Peebles. Both exceedingly valuable, and though widely different, each one fills an exceedingly important niche in the literature of Spiritualism.

If you order only one book, and that one neither of the books mentioned above, the price is 50 cents.

If you order two books, and neither of them the above mentioned, the price is 90 cents.

We have TEN Premium Books only and you can select from them as follows:

Any three of the ten Premium Books you may order, price $1.10.

Any four of the ten Premium Books you may order, price $1.50.

Any five of the ten Premium Books you may order, price $1.80.

Any six of the ten Premium Books you may order, price $2.10.

Any seven of the ten Premium Books you may order, price $2.35.

Any nine of the ten Premium Books you may order, price $2.90.

Lastly all of these TEN valuable Premium Books here announced are sent out, all postage prepaid, for $3.10 a price never before equaled in this country or Europe. The following is the list:

TEN REMARKABLE BOOKS FOR $3.10.

1—The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World, Vol. 1.
2—The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World, Vol. 2.
3—The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World, Vol. 3.
4—Art Magic, or Mundane, Sub-Mundane and Super-Mundane Spiritism.
5—Ghost Land, Spiritualism, Occultism.
6—The Next World Interviewed.
7—The Occult Life of Jesus.
8—A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands.
9—The Religion of Man and Ethics of Science.
10—Seers of the Ages, or Spiritualism Past and Present.

Read This Carefully Before Remitting.

When you send in your subscription to The Progressive Thinker, carefully look over the books which you desire in this list, and their price, and send for them. They are very valuable. They are intensely interesting. They are elevating in tone and will do you good. In remitting do not fail to enclose a dollar for The Progressive Thinker.

These ten books, substantially and elegantly bound, and printed in the neatest style of the printer's art, will be furnished to our subscribers for $3.10, a price which modern machinery and enterprise has rendered possible in The Progressive Thinker office only. Sending out these books, however, at the prices we do, does not reduce the price of the subscription of the paper, apparently or otherwise, a single cent, for that cannot be afforded for less than one dollar per year, in view of the fact that we publish such a vast amount of reading matter.

In conclusion, bear in mind that the postage on these ten premium books is about ONE DOLLAR, leaving this office only $2.10, illustrating the great bargain you are getting—a bargain the like of which was never known before on this material plane.

CLUBS! CLUBS! CLUBS! CLUBS!

To Clubs of ten or more we offer the following terms to each one: The Progressive Thinker one year, and ONE of the following books, $1.15: "The Religion of Man and Ethics of Science"; "Seers of the Ages, or Spiritualism Past and Present"; "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands"; "The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World," Vol. 3. The one who gets up the Club will be entitled to the paper one year free, and any two of the books he may select among our list of premiums.

The Bible a Divine Scrap Book.

To the ordinary careless class of Bible readers, the presentation made by Prof. Moulton, of Chicago University, speaking to a Boston audience, will seem quite strange if not positively shocking, even verging on blasphemy when applied to the "Holy Bible." Yet to intelligent Bible scholars he presents nothing that has not long been known as fact.

In a lecture before the Twentieth Century Club, Prof. Moulton, who is professor of the literature of the Bible, said:

"The Bible is the worst printed book in the world. It presents the appearance of a divine scrap book, sadly lacking in literary form."

His subject was "The Bible as Literature." He devoted much of his time to pointing out the difference between the literary study of the Bible and its theological or critical study. The literary study, he contended, was essential to a true understanding of the books, yet, owing to special circumstances, this literary study is dangerously neglected.

"Literature," said Prof. Moulton, "is made up of various literary forms, epic, lyric, dramatic poetry, history, philosophy, oratory, and there is a variety of these. Each has its own peculiar, appropriate form of structure, yet the old versions of the Bible, on the contrary, present the book in one monotonous arrangement, numbered in chapters and verses, not distinguishing literary forms and often running counter to them.

"The Bible," he said, "effaces all forms of literary structure, and it presents the appearance not so much of a sacred book of revelations as of a divine scrap book."

After describing Emerson's essays and Shakspeare's plays as having well-defined literary form, Professor Moulton said:

"This brings us to the strange position of the Bible in literature, which is correct enough as regards translation, but which is lacking in literary form. It is the worst printed book in the world. It is well printed as regards type, paper and binding, but in it all literary forms have been destroyed. It prints verse as prose.

"Who is responsible for this? Up to the second century of the Christian era the writings make little or no distinction between speakers in the dialogue, or between paragraph and paragraph, sentence and sentence. Oftentimes the words themselves are run together.

"The present form has been given to the Bible by those in whose custody it has been. First it was the scribes, then the Hebrew rabbis, then the mediaeval doctors, and, lastly, the translators, who, altogether, form what may be called the age of commentators.

"I would speak of them with intense reverence, and we owe them eternal gratitude for their fidelity, but they were not literary men, and all they have given us of form is the Bible in a form of text for comment. At the time of the version under authority of King James, the wisest scholar in England had no idea of verse in the Bible, and the fact was not discovered until a century after the translation.

"The revised version is the first version issued which has presented the Bible as literature, and not as isolated texts. The work was done with a full knowledge of the Bible as literature. Yet the revised version is but a step in the direction of a true literary form."

To every well-informed person, the learned professor's characterization of the Bible as a "scrap book" will appear exactly applicable. The scraps are taken from the records and myths of older peoples, antedating the Hebrew people by vast periods of time, and without any warrant for peculiar sanctity in their original status of place or form. Why these stolen excerpts should possess any special divinity or sanctity that did not attach to them in their earlier and original status, it would puzzle even a Chicago University professor of Bible literature to explain.

Truths That Scintillate.

WEEPS ABOVE ADAM'S GRAVE—THEOLOGY HAS NOT KEPT PACE WITH THE RACE, SAYS REV. FISHER—STRONGLY URGES A BREAKING AWAY FROM THE DEAD BELIEFS.

The following is the sermon of Rev. Ford Fisher, minister of the Franklin Avenue Congregational Church, preached Sunday February 7, at Cleveland, Ohio, on the theme "Dead Theologies."

"Theology is the science of God—always mystical often mythical. Every Christian is necessarily a mystic, though every mystic is not a Christian. Because of this fact miracle has frequently been given precedence to law. Theologies have followed each other as rapidly as the ocean waves, each in their time having their firm believers laughing at the folly of their predecessors as we in turn now do theirs. Many things which we now firmly believe will appear to rising generations monstrous absurdities. Our grandchildren will look with pity or contempt upon the crudeness of our theology on many points where ignorance now sets her bounds to investigation and where speculation has boldly usurped the domain of fact.

"All theology of whatever school, Arminian, Augustinian, Calvinistic or Genevan, not founded on eternal truth shall finally be buried in one common grave with no one to lament or eulogize them. Theology has ever been a laggard in the school of thought—art and jurisprudence and commerce are hundreds of years in advance. The preacher is the only man not permitted to eat of the tree of knowledge. When young men matriculate at certain of our theological seminaries they practically swear, that for the next three years so help them God, they will not intellectually improve. We are compelled to learn the science of theology from the ages in which the science of medicine consisted in bleeding; chemistry was a black art, astronomy was the profession of a faker and electricity the manifestation of the devil or the shakinah of God.

"The human race has grown from infancy to mature manhood, the knowledge of the world has been increased every hour of its history and yet theologians insist that theology is a mummy. The stage coach yielded to the vestibuled limited; the sailing vessel to floating palaces, but theology rakes up the ashes of a dead past and weeps over the grave of Adam.

"In the past fifty years New York has grown from a town of 300,000 to a huge metropolis, the center of 3,000,000 people, the second city in the civilized world. Human slavery has been abolished, and the nation baptized in blood has arisen to a new life. The German empire has been created. The maps of the world made over again, steam and electricity practically applied to travel and the face of the earth transformed. There are no more seas. Liverpool has been brought nearer to New York than San Francisco. The telegraph and telephone has made the world a whispering gallery, and the cylinder printing press universal education a fact, not a dream, while the dynamo has crowned the brow of humanity with a coronet of light. Old things have passed away, but in all this time what changes have occurred in the church? Only one and that stupid, irrational, shameful. They have moved up town, away from the people.

"The result is just what might be expected, the manhood and brain which has made this age the miracle of history treat the average church with contempt. They leave it to the women and children. They regard it as the home of the aged, the infirm, the feeble-minded, the griefs of widowhood, and the kindergarten for children, young and old. Protestantism is the child of reason. She was born from the loins of logic, and by a law of her nature must either go forward or die.

"No aggressive movement has ever been planned without hearing the shrill cry 'Back to the old paths.' Every step of progress toward freedom, life and light has been fought inch by inch with this old enemy of knowledge. This arch-fiend of the human race. It has been my good fortune and rare privilege to have known intimately Prof. Briggs and certainly he is one of the most gentle and Christ-like of men, and yet it is his head that narrow, bigoted ecclesiasticism wants in a charger—why? For the crime of thinking—and worse still daring to give expression to those thoughts.

"Rowland Hill called Wesley a lying apostle, a designing wolf, a dealer in stolen wares and said he was as unprincipled as a rook and as silly as a jackdaw, first pilfering his plumage, and then going proudly forth to display it to a laughing world. Oh, how gladly they would have forged the orthodox iron collar around his neck and choked him to death.

"Tradition, with the hot breath of hell, led the trembling sons and daughters of faith, and free thought, barefooted and blindfolded over burning plowshares, stretched them upon the wheel and rack, tore them limb from limb, sparing not for the groan of age, the cry of motherhood, or the lisp of childhood. With hellish glee they kindled the martyr's fires and danced with joy at the sight of smoke and flame and roasting flesh.

"With unfathomable stupidity these men have arraigned reason and turned the heart of the race against Jesus Christ and his religion. They have assaulted science and set back the progress of the world for generations at a time. Science is the revealer of God in nature, and yet they sought to put out the light of science in the name of God. They stretched Galileo on the rack because he invented the telescope and discovered the laws of God and the heavens.

"They have set the bounds beyond which the mind of man shall not even dare to think, then insist that the very language of human dogmatism that smells of the dust and rubbish of the dark ages shall be considered divine and infallible, sacred because ancient. They take their creed from the age which rejoiced in the burning of witches, the trial and execution of dumb animals, and the public whipping of church bells for heresy."

Warren's Mysterious Mirror.

Strange Faces and Pictures Said to Appear on Its Surface.

Bowdoinham, Me.—The mysterious mirror owned by Robert Warren, whose wife was a Spiritualist, continues to furnish new sensations, as additional shadow pictures are constantly appearing on the surface. The massive head, severe in its sombre profile, remains unchanged in the center of the mirror, the slender hands with fingers pointing downward and the mournful eyes of the woman are still visible, but other faces gleam ghostly white in their company.

"They come and go, come and go all the time," said Mr. Warren. "Often broad stairs appear and the forms of little children toiling up the stairs, ever following the fleeting figure of a girl.

"Some have recognized a face as that of my wife's mother. My dear wife's face has been with me only during the last week.

"One of our children died when he was 8. The child's face that sometimes appears near my wife looks as the little lad looked.

"Since my mirror has possessed these strange powers I have received letters from all over the country concerning its wonderful visions, and people have come from everywhere to see the phenomena.

"My wife's Indiana relatives heard of the mirror through the newspapers, and one lady consulted a noted medium, who said that the pictures were undoubtedly painted by my wife. I am soon to have some family photographs from South Bend, and then I shall compare them with these shadow pictures that flash upon the mirror.

"Almost three months have passed since these faces first visited me. The letters that appear and disappear so swiftly near the upper end of the glass are striving to spell out a message, I am sure.

"The old woods road in the lower corner of the mirror was broadened to a wide thoroughfare that leads to a strange sight: Look closely, and I think you can see the turrets and steeples of a far off city. Sometimes at night I hear strange and awful sounds coming from the mirror, and when I look the faces are all watching me. Then the letters flash and change and the noises grow louder, louder, until it seems that the message must come.

"It is almost ready, I know. My dear wife will send it soon. Would that she could call me now."—New York Sun.

A VERY IMPORTANT CALL HIS MADE.

A GENEROUS OFFER, AND A CALL TO SPIRITUALISTS.

To the Spiritualists at Large:—A generous offer has been made by a prominent Spiritualist in this city to give ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS to the Mediums' Relief Fund of the N. S. A., for the benefit of aged and needy mediums, provided the Spiritualists at large will contribute another Thousand Dollars to the same relief fund by the first of June next. The N. S. A. is now paying out a large monthly sum in pensions to worthy mediums; the calls for aid increase and the fund is constantly being depleted. Let every generous soul who has not already done all possible for this worthy object, kindly send contributions, large or small, to the following address, each will be acknowledged with thanks. The generous man who makes the offer desires to be unnamed to the public.

Orthodoxy at the Confessional.

The extracts from a sermon of Rev. Ford Fisher, an orthodox Congregational divine, delivered before his church in Cleveland, Ohio, show how far the church has drifted toward rational thought, and what a wonderful influence the doctrines of Spiritualism are exerting on all religious organizations. The Rev. Fisher is a popular preacher, and draws a crowded audience. He has something to say and says it well, yet carried to their logical conclusions his arraignment of orthodox dogmas would sweep not only the dogmas but the foundations on which they rest. It is not often The Progressive Thinker finds an orthodox sermon of sufficient value to quote, except for condemnation. When it does find one in contrast with the vapid, common-place of the pulpit declaimer, it gladly gives it mention.

Ingersoll never said anything about theology more scathing than this from the lips of an orthodox minister, who receives praise therefor and is in no fear of being tried for heresy! What would have been his fate twenty-five years ago! How the dead bones would have rattled, and the mummies jumped from their dust-strewn graves and chattered! The Rev. Fisher would have found every Congregational church door closed against him, only twenty-five years ago! "The world do move." It moves exceedingly fast. The heretic of yesterday is orthodox to-day.

"The Romance of Judo. A Story of the Life and Times of the Nazarene and His People." Through the mediumship of Mrs. M. T. Longley. An intensely interesting book. Neatly bound in cloth and gilt. Only 50 cents.

"Meatless Dishes." Very useful. Price 10 cents.

NEVER BEEN EXCELLED.

To the Editor:—I really would not do without the weekly visits of The Progressive Thinker, with its pages always full of interesting matter to the thinker and the Spiritualist. With an experience of more than fifty years in the cause of Spiritualism, I think I know a good paper when I see it. The Progressive Thinker has never been excelled in its field of thought and work. May the years touch you lightly and your faith and zeal increase as you near the gates of dawn.

Freedom Strangled!

The Roman Catholic Octopus In Canada.

The Truth Seeker Not Allowed to Circulate In That Benighted Region.

OF VITAL INTEREST.

About the middle of January the firm which mails the Truth Seeker sent to the post-office for what in the business are known as "returns." Among the large bundle received were the issues of the Truth Seeker for January 2, 9, and 16. Inquiry as to the cause of the paper being held without notification to either mailer or publisher was answered by the statement that the paper was prohibited in Canada. January 19 we received a letter from Postmaster Van Cott, to which we have replied, and to which he has officially rejoined. We give the correspondence to date in full:

"Publishers of The Truth Seeker, 28 Lafayette Place, New York, N. Y.—Gentlemen:—The Post-office Department at Washington is advised by the Canadian Postal Administration that your publication is forbidden circulation in the Canadian mails, and I am directed by the Hon. First Assistant Postmaster-General to bring to your attention the fact that the Canadian authorities have declared the above-named publication to be undeliverable in Canada, and that copies of the same found in the mails in Canada are seized. They are, therefore, 'prohibited articles' and cannot be accepted for transmission to Canada by mail.

"You are hereby notified that any copies addressed to Canada found at this office will be withheld from dispatch and treated as unmailable, and in order to avoid unnecessary expense and labor you are requested to see that no copies addressed to that country are offered for mailing.

"Please acknowledge the receipt of this letter, inclosing your reply in the official envelope herewith, which requires no postage. Very respectfully,

" C. VAN COTT, Postmaster.

"Per E. M. Morgan, Assistant Postmaster."

REPLY.

Office of The Truth Seeker, 28 Lafayette Pl., New York, Jan. 28, 1904.

Mr. C. Van Cott, Postmaster, New York, N. Y.

Dear Sir:—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of yours of the 18th inst., and in response to your request for a reply, would say:

That in 1895 Sir Adolphe Caron, then Postmaster General of Canada, instructed the postmasters of that country to confiscate The Truth Seeker on account of its "blasphemous" character. This was done at the instigation of the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice, as I afterwards learned, was instigated by the officials of the Roman Catholic church, to the policy and theology of which The Truth Seeker is opposed. Mr. Caron was in the habit of using his official position for private ends, as was discovered upon his leaving office. It was charged that in the campaign which resulted in the defeat of his party, he violated the international convention between Canada and the United States by withholding the delivery of public documents. On one occasion a quantity of Congressional literature was held because, as Mr. Caron explained in the House of Commons, it contained "bad speeches." On representations being made from Washington the literature was released, but only after the covering envelopes had been torn open.

I refer to this matter to show you the kind of an official the Postmaster-General who originally issued the order excluding the Truth Seeker was alleged to be.

At the time I endeavored to ascertain which issues of the paper were objected to, and received the following reply from the Postmaster-General's secretary:

"Ottawa, Sept. 14, 1895.

"E. M. Macdonald, Esq.—Sir:—I am directed to acknowledge your letter of the 10th inst., in which you make certain inquiries as to the provisions of the law under which the Postmaster-General has lately decided to exclude The Truth Seeker from the Canadian mails, and I am instructed to reply to your inquiries as follows:

"1. The postoffice act does not define the sense in which the words scurrilous and blasphemous are employed therein. The interpretation of these terms, for the purposes of the act, is left to the Postmaster-General.

"2. The Postmaster-General cannot quote the date of the issue of The Truth Seeker to which his attention was called, nor specify the particular article, or articles, which, at the time, seemed to him more especially open to the charge of scurrility or blasphemy. He had no hesitation, however, in deciding—and his opinion was supported by that of the Minister of Justice—that, on account of the character of its contents, the paper was one which, under the law, ought to be excluded from the mails of this country.

"3. As the postoffice act empowers the Postmaster-General to decide on the character of any publication claiming admission to the mails, there is no appeal from his decision.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"W. D. Le SUEUR."

The Truth Seeker has never been open to the charge of scurrility, and the charge of blasphemy cannot properly lie against it. The Truth Seeker is a journal of Agnosticism, which was and is the philosophy of some of the greatest minds of the past century and of present century.

I do not understand the rule covering prohibited matter to foreign countries to be a law, and there is no Federal statute against blasphemy, and I submit that the officials of this country are exceeding their rightful power in excluding from the mails a journal of Agnosticism, for no other reason than that a public official of another country chose to use his high office to suppress opinions he did not relish.

I then called the attention of one of the most eminent Canadians to the matter, asking him if he could see any reason why my paper should be excluded from Canada. Mr. Goldwin Smith replied as follows:

"The Grange, Toronto, Sept. 30.

"Dear Sir:—You may be sure that you will always find me on the side of perfect freedom of opinion. Beliefs which cannot maintain themselves by arguments in fair lists against all comers, ought not to be maintained at all.

"In the number of The Truth Seeker which you have sent me there is much to which believers in Christianity will object, as they would to many of the utterances of my late friends, Profs. Huxley and Tyndall. But there is nothing, so far as I can see, to justify or excuse the exclusion of your journal from circulation. Yours faithfully,

"GOLDWIN SMITH.

"To E. M. Macdonald, Editor of The Truth Seeker, "New York."

At the same time the New York Sun expressed its opinion of the matter in these words:

"Mr. E. M. Macdonald, editor of The Truth Seeker, a journal of Freethought and reform, invites us to express our opinion on the act of Postmaster-General Caron of Canada in ordering the exclusion of his paper from the mails of the Dominion, on the ground that it is a scurrilous and blasphemous publication.

"We understand that, under the laws of Canada M. Caron possesses the power of determining the question absolutely. If he holds a publication to be blasphemous, that settles it, and the mails are closed to that publication. The only remedy is a change in the government, or a change in the law.

"The Truth Seeker is undoubtedly an honest and candid paper, but it is not adapted to suit a pious Catholic like M. Caron, or a pious Protestant either. It is what is ordinarily described as an Infidel publication. Christianity and the Bible it rejects, criticises, and assails, not we believe with scurrility and blackguardism, though its arguments are often calculated to shock and startle reverential and simple Christian spirits. Its discussions are otherwise like those of Thomas Paine in the days of Washington, or of Abner Kneeland in Boston forty years ago.

"We hold to liberty, and we revolt at the arbitary act of the Canadian Postmaster-General. But if the Canadian people support him, what remedy is there short of a long agitation, with a doubtful conclusion?

"A similar arbitrary act was performed by the Postmaster-General of the United States when he ordered the exclusion of lottery advertisements from the mails. An act of Congress, subsequently enacted, justified the order, though it was held by eminent lawyers to be clearly unconstitutional. But no attempt has been made to repeal the act or to procure the reversal of the order, because the public sentiment is now very strongly against lotteries. In the same way the majority of the Canadian people are likely to support M. Caron in his crusade against Infidel periodicals, because they are or pretend to be Christians, and are willing to silence all criticism by any means the law may put into their hands. Yet if any political passion should become mixed with the controversy, they may adopt a different policy in a hurry; and engage with zeal in promoting and establishing the very liberty which they now condemn and suppress."

The St. Catharines (Ont.) News put the matter in a nutshell:

"One of the boasts of Canada is that it is a land in which civil and religious liberty is enjoyed to the fullest extent. It is an empty boast, however.

"If religious liberty is to be enjoyed, let it be to the full. A man is the guardian of his own conscience, and no one has the right to dictate to him what he shall believe. There are some subscribers in St. Catharines to a paper published in New York called The Truth Seeker. It is devoted to certain lines of thought which may not be orthodox, in the common sense, and particularly so as regards the Roman Catholic church. These subscribers have been informed by the postmaster here that he has received instructions from Postmaster-General Caron at Ottawa, not to deliver their papers. It would be interesting to know on what grounds such action is taken. At the same time there can be found on the shelves of most of the bookstores of Canada any of the works of noted Infidel writers or religious controversalists, and they are freely sold. Some of them are even to be found in the public libraries. Why is a distinction made?"

You will see from these quotations that the matter was one purely of religious prejudice, and I respectfully submit that the United States government should not be drawn into the controversy between The Truth Seeker and the Canadian government. Very few of the postmasters of the towns in Canada to which the Truth Seeker is sent followed the example of the St. Catharines official. Nearly all of them neglected to obey the order of Mr. Caron. The late Robert C. Adams, a prominent resident of Montreal, notified the postmaster of that city that he (Mr. Adams) subscribed to The Truth Seeker, and proposed to continue his subscription, and invited the postmaster to confiscate his copy of The Truth Seeker at the expense of a lawsuit. The postmaster declined, saying the paper was all right, and he did not propose to be a tool to be used by Mr. Caron and his church.

Several attempts have been made to obtain a rescinding of the excluding order, but the church influence against it has proved too strong.

I have answered you at this length and quoted the opinion of others that you may have ample knowledge of the circumstances connected with the so-called suppression of The Truth Seeker in Canada, and that you may see that the statement that it is a case of religious persecution is true. I am quite willing to contend with the Canadian government, but I am too conscientious a citizen to ignore the rulings of our own officials. I therefore ask you to keep hands of.

And further, I do not see that there is any legal necessity for the United States to interfere. In March, 1896, the Washington Post and Evening Star, the New York Tribune, World, and Life were permanently prohibited by the Turkish Porte from entering that country. In June of last year the same government refused to admit a consignment of Bibles because of the word Macedonia by the writer of Thessalonians 1:7,8. A few years ago the same government refused to admit an edition of Moody and Sankey's songbook because it contained the hymn "Onward Christian Soldiers." In Paul's preaching the Turks saw slander upon Macedonia, and in the hymn "Onward Christian Soldier" they scented danger of a Christian invasion.

In the list of prohibited articles to foreign countries in the Postal Guide (pp. 1016-1019) I do not find the above-mentioned publications listed as prohibited to Turkey, and Turkey is a member of the Universal Postal Union as well as Canada. This shows on the face of it that prohibition from our own mails rests with our own officials. I therefore ask you to rescind your order forbidding me the mails to Canada and permit that country alone to soil her hands by religious prescription.

That you may see that there is nothing in The Truth Seeker obnoxious to any law or postal regulation of the United States, I enclose for your inspection a copy of the latest issue. I have subscribers in England, Germany, Scotland, Russia, New Zealand, France, India, Burmah, Australia, British, Danish, and Dutch West Indies; Sweden, Switzerland, China, Honduras, Rhodesia, Holland, Argentine Republic, Paraguay, and Mexico, and no country but Canada has objected to the circulation of The Truth Seeker within its borders.

My subscribers in Canada are writing very strenuous letters upon the failure to receive their papers. I quote one of them that you may see that the situation is understood there:

Moncton, January 23, 1904.

"The Truth Seeker Co.—Gentlemen:—Your paper has not come to hand since January 2 and I have received it so regularly in the past that I am at loss whether to attribute its present failure to a drying of the stream at its source or to its being damned by some meddlesome Canadian bigot. Awaiting enlightenment, I remain, gentlemen, yours truly, A. JUDSON LUTZ."

And I further respectfully submit that to prohibit me from depositing The Truth Seeker for mailing to any place in my country is arbitrary interference with my rights as a citizen of this country. I submit that when the postage has been paid upon The Truth Seeker the postoffice is under contract to carry the paper to Canada and allow the officials of that country to do the proscribing. I do not think our postoffice should do that work for them.

And finally, I make a request for the rescinding of the order for these reasons:

That the exclusion by the Canadian officials is solely upon religious grounds, with which the United States have nothing to do. Our National Government is forbidden by the Constitution to make religious discriminations;

That the Canadian law permits no trial of these cases. No hearing at all is allowed. The arbitrary will of the Postmaster-General is the law;

That The Truth Seeker is a clean, loyal, and useful publication, valued highly by many readers, and its circulation should not be interfered with by the United States government;

That there is published in Toronto a periodical of Agnosticism with which the Canadian government does not interfere;

That The Truth Seeker is in no sense in the same class with the papers at present prohibited in Canada (other than itself);

That The Truth Seeker is not open to the charges of scurrility and blasphemy, and that any allegation that it is must necessarily be by prejudiced persons not scrupulous as to methods of expression. The Truth Seeker, as you may see by the copy inclosed, deals with subjects of vital and universal interest in a serious and philosophical manner;

That to deprive me of my Canadian subscribers is to inflict serious financial loss upon me, and is a virtual confiscation of property without redress;

That the ruling of the Canadian Postmaster-General is unjust and arbitrary, so much so that the postmasters of Canada have ignored it;

That to interfere with a newspaper because of its opinions upon religion is against the spirit of the age, is interference with freedom of thought and of the press, is un-American, unconstitutional, and wrong in itself;

And that it is not obligatory upon you to take cognizance of the complaint of the Canadian authorities.

Very respectfully yours,
E. M. MACDONALD,
Publisher of The Truth Seeker.

The following letter shows the status of the case as we go to press:

"Office of the Postmaster, New York, N. Y. January 29, 1904.

"Mr. E. M. Macdonald, Publisher of The Truth Seeker, 28 Lafayette Place, New Yorak, N. Y.—Dear Sir:—I am in receipt of your communication of the 28th instant, regarding the mailing of copies of the above-named publication to Canada, and will transmit the same to the Hon. First Assistant Postmaster-General for his consideration. Upon receipt of any further information in the matter you will be promptly advised; but in the meantime this office must be governed by the instructions from the official named, which are that copies of the publication cannot be accepted for dispatch to Canada.

"Very respectfully,
"C. VAN COTT, Postmaster.

"Per E. M. Morgan, Assistant Postmaster.

TO OUR FRIENDS.

From information obtained, and which we will make public so soon as we hear from the First Assistant Postmaster-General, we believe that the suppression of The Truth Seeker in Canada is a Roman Catholic attack upon us. Our postoffice is being used to do the dirty work of Canadian Roman Catholic officials. There is no reason why our postal authorities should interfere to suppress The Truth Seeker, and we propose to oppose this attack upon us by Canadian officers to the fullest extent possible. We want to find out why Washington is governed by Ottawa in this matter, and if the Postmaster-General of Canada is Postmaster-General of the United States as well. As soon as a reply to our letter is received from the Hon. Robert J. Wynne, of Pennsylvania, First Assistant Postmaster-General, we shall say a great deal more on this subject.

The loss of our Canadian subscribers will be a serious blow to The Truth Seeker. It means hundreds of dollars to us during a year, and those hundreds of dollars The Truth Seeker cannot spare. Neither can we spare the amount necessary to fight this case, and we therefore ask the assistance of our readers in the United States and our former readers in Canada. We ask for help in this fight, which is bound to be long and expensive, however it is managed. If our friends will assist us we will make a fight for freedom of the press in this country against the Roman Catholic element which is seeking to control this government. Send us subscribers, renewals, orders for books, and such other help as you can. Whether the Roman Catholic church is behind all the other petty persecutions of Liberal journals that have been going on during the past year or so we do not know; but we do know that that infamous church is back of this attack upon The Truth Seeker. We intend to show that church up in its Jesuitical methods in connection with our government. If it can run our postoffice it can run other departments, and the liberty of no citizen is safe. We intend to be heard at Washington. We intend that Congress shall know of this subserviency to Canadian Catholic officials on the part of one of our governmental departments, and we intend to maintain our constitutional right to hold and print any religious opinion we please without regard to what foreign officials may think. We require the help of our readers because to do these things will cost a great deal of money, but it will be money well spent. The forces of repression have been too active during the past year. It is time that the forces of progress should be heard. We must have no religious discrimination by our officials.—Truth Seeker.

INDIANA STATE SPIRITUALISTS CONVENTION.

NEW BOOK.

Psychic Light.

BY MRS. DRAKE.

Important Addition to Our Literature.

Mrs. Maud Lord Drake has a national reputation as a medium. The manifestations given through her mediumship have been most marvelous. She has written a book with this title: "PSYCHIC LIGHT—THE CONTINUITY OF LAW AND LIFE." It is a ponderous volume of 600 pages. It will hold your attention from the beginning to the end. It is chockful of stirring incidents. On another page will be found a review of the work by Prof. Singer. Everybody should read this new contribution to our Spiritualistic literature. Price of this large volume, only $1.50 postpaid.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE BIBLE TELL IT.

JOHN E. REMSBURG'S GREAT WORK

The late R. G. Ingersoll stated in one of his famous lectures on the Bible: "Somebody ought to tell the truth about the Bible." John E. Remsburg, former President of the American Secular Union, has taken this obligation upon himself, and the fruits of his studies on the subject are now published in the shape of nearly 500 pages. The "higher criticism" has already plowed this field over quite deeply, but it has reached the ear of the public only in a fragmentary way, and even at that has found a very reluctant echo in the press. So much the more reason for rejoicing that this comprehensive work, got up in simple and popular language, is all contained in a single synoptically arranged book. The separate chapters of the work appeared in consecutive order in an uninterrupted series of articles in the New York Truth Seeker.

The facts set forth in this book about the Bible, its origin, its compilation, its preservation, its falsehoods, its credibility, and the morality it inculcates, are only partially known to the majority of ministers and priests, and it is earnestly to be desired that well-to-do Freethinkers may take it upon themselves to make energetic propaganda of the modern "higher" elucidation of the Bible by gratuitous distribution of this book to public libraries, or to Messrs. the pastors. The enormous expenditure of time and labor which the author imposed upon himself, the astonishingly low price of the book as compared with the attractive form in which it is gotten up, as well as the unanswerable logic of the composer—he lets the holy book for the most part speak for itself—are indeed worthy of the highest praise.

Ingersoll's desire that somebody should at last tell the whole truth about the Bible has been brilliantly fulfilled. No Freethinker worthy of the name can afford to pass over Remsburg's book in silence. Like Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," may it, let us hope, find admirers and translators in other languages. And again, like Paine's book, may this brilliant work bring to its author the praise of posterity.—Der Freidenker (Milwaukee).

This great work on the Bible by Mr. Remsburg is most valuable—it is an encyclopedia of information in regard to the Bible, and surpasses in importance all other works of the kind now published. It is up-to-date in every particular. Price, $1.25, instead of $1, as stated last week.

"Koradine. By Alice B. Stockham and Lida Holt Talbot." In the form of an entertaining story, it contains lessons which every girl should know. Price, cloth, $1.

"In the World Celestial," by Dr. T. A. Bland. Interesting, instructive and helpful; Spiritually uplifting. Cloth bound; price $1.

"Discovery of a Lost Trail." By Chas. B. Newcomb. Excellent in spiritual suggestiveness. Cloth, $1.50. For sale at this office.

"Just How to Wake the Solar Plexus." By Elizabeth Towne. Valuable for health. Price 25 cents.

"The Kingship of Self-Control." By Wm. George Jordan. It treats of the crimes of the tongue, the Red Tape duty, the supreme charity of the world, the revelation of reserve power, etc. Price 30 cents. For sale at this office.

LIGHT ON THE WAY.

Mrs. Laura B. Payne Discourses Beautifully on an Important Subject.

THE VOICE WITHIN—THE GUIDE-POST OF THE SOUL—EVERY CREATURE CARRIES ITS OWN LIGHT—A HIGHER AND NOBLER STANDARD OF LIVING POINTED OUT.

Mrs. Laura B. Payne Writes Impressively of the Light Within, Pointing Out Its Admirable Qualities, and Presenting Incentives to Lead to a Higher and Better Life.

Many people are actually walking in the dark. They do not know where they want to go nor what they want to do. Their lives are one continual disappointment from the cradle almost to the grave. They sit before the checker-board of existence wondering what move to make, then finally when, after obtaining the advice of all their friends and relations, they do move, and regret it all their lives and wish they had done differently.

"If I had not done this, or if I had done that, my condition in life would have been so much better," we hear them frequently say.

Now I believe that every creature carries its own light (not always allowed to shine). If it be true that the universe is under intelligent direction, then every atom is aglow with intelligence and is aware of its place in the ONE STUPENDOUS WHOLE. It is well known that creatures on the lowest planes of development manifest self-interest, hence the adage, "Self-preservation is the first law of nature."

The lower animals, by what is termed instinct, are always guided aright, but what is instinct? It must be knowledge, the light within. Does it ever fail them? Never, when not interfered with. Truly the great world of animals lying so close about us, and of which we know so little, have a great hold on the All-Knowledge, and are able at any time to make drafts upon Him.

The wild bird never loses its way or misses in its guess of when it is time to migrate. The horse in the desert, dying of thirst is guided unerringly to the green oasis where the cool spring bubbles up.

Then it would seem that since Mother Nature has given to all these a lamp whereby they shall be guided, that man, the very flower and fruit of creation, should not be so forgotten by her as to be left to grope his way in the dark; but some say, "Man is to be guided by reason." Then, if this be true, nature has still been partial to the lower animals, since with the light she has given them, they never err, while man with his dim little light he calls reason, is often left wandering in the darkness, and frantically calling to everyone in reach to come to his rescue.

Reason is the process by which we arrive at conclusions; the correctness of which depend upon right premises. The best logician in the world, if reasoning from a wrong standpoint would arrive at a wrong conclusion. If certain things be true, then as a matter of fact certain other things must be true. For instance, if God created Adam and Eve as the seed of the human race, placed them in the garden of Eden where a snake decoyed them into disobedience, as a result of which disobedience the whole race was damned, then if God, wishing to undo the wrong and save the race, could do so by bringing forward a sacrifice for sin, a redeemer was born, suffered and died as that sacrifice, thus we might have what is set forth in every church in Christendom—the fall, the scheme of redemption, and plan of salvation. But if Adam and Eve were not the origin of the race and the world has been peopled by some other method, then there was no fall, consequently no need of a redeemer, and the whole fabric of what is known as Christianity comes tumbling to the ground, although millions have hugged and are still hugging the stupendous delusion to their breasts.

So it is plain that the main thing to be sought by all reasoners is a correct premise.

In saying this I do not seek to depreciate reason or reasoners, for I would that the whole world were such, but above and beyond what may be termed reason is a sense, the surest of the sure, the highest of the high. It is the inner light or soul sense. Those who depend upon this sense become very much illuminated, so to speak, and seldom lose their way.

It cannot be designated as sight or by any of the five senses, but may be termed the sixth or soul sense. I hold that this sense, or feeling as it is often called is the TRUE LIGHT by which our feet are to be guided, and may be relied on absolutely. It may be said to correspond to instinct in animals, and is as much to be depended upon. It is claimed by many that it fails them, but where it fails is where it is not cultivated by a full reliance on some.

Have you tried it, that something that awakens you from a deep sleep, at a certain hour of the night if you have asked before going to sleep that it would do so; that swift messenger that goes after a forgotten name, date or incident, at your command, and soon returns, bringing it vividly to your conscious mind; that subtle something that whispers warning in case of impending danger, or fills you with a sweet anticipation of coming joy, although you do not know of its coming?

I have said that this sense may be absolutely relied on if recognized and cultivated, but if any law of nature be broken there is no knowing what the result will be, or where it will end; and thus it is with us when we sin against the law that would guide us unerringly, wilfully or ignorantly, putting out our own light, the result is sure to be disastrous.

"Consult the monitor within," was said by one of the wise ones of old, and if all would strictly heed its voice they would certainly never go astray, for it is the voice of God, and the only voice of God any being will ever hear. Those who have forsaken this God are walking in darkness, and their cry of despair is heard as they wander in the wilderness of doubt where the wild beasts of fear fill them with dread and terror.

SUCH ARE SEEN CALLING ON FORTUNE TELLERS AND ANSWERING THE ADVERTISEMENTS OF EVERY FAKE MEDIUM THAT HAPPENS TO COME ALONG, WHILE THE GENUINE MEDIUM MUST SPEND HER TIME AND WASTE HER POWERS IN TRYING TO DIVINE FOR THEM WHAT THEY SHOULD KNOW FOR THEMSELVES.

These are the questions most often put to mediums: Can you tell me what is best for me to do in this case? Shall I make this or that business transaction? If I make this marriage will it be best? For what avocation in life am I best adapted, etc? Now all these should be already answered by the voice within, and the individual who has lot his light shine and has not put it under a bushel, knows far more concerning himself and what he ought to do than any other person could possibly know. But says one, I followed my inclination and went wrong. If you have followed absolutely the light within, you have not gone wrong.

Don't try to cheat yourself into believing you have followed that light if you have not. It is like telling your conscience it has lied.

A lady once said to the writer: "I had two lovers. One was wealthy and moved in the best circles of society, while the other was poor. My friends desired and advised that I should choose the wealthy one, and my whole mind was settled in the belief that that was the proper course to take I married him, and now after years of troubles and heartaches we are separated."

I said to her: "Supposing there had been no money consideration, no thought of policy regarding position, etc., would you still have made the choice you did?"

"No," she said, "I suppose not, for I really loved the other man, but my better judgment told me that for all concerned and for my future good, it would be best to do as I did."

Here is a case, and there are thousands of parallel ones, not only as regards marriage, but everything pertaining to our material existence, where the real voice of the soul was silenced, the light hidden and the results were those naturally following such a course.

The soul-self listens not to hypocrisy; takes no heed of the whining voice of policy, but moves steadily on aiming at the shining mark of its existence mistaken never.

The ego is not created with the body, but cometh from the eternal past, bent upon adjusting itself to its environment, whatever that may be, by overcoming obstacles and consequently every opposing element, and pushing onward up the shining heights of being, gradually becoming more and more the master and less the slave until all things are overcome and he stands in the courts of glory, a king in the domain of his own being, and upon his brow the crown of life.

Being a product of the universal life, and one with it, the soul vibrates as a matter of course in unison with its fixed principles of right; thus it is natural to do right rather than wrong, and every person, contrary to what has been taught by orthodox theology, naturally inclines towards the good.

The physical body, the instrument through which the soul seeks to express itself on the material plane, is normally healthy and would never know pain if there were nothing to throw it out of tune with the universal life, causing disease (dis-ease), and so it is with the soul-self when it has learned to vibrate in harmony with the All Good happiness is the result.

This is why we wince when we knowingly tell a lie, or do that which we inherently know to be wrong. It causes a discord in the music of our being, and sets up vibrations which jar mightily upon the fine sensibilities of the soul. This being the case, it follows that, as we said in the beginning of this article, the light within, the impulse of the true self, is the only unfailing guide to the feet of mortals.

It may seem to all the world that you have made a mistake, that you are traveling the road to destruction, but they do not feel the promptings of that master self within you, nor do they see the shining goal out yonder, still clothed in the grey mists of futurity, but which to the eye within looms fair and bright, each day bringing its splendid proportions into clearer view.

Neither the glitter of gold nor the glamour of worldly position can bribe the oracle within, and when in the chamber of silence at the close of day you sit in the presence of this stern judge who quickly reviews and passes upon your day's work, you may rest assured that the decision given is just. Don't try to fool yourself, or reason yourself, as some say, into any other conclusion.

Learn then, my fellow mortals, to rely upon this unwavering light. It will light you along the dark corridors of your earthly existence as it has lighted every creature that has come into the world. To do so is to rest in the arms of the Infinite, and he who rests thus cannot fall.

Even in the minutest details of life it will guide you, and you will find yourself one with the Father, as he was who taught his disciples to take no thought for the morrow, as each day, if we walk in the light, will meet all the demands made upon it.

Those who have thrown themselves unreservedly upon this power, many of them, have believed that God cared for them, and the poet has expressed the thought in these beautiful lines:

"I know not where His islands lift
Through trackless fields of air,
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond His love and care."

So let us, when in doubt as to our way, consult the Guide Post of the Soul. When tempest-tossed look for the beacon light that shines forever upon the shore of our existence.

The hand that guides the wild bird
Through thrackless fields of air,
To fields in sunny South lands,
With matchless love and care,
I know will lead my footsteps
In paths that are the best—
In the only royal highway
To regions of the blest.

HOW SHORT THE SPACE.

How short the space! How much to do!
How few and brief the days of men!
So much to learn of false and true—
And only three-score years and ten!

So little time to do things well,
So much, so very much to know;
And while we labor in our cell
The years do not forget to go.

So many things that we might learn,
If only time would stay its tide,
And once again our youth return
To keep the shadow from our side.

But, ah! what can not be can not,
We'll do the little that we may,
And in some time-ignoring spot
Perhaps find what we lose to-day.

A CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY.

I have been selling "Non-Alcoholic-Flavoring Powders" for the past six months and have made $815.00. Every family buys three or four boxes. The flavoring powders are better in every respect than the liquid extracts, and are lovely to sell. I do not have to canvass. People send to me for the powders. Any intelligent person can do as well as I and average $80.00 per week. I get my flavoring powders from the California Fruit & Chemical Co., St. Louis, Mo. Write them and they will start you in business. E. C.

DR. CONGER HAS THE FLOOR

And he expresses himself freely as to the Tendencies at the Close of the Old Year, 1903, and the beginning of the New Year, 1904. As the Doctor is hale and hearty as an Octogenarian, he has lost none of his youthful intellectual fire; on the contrary, as age advances his brain capacity increases, and he feels the vibrations of thoughtful minds on the spirit side of life.

The new year just ushered in bids fair to ripen up the new era that is rapidly approaching; it will come upon electric wings and bring a light and power that will uplift humanity.

We are on the threshold of a great change, physically, mentally and spiritually. The past half century has been both revolutionary and evolutionary.

Marvelous progress has been made in all material things and Spiritual expressions.

Modern Spiritualism has rent the veil between the seen and unseen world of humanity, and has found the sheep and goats upon the same plane in the unseen, as in the present visible and material world.

Every scheme and effort possible to be conceived of has been put forth to suppress, blot out and destroy this most far reaching and glorious truth.

Those who live and fatten upon the ignorance and struggles of the subjugated classes are fearful of the plain demonstrated truth that spirits live and communicate.

Spiritualism as an agitator along all ethical lines has occupied a prominent position; it has not built as much as it has sifted and questioned; it has dared to question every dogma, myth, mystery book and form, profane or sacred.

The manifestations of spirits through mediums have been tested by the brightest, clearest minds of this age, and an honest verdict declared; this verdict has been taken up to the highest spiritual courts and sustained.

The experience of Spiritualists during the past forty years has unfolded their lives, opened their spiritual vision to see both sides of all questions.

There is no compromise, excuse or pardon known in universal law, although exact justice ever attends infinite law and spiritual expressions.

Punishment for the transgressor should ever be limited by justice; joy and happiness can only be continuous by right living; right living signifies more than selfish gratification, ambition or notoriety; service is one of the most essential expressions of the unfolded spiritual life; to do something, to labor, to serve, to heal, to lead without the use of the subjugating influence, to serve because your soul cries out and will have expression, is to grow and unfold a strong, healthy spiritual life; there is no other life worth living when comparisons are made; the independent individual life is a life of freedom, a life of loving service without selfish motive.

Spiritualism is a universal expression, freedom is its chief corner-stone; there can be but little growth or progress except upon universal lines; if not all-inclusive it becomes a limitation, a restriction; restrictions and limitations are methods of our waning churches; they can never serve universal Spiritualism.

Without exploiting, limiting and subjugating influences, churches and close communion societies could not exist; they are all beggars, and not in any sense a necessity for the advancement of the truth of Spiritual communion, or a demonstration of continued life. The skepticism of the world at the beginning of the new era, demands a clear positive demonstration of continued life, it's the demonstration that turns the scale and opens the vision to the new life.

Authority, (religious, political and medical) has developed hypnotic conditions so has business. All organizations are results of hypnotic influences. Mesmeric influences and relations existed before Mesmer. Objective and subjective conditions and expressions are common to all nations and people.

The positive and negative temperaments are the hypnotizer and the hypnotized, the subjector and the subject.

Jesus as a medium—inspired teacher—was a dangerous man (not a god); as a Jew he was dangerous—because he let go of the old forms and dogmas of a dead and decaying church—and the story says he was tried, condemned and executed.

His followers (those labeled Christian, christian nations), have continued to execute the old Jewish law upon religious reformers, infidels and skeptics for nearly two thousand years; strange as it may look and seem, quite a number of ambitious assumed leaders of organized Spiritualism are aping the old harlot, the church, and doing their best to induce their followers to lean up against some newly hatched spiritual church for a rest and support; subjugation is the object of those assumed leaders; of course it's the cause that they are so anxious about, but blind, selfish individuals are at the front and rear of all church causes; it's the old old story and I hope so old it may soon be cremated.

At this writing our great city of Chicago is shocked from center to circumference caused by a terrible destruction of life. Chicago has been several times shocked in the past thirty-five years; the conflagration in 1871, the hanging of anarchists in 1886, and the railroad strike in 1894 shocked Chicago, but it was material things, not human life that was the cause, that was most seriously affected, only a few lives were lost, comparatively. The previous shocks were manipulated and in time pronounced to have been of material advantage to the city. But what can be said of this terrible destruction of physical life, of love, of home, of parents, and a wholesale slaughter of children?

Under the old regime it is declared there is nothing impossible with God. In the light of the present spiritual illumination all is order, all expressions in nature or by humanity are normal and legitimate, perfectly in harmony with the cause that produces them.

There are no accidents in our philosophy; our God is infinite in order and execution of what we call law; cause and result are continuous, unchangeable, therefore the theater horror was a legitimate result of infinite law and order, no more an accident than rain and sunshine. The shock is great because of the circumstances, the environments and the large number of human lives involved. Tragedies of a shocking nature occur every day in our large cities. Our steam railways and street conveyances kill and mangle men, women and children daily, about four hundred a year killed and hundreds injured; these every-day slaughters fail to shock the city officials or the people into a realizing sense of the value of life or what life signifies.

Life, health and happiness are on the market bought and sold cheap. The new era now in sight will change things, let us be hopeful, for the so-called dead have only changed their old garments for bright shining robes, they now have spiritual perception, clear hearing and will improve every opportunity to lead us into relations and conditions where our vision and hearing will become so intensified that a guide will be ever present with us. This is only a glimpse, a breath of the new era, and signifies a changed life here on earth which will be no greater in comparison than the occurring changes in the memory of the writer.

Life will be worth living when we are forced into a right and just conception of its value and significance; shocks are in order and will continue and increase; when the seed is sown results must follow.

Revolution will follow our present intense evolutionary condition; belief and faith will be succeeded by knowledge and demonstration; let go, or go under, or go to the rear is the (infinite) order of spiritual and material conditions under the new regime.

In the discussion of "The Great Psychological Crime" we find Spiritualists do not agree; discussion—agitation—open eyes and ears, doors of our mental and spiritual lives; the more we differ the more we grow; growth counts in any world relation or condition.

The independent growing Spiritualist will never be a follower or a subject of the subjugator. The subjugated are born to be led, they do not think, they don't read spiritual papers and magazines and are good subjects for monopoly doctors, orthodox preachers and spiritual missionaries.

In reflecting upon the incidents of the old year and contemplating the possibilities of the new, I desire to be honest, impersonal and true to the past and future. The outlook for the spiritual was never better, but if judged by the external expressions, material conditions, the prospects are neither flattering in a material or spiritual sense; crime is on the increase and has been for fifty years; how are Spiritualists to account for the rapid increase of crime—a fearful increase of suicides—and of a rapid increase of Spiritualism at the same time?

Can we account for the fact in harmony with the eternal law and order of spiritual and material expressions?

Certainly we can; fear has held the subjugated in restraint; Spiritualism has in a measure destroyed fear by destroying an angry god, a roaring devil, a brimstone hell, and a book full of myths, mysteries and dogmas; reaction is the result and freedom from priestly fear and subjugation—spiritual slavery—the cause; there is but little increase of crime among Spiritualists, if any.

If the N. S. A. will now explain how their belief in "Infinite Intelligence," which they profess to believe in and endorse as a primary principle in the N. S. A., effected the Iroqouis Theater horror an Dec. 30, 1903, I feel sure they will confer a favor upon the readers of The Progressive Thinker. Was Infinite Intelligence powerless? Was the Christian and Jewish Gods also dumb?

As we understand language infinite intelligence filled that theater; could said intelligence save any lives? The lives of the many children? If not, why not? Intelligence is an active principle, expression, thought or emotion. Was infinite intelligence limited in desire, power, or conditions? If active as defined, (infinitely active) why were not all those pleasure-seekers saved? If the orthodox God, and the N. S. A. "Infinite Intelligence" are powerless to change, act, or modify in such extremes, what do all the prayers, forms and ceremonies of churches and the N. S. A. societies signify? If belief in infinite intelligence signifies anything, what would be the natural expression in a burning theater filled with women, children and men, mostly women and children? Save them if God, or infinite intelligence has the power.

What is or can be the object of church organizations among Spiritualists? The tendency is in that direction in the N. S. A. organization at this date? Who will respond?

Let us examine; there must be an object, what is it? Is it educational, social, for health, dress reform, freedom for women and children, labor reform, and the greater work of uplifting the race, individualizing every woman, man and child? Giving them character, personality, and independence of thought and action?

Are the old forms of priestcraft of the past, now being suggested and adopted by our assumed leaders, conducive to the best interests of the plain facts of Spiritualism? Do Spiritualists desire to be subjugated by ambitious Spiritual leaders in the future as in the past? Do those leaders recognize the change that is pressing for recognition? Or are they as stolid and blind as the clergy they are aping? Can any organization exist without the subjugating methods and influences? Have the unseen spiritual teachers, or inspiration, ever approved of priestly subjugation in any form? Where do we stand as Spiritualists, as representatives of the one truth now demonstrated; the one truth deep enough, high enough and broad enough to solve the great problem of human life? Did the founder of Christianity favor priestcraft and their subjugating methods, or did he condemn them? Where do the N. S. A. leaders stand, isn't it well to inquire?

If Christianity must be the standard for Spiritualists, why not adopt the teachings of the lord and master as he has been designated? Who is ready for the go-and-sin-no-more doctrine? Why should Spiritualists add anything to a dead and decaying system, known as the Christian church? Does organized Spiritualism desire more hypocrisy, more deception to popularize and damn it in the eyes and sympathy of every individualized independent thinker? Where do we stand and what are the tendencies?

Shocks will increase in frequency until the mighty evolution now on will force a revolution, that will change our political, spiritual, social and business conditions and relations.

The Mosaic law and order of vengeance will pass away, and the go-and-sin-no-more order will gradually take its place. An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth has failed; love and a brotherly recognition will supplant the present criminal law expressions, labeled justice.

It should not be forgotten that in the great and rapid changes from the private limited school system, to our present free schools, that criminal classes are educated as well as the non-criminal, and unless society provides opportunities of labor and business, the criminally inclined will become highway robbers, following the examples of Wall street millionaires. The more intelligent the less fear, and the more fearless the more dangerous. Criminals will multiply until society and business is revolutionized.

The bravest and best soldiers are always the best informed; education destroys fears. Our nation must do more than furnish a technical education; it must limit and restrain the power of money in the hands of the notorious public thieves and robbers.

The air is loaded with vibrations of a marked change in every phase and department of life, if not attuned to catch those vibrations you may stumble. Wireless telegraphy is a practical fact and a human instrument if in tune will be able to read their titles clear to coming events, the shadows will be cast upon the air vibrations. Individual development—growth, independence, character, and fearlessness are essential qualifications for the new era now rapidly approaching. Let go and shake off the packs and spiritual darkness, if you desire a change—the new life.

Spiritualism occupies the front ranks and is the only safe, fearless, universal guide. All is well at the commencement of the new year, and new era with independent Spiritualists.

CLEON B. NICHOLS.

He Allows Anyone to Sit in the Cabinet and Place Their Feet on His Prostrate Body While the Materialized Forms Appear—Just the Man to Capture Mr. Hale's One Thousand Dollars.

Knowing there is a general interest in the phenomena of our philosophy, and the all too frequent cry of "fraud," we wish to give a meager account of a seance held by the only materializing medium who has visited our city, and proven beyond any doubt, the genuineness of the demonstration, in many years.

On Monday evening, Feb. 1, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Louis Duhl, a committee of professional and prominent business men saw him dress himself preparatory to entering the seance room; others investigating the cabinet meanwhile and satisfying themselves there was nothing prepared and no way for trickery to be used.

Upon entering the cabinet, at his personal request, one of the city officials present sat in the cabinet with feet and hands upon him, he lying prostrate upon the floor, during the entire seance.

For two hours forms plainly visible to those present and recognized by those to whom they came, gave proof to doubters and skeptics the undeniable fact that the so-called dead can return.

Strong men wept at the meeting of a mother with her son, for whom she had mourned.

Facts are stubborn things, proving the truth, and we are pleased to give this tribute to our friend and Brother Nichols. LOUISE E. ZIMMERMAN,

"The Commandments Analyzed." By W. H. Bach. The Commandments are not only analyzed, but contrasted with other Bible passages, showing great incongruities. Price 25 cents

Spiritualism That Spiritualizes.

A Lecturette by Hudson Tuttle.

Spiritualism absorbs truth from the Zend Avesta, the bible of those whose sacred fires blazed from the watchtowers of Babylon; it has gathered the inspired passages from the Shastra, read by priests in the rock-hewn temples of the Ganges; it has culled texts from the Book of the Dead, chanted by anointed ones when the pyramids were young, and the lips of Memnon welcomed the sun, Lord of Day, rising from the red vapors of the desert; it has drawn deeply from the Hebrew books, as explained by Levites standing in the parted curtains of the Holy of Holies, and from the recorded words of him at whose birth, it is said shepherds of the Syrian plains heard the angels of heaven sing wondrous carols of joy. It has taken the words of the humble camel-driver whose soul was filled with angel-presence, and by this power rose to the leadership of the Moslem world. It stretches across the ages and embraces all religions. Even the false which is in them all, it takes as stepping stones to higher grounds; essential in the evolution of the truth.

It is all of these and measurelessly more. These are content with belief; content to stand on this side of the door of spirit-life and conjecture is on the other. Spiritualism gives knowledge for belief; opens wide the door and presents a new and boundless field for investigation.

And what are we who dare to claim the title to this exalted name? Immortal spirits for whom this universe was framed; spirits now in these garments of flesh; setting out on an endless evolution, which when this earth fades away, the sun no longer shines in the heavens, and the stars break in dust on the coast line of time, will have only begun.

What are we? Beings capable of understanding all; having infinite possibilities in our organism. How is the mathematician able to compute the size, relations and revolutions of worlds; the place they should occupy; the velocity of their motions; their weight in the balance swung out from their central suns? How can he analyze the substance of stars across abysses of space so vast that light, swiftest messenger of nature, is ten thousand years in traversing? Because the laws of the universe are expressed in his organization. He comprehends the mysteries of life, the wonders of mind, the subtilty of spirit, because he is a spirit in whom every force and element of the physical and spiritual world are blended.

Immortality is not a reward for belief, but our common heritage. There will be no boasting of the accident which made us Methodists, Presbyterians or Agnostics when we reach the heavenly highlands. All pass through the same gate and come to an understanding of what it means to be immortal.

If religion be aspiration for righteousness, then this is the religion of religions. It uplifts our souls from the darksome bogs of fear and doubt, into the pure atmosphere of the highlands of a more perfect life. We are a part of all, affected by all, and our duty is to assist all. As we pass but once this way, we should not let a chance go by of carrying out the principles of this philosophy.

We are instruments which become transmitters or receivers as we receive or send out thought waves. All the forces of the universe, and the thoughts of other minds impinge as on a central vortex. We receive and understand those to which we are attuned. If the chords of our being are made tense by selfishness and passion, they vibrate to corresponding waves in the spirit ether. Thus hate intensifies hate, sensuality is stimulated by sensuality.

If we cultivate our minds in the ways of charity, self-devotion, and the broad and noble fraternity which places the good of others before our own, then we become responsive to all that is uplifting and as harps under the touch of angel hands.

To help ourselves we must help others. We cannot run away from a lagging world; we must carry the world with us. The pain and suffering, the errors and blindness of the world, strike discord on our responsive spirits, nor can we escape, however we may strive, their jarring influence as long as they exist. We cannot so isolate ourselves that the shiverings of the famished, ill-clad, ill-sheltered do not touch us with unrest. We cannot so isolate ourselves that the dark shadows of prison walls do not fall on our innermost spirits.

What are we? To-day incarnate spirits with capabilities for the realization of our most ardent dreams of perfection. The silent warder, Death, is the usher to a new state of existence where the aspirations of this will be attained.

We face two worlds, the physical and the spiritual, and thus every thought and act has a double relation; to the present and the future, and only as they contribute to the perfection of the latter, are they "treasures laid up in heaven."

Spiritualism combines science and philosophy in its explanation of the phenomena of the material and spiritual universe. It is the first and only attempt to place all phenomena, even those of moral consciousness, and spiritual life, under the rule of unchanging law.

Those who accept it must be students and not devotees. Simply to believe that spirit friends return and communicate, does not make a Spiritualist, any more than learning the alphabet makes a scholar. It is a short step in that direction. Can we claim to be Spiritualists while our souls are distracted by discords; our minds shadowed by the black clouds of selfishness; our thoughts distracted by the winds of passion? If angelic perfection be our ideal of excellence, can we be Spiritualists without conforming our lives to that exalted ideal?

We may fail; we may stumble and fall. The man who does not, the perfect man may never be seen in this life, yet is it not an obligation we owe to ourselves and our spirit friends, to make every effort for its attainment?

Oh, Spiritualism, divinely fair and eloquent of speech, you have brought to famished souls the bread of eternal life, and to the thirsty sparkling waters from the fountains of immortality!

You have bound up the broken heart of grief, and restored the lost ones who disappeared in the shadows.

You have made life worth the living, and wreathed the couch of death with immortelles.

You hold aloft the highest ideal and assure us it is attainable by the humblest soul.

You have brought the courts of heaven to earth and shown us the way to eliminate the powers of hell.

You have for the old religion of self-depreciation and of pain, brought the religion of joy. For the rule of miracle, you have given the reign of law.

Man instead of being a "debased worm of the dust," becomes the highest evolutionary product of nature.

You have given us the most exalted views of the conduct of life, and transformed the sepulchre to a glorious archway, leading to immortal life.

A Knife Carried Many Miles by Spirit Power.

Having heretofore been a stern believer and a strong advocate of only hard, cold facts, I now feel it my duty to relate to your readers an incident which recently occurred, and which has proved beyond all doubt that some things are possible which few of us can understand or explain.

Feb. 1, 1904, I left home for a town some five miles east. Before leaving, I placed my knife on a book case in my bed room, at the same time wishing I could carry it with me, but could not as it was so large and unhandy in my pocket.

I remained away from home over night, returning the next day. I stopped a few moments at home, and then started away again—this time for a place 20 miles to the northwest.

I reached my destination at dark, and while working at something where I needed a knife, I thought of my own at home, the first time since leaving it on the book case the day before.

I regretted having left it, and wished sincerely that I had managed to bring it with me. The next thing I knew I found myself working with my knife. I could hardly believe my eyes, but I knew something extraordinary had taken place, for there was my knife, one which on account of its peculiar construction and individual markings, could not be mistaken for another. I felt a queer sensation and looking up, said to my wife: "Well, if this don't beat me. Here is my knife which has come to me all the way from home. This must be a materialization, if there is such a thing," and that is the only possible explanation I can find for such a thing.

My wife only laughed at me as I had always done when others told me of similar circumstances.

When I confidently and earnestly told her there must surely be something in Spiritualism, she thought I was joking or insane. I then saw this mystic knowledge must be fathomed by each one before comprehending in the least.

From this fact I know that my letter will convince no one who does not already believe in these wonderful spiritual things, yet I write in hopes that it may strengthen and encourage those already in the path, and I would be more than pleased to hear from anyone who has had a similar experience of any kind, or who can explain the mystic power which transported my knife 20 miles across the country to me.

DEAFNESS CURED

By No Means Until "ACTINA" Was Discovered.

Ninety-five per cent of all cases of deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The air passages become clogged by catarrhal deposits, stopping the action of the vibratory bones. Until these deposits are removed a cure is impossible. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of aurists or physicians to cure. Ear drums are worse than useless. That there is a scientific cure for deafness and catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of Actina. The vapor current generated in the Actina passes through the Eustachian tubes into the middle ear, removing the catarrhal obstructions as it passes through the tubes, and loosens up the bones (hammer, anvil and stirrup) in the inner ear, making them respond to the slightest vibration of sound. Actina has never failed to cure ringing noises in the head. We have known people troubled with this distressing symptom for years to be completely cured in only three weeks' use of Actina. Actina also cures asthma, bronchitis, sore throat, weak lungs, colds and headache; all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh. Actina is sent on trial postpaid. Write us about your case. We give advice free, and positive proof of cures. A valuable book—Professor Wilson's 100 page Dictionary of Disease, Free. Address New York & London Electric Association, Dep. THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH,

Or the Future Life According to Science. By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French by S. R. Crockee. A very fascinating work. This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author says: "There is a true and respectable idea in Spiritualism," and regards as proved the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of earth." Price, $1.50.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Take due notice that items for this page in order to insure insertion must contain the full name and address of the writer. Otherwise they may be cast into the waste basket.

On Sunday, Feb. 7, Oscar A. Edgerly began a two months' engagement with the First Spiritualist Church of Elmira, N. Y. At present Mr. Edgerly has no engagement for April and May, as he expects to visit England in April. He will be pleased to hear from societies in that part of the country who may desire to employ a trance speaker and test medium. Address during February and March, 313 Columbia street, Elmira, N. Y.

Louise E. Zimmerman writes from Elmira, N. Y.: "The work here is going on with renewed interest. The treat promised us by our sister, Mrs. Clara L. Stewart while here, upon learning that Rev. Oscar A. Edgerly was to succeed her, has already been realized in part, and we are looking forward to a re-awakening and more united effort among our workers through his ministrations. Sunday, Feb. 7, was his first appearance in our city, and he was greeted by good audiences, both afternoon and evening, holding in rapt attention all who were present. Thursday evening is our message meeting services, Sunday being devoted entirely to the philosophy, in response to the request of many friends. May the good work go on, that the two worlds may come more and more closely in touch and humanity become more alive to its blessings by the influx of love from the upper spheres."

Magicians of Old India comprehended, just as well as do modern physicians, that much of the benefit of their treatment lay in the success of their suggestions to their patients that their medicines were all right and would certainly cure. It was not necessary for them to employ drugs in order to effect marvelous cures, any more than do the faith healers of to-day. The fact that the patient believed in the promised cure, helped matters materially, and aided by nature in the way of rest, produced the desired result. Some of their cures were brought about by strange methods. If a man was suffering from a fever, the magician at once gave him an object lesson on the subject of the cure of fevers. Heating an ax until it was red hot, the magician would show it to his patient, then plunge it into a vessel of water, explaining to him that the condition of the ax was similar to his own, burning with fever, that the water cooled and cured the feverish ax, and that to drink this water would as surely cure him. This remedy was combined with mumbling prayers and incantations and was usually very effective. Why? Because the water was really good for the patient, and because he believed.

The fangs of the Roman Catholics are constantly protruding, under various forms, in their efforts to crush the public schools. Here is the latest from the New York Times: "Delegations from forty German Catholic parishes in Greater New York met yesterday afternoon in the basement of St. Nicholas's Church, on Second street, under the auspices of the State Federation of German Catholic Societies, to take action upon the proposed bill of Senator Lewis tooking toward the unification of the state school system. John B. Seitz of the Executive Committee of the Federation opened the meeting, and Andrew Mangold of St. Nicholas Council, Catholic Benevolent Legion, was chairman. The Rev. Father John B. Mayer, pastor, and the Rev. Rudolph Mantel, assistant of St. Nicholas parish, made addresses of welcome, and were followed by Alphonse G. Koelble, chairman of the Law Committee of the American Federation of Catholic Societies, who spoke upon the school question. Mr. Koelble maintained that the Catholics, instead of being opposed to the public school system, favored the schools for the masses, but that as Catholics they believed the public schools are incomplete, inasmuch as they fail to TEACH RELIGION." See what a jumble the Catholics would make, each religious sect clamoring for money to TEACH RELIGION!

G. H. Brooks is now located at No. 204 York street, Buffalo, N. Y. He has March and April still open for engagements with societies. He will respond to calls for funerals and week-night meetings while in Buffalo. Send all telegrams and mail matter to the above number.

We have received two beautiful pieces of music by Mme. H. C. Cayson, president Spiritual Society, Philadelphia, "Angel Mother" and "Five Years Ago." The words are tender and sweet, and the music attractive. Altogether they are of a high spiritual order, and should be welcomed by those desiring such selections.

Lena Wolf, alleged by the police to be a fortune teller and found guilty of being such in the police court, was yesterday discharged by the circuit court, the circuit judges holding that the evidence against her was not sufficient to prove her guilty of the charge. The Wolf case was founght bitterly in police court and was contested up to the circuit court. The defendant was arrested by the police some months ago and charged with being a fortune teller. Her arrest was made in the midst of a very determined, though spasmodic crusade against professional clairvoyants which the police were industriously prosecuting. She was given a hearing in police court, and after a sensational episode caused by her exhibition on the witness stand, the police judge found her guilty. A fine was imposed, but the defendant was determined not to submit to it. The police court case was carried up to the common pleas court on error. The common pleas court affirmed the decision of the lower court. Still the case was not dropped. A petition in error was again filed and the case was eventually heard in the circuit court, where Mrs. Wolf was yesterday vindicated and set at liberty. It is not probable that the state will carry the matter any further. Judge Marvin announced the decision of the court. He said, in brief, that there was nothing in the evidence to show that the plaintiff in error was a fortune teller. The common pleas court was, therefore, reversed.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Mrs. Allie Zuhtand writes from Indianapolis, Ind.: "I have been very busy all this winter in a private way, furthering our grand cause here. For a long time every evening was occupied as well as part of the day, but now I see an opening for more extended labor with societies, and will be glad to hear from any society that may need a speaker and organizer. To those who might wish to know something about me, I would refer to B. F. Schmid, corner Georgia and Missouri streets, president of the First Spiritual Society of this city. My address is No. 1224 N. Senate street."

TAKE NOTICE.

All books advertised in the columns of The Progressive Thinker are for sale at this office. Bear this in mind.

We go to press early Monday morning, hence communications intended for that current issue should reach this office not later than the previous Saturday morning. Bear this in mind.

An interesting and profitable society, Spiritualist Truth Seekers Society, met on the evening of Jan. 26, Terre Haute, Ind., at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Stuckwish, 722 South Seventeenth street. An invitation was extended to all believers and honest investigators of religion and science. The society is of long standing, but of late is being revived. President and teacher, Ida A Griffing; vice-president, Mrs. C. Shumaker; treasurer, Mrs. Rose Stuckwish; secretary, Mrs. Julia Auld; board of trustees, J. S. Neely, Rudolph Stuckwish, Wiley Auld. Deaconess Griffing is not a full-fledged Spiritualist and was chosen president and teacher for her scholarly attainments and for her wonderful power of adaptation, being able to impart so well what she studies. The S. T. S. S. is about the same as Chautauqua Literary Society, and takes up religion and sciences, any study which will unfold and develop character. Any person male or female, wishing to study with the society, may send name and reference as to character to the president, Deaconess Griffing, 609 Poplar street. Subject Tuesday evening is found in Corinthians, "Are Spiritual Gifts Possessed by Humanity?" A course of talks will be given soon on Biblical Spiritualism as found in the pentateuch (first five books of the Bible) by Mrs. Griffing.—Gazette.

Dr. Beverly writes: "The regular monthly party of the Spiritual Science Society, at Lakeside Hall, corner Thirty-first street and Indiana avenue, will be held Saturday evening, Feb. 27. This will be a masquerade Ball, with fine music, many valuable prizes, booths for mediums, palmists and psychics. All are invited to spend a merry time together. These occasions are to bring the people together and get into a better vibration, and lose sight of troubles and sorrows. Next Sunday evening, Mrs. Dr. Viroqua, a real Mohawk Indian princess, will lecture, and Feb. 28, Walter DeVoe will lecture on the Wonders of the Astral World. Mrs. Murtha is still with us and draws a fine class of people who want to know the truth about these wonderful psychic phenomena."

Mrs. A. Sexsmith writes: "The Rising Sun Spiritualist Mission, which meets every Sunday at Star Lodge Hall, 378 So. Western avenue, Chicago, is progressing very nicely. We are taking in new members at every meeting, and now have a membership of nearly 70. The attendance contiues to increase at each meeting, as our speakers and mediums are working hard in demonstrating the philosophy and phenomena of spirit return. Mr. S. T. Warner will be our speaker Sunday evening, Feb. 14, and Dr. Randall on Feb. 21. The finances of the mission are in excellent shape, and will be materially increased by the package party which will be held on Feb. 22, at p. m., at Sister G. W. Greene's home, 770 W. Van Buren street. Special preparations are being made for our mask ball on Saturday, March 19, at our hall. Fifty prizes will be given. The mission members from the president to the last enlisted member, are all good workers for the cause, and are seeing the result of their labors in the increase of membership and in attendance. We always have a number of good mediums at our meetings, also fine singing. Seates are free and all are made welcome.

Virginie Barrett writes: "I served the West Side Church, of Columbus, Ohio, last month, and found a noble band of workers in its officers and members, whose untiring efforts bring forth the best of results and assured success. Mrs. H. J. Webster is an inspirational poet of highest unfoldment, and her loving and kindly personality makes her labors a pleasure and success. May she long remain with us. Mr. H. E. Boestler, its president, is in full sympathy with the church over which he presides with effective results. I will answer calls from societies, to serve on reasonable terms. I would like a few engagements for camps. Address me at 1915 Broadway, Indianapolis, Ind."

W. F. Schumacher writes: "Sunday evening, Feb. 21, Dr. G. B. Warne, president of the I. S. S. A., and Secretary Mrs. Bloom, will be present at the Society Students of Nature, 1565 Milwaukee avenue. The Doctor will will make a public presentment of honor upon this society, of which Mrs. M. Schumacher is pastor. We extend a cordial invitation. Feb. 7, Dr. J. H. Randall gave a most interesting discourse which held the audience spell bound. The Doctor was followed by Sister Stillman and other mediums. A piano solo and song was rendered by Master F. Rasmussen; Master Koniger, The Opened Gates of Heaven. The pastor closed, pronouncing the benediction."

Ella M. Gross writes from Weiser, Idaho: "Although a new subscriber, and over 2,000 miles from Chicago, in my new home, in the banner state of Idaho, your excellent paper has been a most welcome visitor every week, and eagerly read by myself and son. We scarcely realize we have had any winter here, the sun shines so warm and the mountain air is so pure and balmy, the coldest day being but 6 above zero. We have not met many Spiritualists yet, but hope to later on. May The Progressive Thinker continue to prosper until it has the largest circulation of any paper in Chicago."

The Spiritual Research will meet every Thursday evening at 144 South Albany avenue, southeast corner Colorado avenue, beginning at 8 o'clock sharp. All are invited to attend. Good mediums in attendance.

Mrs. L. D. Exerett writes from Milwaukee, Wis.: "William Fitch Ruffle of Chicago, 839 N. Clark street, officiated at 134 Grand avenue, this city, under auspices of the First Golden Rule Spiritualist Society, Sunday afternoon and evening, Feb. 7. An intelligent audience of cultured people was greatly pleased with lecture and tests given from articles laid on the table while Mr. Ruffle absented himself from the hall, returning to take them up one by one, and securing tests for all present, who cared to have articles read. During the afternoon he was surprised by having handed to him a written communication from Mrs. Dr. Dixon of Forty-third street church, Chicago, which spoke in glowing terms of the esteem in which Mr. Ruffle was held in his own city and congratulated Milwaukee upon having secured for the occasion the services of so able a speaker and test medium. He remains here until Wednesday, when upon request he will return to Racine. There he was entertained and held a circle on his way to Milwaukee, to return by request, and will leave in time to take up his usual duties in Chicago on Sunday, Feb. 14."

ALWAYS GIVE YOUR FULL NAME AND ADDRESS WHEN SENDING NOTICES AND COMMUNICATIONS FOR PUBLICATION, OTHERWISE THEY WILL FIND THEIR WAY TO THE WASTE BASKET.

Mrs. Isa A. Cross writes: "Mr. W. C. Wright will lecture for the Hyde Park Occult Society on Sunday, February 21. Services at 7:45 p. m., at 323 East 55th street. Brother Wright is one of our members, and has been giving his attention to magnetic treatment, etc., and I presume he can tell us a great many things which will make us think. Mrs. Kline will give messages as usual. The card party on the 11th was a grand success in every way, both socially and financially. We will have another progressive euchre party on the afternoon of February 23 at the Lowden Club Room, 474 East 55th street, game to begin promptly at 2; so please be on hand a little earlier. Score cards will be 25 cents. Three beautiful hand painted china pieces will be given as prizes. Come and win some of them. Bring a friend and have a good time. There is lots of room."

C. W. Beak writes about what seems to have been a spirit vision: "Several years ago while I was talking in church a vision appeared to me. I went to the Baptist church Sunday-school. My wife was school superintendent. I had been working in the field several Sundays instead of going to church. I knew our church society was weak. I thought I could help, so I learned a piece called 'Beautiful Star,' to recite. I asked the privilege to talk. It was given me. I got about half through my piece. There were perhaps 30 people present, all in the back seats. All at once, without any warning, I saw the church crowded with people just as I had seen years before. All the old members seemed to have come back; every seat was full. They looked just the same as they did in life. Some had been dead several years; others had moved. It looked good to see the old people, and so curious to happen as it did. It broke my speech. I could not go on. I shed tears of joy to see such a beautiful sight. I could not explain the mystery before me. To me it seemed like a dream in broad daylight, with my eyes open and my senses all right."

Other forerunners of more modern methods practiced by the old magicians of India, were the laying on of hands, and massaging the body, always in a downward direction, whereby the magician explained to the patient, he forced the disease down into the ground, a most logical explanation, which could not help but make an impression upon the patient. Then, partly as a result of the massage, partly because of the faith of the sufferer and his unconscious efforts toward recovery, the sickness very often did disappear. But the magicians of India also looked into the future and predicted coming events, always using the same simple and logical way of reasoning. Emile Faguet, a member of the French academy, in a recent article on this subject, tells how the magicians of old India used to utilize superstitions in times of danger. He says: They would watch the flight of birds or eat sacred chic'ens on the eve of a battle, simply because the tendency of human beings in the moment of danger, when it was necessary to make a decision then as nowadays, wanted to relieve the suspense and uncertainty and took recourse to fate, as we to-day shake dice or let a decision depend on the toss of a coin. The magicians of old India also dealt in good luck. Not satisfying with predicting luck, it created it by incantations, by solicitations and prayers to the gods, just as we christians of to-day pray, with the difference only that the prayers of christians are more submissive, more ideal and less egotistic. The magic was half religion, half science. It was rudimentary science, resting upon incomplete and crude observation. It was religion in this, that it presupposed the existence of supernatural beings of a mysterious character and nature whom you tried to appease or combat. It has entered, enters and always will enter as a factor in all religions, even the most ideal.

B. Vaughn writes: "The Christian Spiritual Union Church has removed from Temperance Hall, 330 W. 63rd street, to Becker Hall, on State and Forty-fourth streets; entrance or Forty-fourth street. We have Mrs. Lucille Deloux, who will render the best of music and platform tests; also Mrs. L. J. Vaughn as test medium, and a speaker who is engaged for the society for the season. We expect to make our meetings very interesting."

The Boston Record has the following: "The newest style of New Thought with which Boston women are concerned has to do with vibrations. It is an offshoot of the gospel quite successfully planted by a handsome and fascinating Chicago woman. First they had to learn that 'the inaudible tones which come from evil thoughts are as harmful as those from the spoken word,' that 'love, light and joy come sweetly in the vibrations of the sincere.' Her general theory of practice is somewhat difficult to define, though clear enough to one personally acquainted with the basic principle: 'Prayer and mediation excite at the base of the spinal column a vibratory force of the highest potentiality for the health of the brain cells.' The great adept from Chicago declares that any mind may register its vibrations and communicate with any other mind, wherever located, which sets itself in tune. Possibilities of telepathy great and unplumbed are recognized freely and in 'The Life Radiant,' lately published Lilian Whiting forecasts a time when speech will become obsolete and written communications superfluous, for spirit may call to spirit across any void when man lays hold upon knowledge that he is a creature of the spirit rather than flesh."

H. F. Coates writes: "Sunday evening, Feb. 7, H. F. Arnold lectured for us at Kenwood Hall, his subject was 'Muddy Cups, Living Waters.' A large and appreciative audience greeted him. His subject for Feb. 21 will be 'Development.' All Spiritualists are interested in this subject, so come and listen, and perhaps some thought will be obtained which will be of benefit. Mediums are invited to come to our meetings and take a part. Our afternoon meeting is so well adapted for the bringing out of young mediums that too much encouragement cannot be given to them to attend. Come one, come all; you will be welcome."

Vine H. Hickox writes: "I have been much interested in reading the various opinions of masterly minds on the subject of mediumship, and The Great Psychological Crime. I never saw or read the book, but I got a good idea of the contents by reading the correspondence between Lyman C. Howe and Mrs. Florence Huntley. It seems to me that the author of the book swings the club at the wrong party in this matter. I think that the Great Psychological Crime should rest on the heads of the orthodox ministry of all denominations of the past as well as the present. All liberal-minded people who have come out fearlessly from the orthodox church and laid aside priestcraft as a faith, know it to be a fact that orthdoxy uses a subterfuge to mislead the children of men, and by their clever oratory, they hypnotize and make proselytes of their hearers, through fear of an angry God and endless torment hereafter; this is a great psychological crime! It is true, that the so-called Christian church has moderated wonderfully at the present time. Ever since the advent of Modern Spiritualism people have become more intelligent, and we hear less of the terrible destruction of the sinner after death."

Mrs. Ted Smith has been doing a most excellent work in the cause of Spiritualism at Bemidji, Minn. She is a fearless advocate of the grand truths underlying our cause.

C. J. Barnes goes to Walnut and Mt. Vernon Ill., next. Mr. Barnes has held some very fine trumpet seances while he has been stopping with his sister, Mrs. Hamilton Gill.

Harry J. Moore closed his engagement with the Battle Creek society, Sunday, Feb. 7. He goes to Alliance, Ohio, for the rest of February and the first two Sundays of March Mr. Moore's address for the next four weeks will be 322 W. Main street, Alliance, Ohio.

Charles A. Kiehl writes from Williamsport, Pa.: "Spiritualists of this city have not been very active this winter in presenting the phenomena of Spiritualism. Profitable seances can be held, and we would like to hear from talented mediums, especially those who give trumpet seances. An able public speaker and test medium may secure engagement for the months of March and April. The Williamsport society continues to advance steadily. Its repeated gains encourage our local workers to greater efforts. Letters of inquiry relative to the above will receive prompt attention if address to Chas. A. Kiehl, Williamsport, Pa."

Thos. S. Kizer, of Decatur, Ill., sends a large club of subscribers to this office. Thanks, brother.

Dr. H. E. Ballard writes: "Our church now holds its meetings in Illinois Hall, 35th street, and Indiana avenue, every Sunday afternoon at 3; evening at 8; children's progressive lyceum meets at 2; parents should avail themselves of this great privilege and send their children, that their young minds may be trained to see and understand the truth. Give them the scepter of power, which is knowledge; they will need it to battle with life's conditions. The stepping-stone to gain spiritual knowledge is The Progressive Thinker; if you are not a subscriber lose no time in placing it in the hands of your children. Sunday, Feb. 14, Walter DeVoe, editor of Vitality, will speak for us, this being the second Sunday of the month. We shall give our promised program service, consisting of music, speaking and tests. The Ladies' Auxiliary give their tenth social to-morrow night at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Aitken."

Bibee writes that he would like to have wise spirits inform him in reference to the effects of socialism: "What effect would socialism (as it is outlined by the socialist of to-day) have on this country if it were carried into effect? Will the so-called socialist party here ever carry into effect its political ideas; if so, would they be good or bad?"

Georgia Gladys Cooley writes from Denver, Colo.: "AN APPEAL TO THE SPIRITUALIST—The many friends of Dr. Benson Elliott, of California will no doubt be aroused to sympathy as well as indignation on learning of his arrest for healing the sick, which took place Feb. 11, in the city of Denver, Colo. The doctor was treated badly, and given no opportunity of an impartial defense. The judge on the bench manifested his personal prejudice by several remarks quite unbecoming such a position, among them, 'I believe you a fake.' Our brother was not brought before the judge to have the latter give his private opinions and belief, but as he thought to receive justice, which was not meted out to him, as he was fined fifty dollars. The fine has been paid and the Doctor released from jail. He has taken steps to have the case appealed, but like most of the earnest and honest workers in our cause, he is without funds. Will not the Spiritualists at large and the many whom the doctor has treated often without charge, manifest their interest in his case by sending him any amount they can spare? If we want our cause to grow and Spiritualism to be defended we must stand together in such cases as this for we all know the Doctor has always been a worthy and self sacrificing worker. Address all mail to Dr. Benson Elliott, Room 4, 311 Sixteenth street, Denver, Colo."

Paul S. Gillette writes from Oakland, Cal.: "On January 24, my wife and I went to San Jose to hold a meeting for the Spiritual Union: The society is in quite a progressive condition. The congregation that attended the services was intelligent and appreciative. I delivered an address on 'The Needs of Spiritualists To-day.' Mrs. Gillette followed with tests for about an hour. She gave family relations, the names of the departed with remarkable accuracy, and practical advice of great merit. The president of the Spiritual Union, W. D. J. Hambly, is a very energetic and bright man. It is to his efforts and that of the active local workers that the permanent growth of the Union owes its impetus. Allen Franklin Brown and wife, official organizers of the California State Spiritualists Association, were at San Jose one month, last December, and gave the movement a boost, adding some members as the result of many Sunday and week-day meetings. They have now purchased a ranch near Los Gatos and intend to settle thereon and do occasional spiritual work in spare time. There is a very bright young medium of foreign birth, who has lately made her appearance on the California Spiritual rostrum. I refer to Mrs. Holmes who has lately been doing work at San Jose, and has now gone to Stockton. If she is treated fairly she will make a successful future."

Mrs. Sarah Charles writes from Newport, Ky.: "As I write you at this time for the purpose of renewing my subscription to The Progressive Thinker, I take occasion to send you a short notice of the good work being accomplished by the First Temple Society of Spiritualists in this vicinity. For two months Mr. Oscar A. Edgerly was our speaker. During January in addition to the regular evening service at our Temple in Newport we held afternoon meetings at Douglass Hall, Cincinnati, at which Mr. Edgerly gave the lecture and Mrs. Ella Moloney, a fine medium and a member of our society, gave the spirit messages. Mr. Edgerly and Mrs. Moloney both did excellent work, and fully merited the approbation of the people, which was evidenced by the financial success of the meetings. During the month of January we held several entertainments which proved financially successful, netting us nearly $100. Mr. Edgerly left us with the best wishes of our members, and we hope at some future time to have him with us again."

Martin Burnham writes: "I have been wondering why some medium does not take up the challenge of the $1,000 to produce a genuine spirit body, as it seems to me I have good evidence that it can be done. I will in confirmation of this give a little experience I had one evening in Chicago about two and one-half years ago. I and my grandson went to a seance held by Miss Chenowith. There were eight or ten people present, all strangers to me excepting my grandson. In the course of the evening a voice came from the cabinet, saying: 'There is an old man trying to make up in here.' Soon I was called to the cabinet, and there stood my older brother who passed over about two and a half years before, every feature just as perfect as when I last saw him twelve years before. No one in the room but myself knew anything of him. I was very much surprised as I went up to the cabinet, expecting to see my father. My brother had not even been in my thoughts that evening. I saw several materialized forms that evening, among them my wife, but none quite so perfect as my brother."

"MY KINGDOM FOR A"—MATERIALIZED SPIRIT.

"Now, Mr. Hale, if you want the truth about materialization, come to Washington City, D. C., and you can get it and it won't cost you a thousand dollars. RUFUS SUMERLIN."

Look on that picture, then on this:

The editor of The Progressive Thinker of the issue 740, says: "One thousand dollars for ONE GENUINE SPIRIT MATERIALIZATION. This is a splendid chance to settle this great question and gain the everlasting praise of all true Spiritualists."

So it is—a splendid chance. When it is demonstrated that "one genuine spirit materialization" is a fact, the whole world should shout its joy to all true Spiritualists. The medium, the "instrument," will justly earn world-wide fame and fortune.

Who is the man?—or woman? Says Editor Francis: "Will not some medium for this phase, WHO KNOWS HE OR SHE IS GENUINE, accept this offer and confer a favor upon our cause?"

Mrs. Fairchilds, of Denver, is spoken of by John T. McClure in glowing terms as a materializing medium. In her presence "thirty-five forms were completed so as to speak to us." One full form would secure that thousand dollars. The practical J. R. Francis says: "Mrs. Fairchilds must be a wonderful medium. We suggest that she start at once for Los Angeles, Cal., and capture the ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS offered by Robert Hale, 831 Wall street, of that city."

The first medium, "who knows he or she is genuine," that lands in Los Angeles, will capture the prize. It is a fat fee. Don't be bashful. Do not "hedge." Do not ask Mr. Hale, an honorable gentleman, to take a journey to Washington. He offers a fine inducement for any reliable medium to visit him. Why not do so? W. F. JAMIESON.

Pentwater, Mich.

P. S.—"Felix." Had I known your address would have written. Many thanks. The N. S. A. is doing a good work.

LONG DISTANCE HEALER GUILTY.

Jacksonville, Fla., Feb. 10.—Mrs. Post, the famous "long distance" mental science healer, against whom the government issued a fraud order, was found guilty in the United States District Court yesterday evening.—Chicago American.

LIFE—WHAT IS IT?

A filmy drawn thread, tangled at either end,
And drawn across the dial of the years
By that old Spider, Time, who heeds nor hears
The murmur of the moments as they blend
Their melody with wailing hearts that rend,
And hopes that snap beneath the weight of tears;
And ere the swarthy spinner disappears,
He breaks the magic thread that none can mend,
Leaving our startled eyes enwrapt in mist,
Our fingers palsied, and our blanched lips mute,
And busy grave-worms nibbling at the fruit
Which Death has plucked and dangled at his wrist.
Nor doth the subtle weaver come again
To tie the fibre and complete the skein.

Death—What Is It?

It is a peaceful end of all desire,
An end of dreaming, and an end of song—
A happy winding up of right and wrong,
A quiet quenching of the vital fire;
A shadow lying on the broken lyre—
A beggar's holiday—a twilight long,
A landing place where weary pilgrims throng,
A tranquil terminus of ways that tire.
Death is a respite from each vain regret,
It drops the curtain, it concludes the play,
It turns the lights out, and it leads the way,
When o'er the housetops all the stars have set;
Death is the epilogue to which we list,
Just as the tired audience is dismissed.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Frank Bradly Lee Fancher, infant son of Mr. and Mrs. F. B. Fancher, of this city, passed away at Nichols Memorial Hospital, Battle Creek, Mich., Feb. 5, after an earthly existence of only a few hours. Saturday afternoon sympathetic friends of the bereaved parents assembled in one of the parlors of the institution, where, surrounded by flowers, the little form lay. Brief but appropriate services were conducted by Mrs. A. E. Sheets, of Grand Ledge.

On Feb. 2, 1904, after an illness of several months, Mr. Arnold Graf, entered into the life triumphant from his home near Naponee, Neb. The deceased was an earnest worker in the cause of Spiritualism, and although in his 62d year and totally blind, he was always ready and willing to do what he could to help his fellow-men on in the way of light. His remains were laid to rest in the Naponee cemetery.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH

—OR—

DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means or developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

Formation of Circles and Cultivation of Mediumship

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

ASPHODEL BLOOMS
AND
Other Offerings.
BY
EMMA ROOD TUTTLE.

This volume contains a selection of the best poems of this gifted author and storiettes contributed by Clair Tuttle in her charming style. There are 285 pages, with six full-page illustrations, including photogravures of the author and Clair Tuttle. It is bound in blue with aluminum embossing. Many of the poems are especially adapted for recitations.

The Author needs no introduction to the spiritual public. Her songs are among the best in spiritual literature. Epes Sargent said of one of her poems that it was the equal of anything in the language, and that she was the poet of the New Dispensation.

The Mecca says: "Psychic Poems."

That erudite critic, Wm. Emmette Coleman: "To all lovers of good poetry this book is confidently recommended."

Will Carlton: "I have read with great interest."

Sarah Thorpe Thomas, the Humanitarian says: "A most exquisite bouquet * * * * the thoughts echo and re-echo through the deepest recesses of my heart. I have some word of praise for every page."

The author says in the dedication: "To those whose thoughts and longings reach into the unseen Land of Souls, this handful of asphodels, mixed with common flowers, is offered hoping to give rest and pleasure while waiting at the way stations on the journey thither."

JIM, or The Touch of An Angel Mother.
BY CARRIE E. S. TWING.

Her dedicatory lines are sufficient to show the spirit of the book as well as the author, it reads, "Because my own children are all under the tender care of the angels, and my heart is hungry for the love of the young, I most lovingly dedicate this book to the children of the world." This book is full of soul elevating and interesting thought. Price, cloth, $1. For sale at this office.

LISBETH.

An Interesting Story of Two Worlds.

Elevating, Fascinating, Instructive Throughout.

This work by Carrie E. S. Twing is exceptionally interesting. She well says: "These characters which have brought out the highest and lowest in different religious beliefs, have moved me, not I them." The whole book is interesting, fascinating, and instructive. Price $1.00.

ORIGIN OF SPECIES,

By means of natural selection, or the preservation of a favored race in the struggle for life. By Charles Darwin. Gilt top, cloth bound. This book is the grandest achievement of modern scientific thought and research. It has passed through many editions in English, has been translated into almost all the languages of Europe, and has been the subject of more reviews, pamphlets and separate books than any other volume of the age. Most of the great scientists of the age fully support his position. The thought of this book has become a part of the common inheritance of the race. For sale at this office. Price 75 cts.

An Infamous Conspiracy A pamphlet of 32 pages, compiled and published by the late Rev. J. G. White, author of numerous anti-Catholic works. It contains disclosures relative to a villainous plot to overthrow our free government. Price, 15 cents

THE DESCENT OF MAN.

By Charles Darwin. Cloth, gilt top, 75 cents. On its appearance it aroused at once a storm of mingled wrath, wonder and admiration. In elegance of style, charm of manner and deep knowledge of natural history, it stands almost without a rival among scientific works.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

Hudson Tuttle.

Address him at Berlin, Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

H. C. Moore: Q. When did Ernest Renan die? How many years did he pass in Palestine?

A. Joseph Ernest Renan was born in 1823, at Treguier, on the coast of Brittany. He went to Paris at the age of 16 to prepare himself for the church. He won the Volney medal in 1847, and held various positions, until sent to Syria on a scientific mission in 1860, returning in 1862. He thus passed two years in that country. It was of value to him in giving local tone and coloring to his Origines du Christianisme, his best known work, and popular for its glowing style, but as superficial and delusive as a novel. His Life of Jesus met with censorship, and cost him his place as Professor of Hebrew in the College de France. His style is pleasing, but he is unreliable in his history, overdraws in description, superficial, and appears to have been wholly wanting in that discriminating power, essential to distinguish truth from falsehood. He died at Paris, October 2, 1892.

Judge Delevan Bates: Q. Please give sketch of Annie Besant, and tell how she came to take Madam Blavatsky's place in the Theosophical Society?

A. Annie Besant, born at London, October 1, 1847, daughter of W. P. Wood. Married Rev. Frank Besant in 1867, but obtained a legal separation in 1873. Joined the National Secular Society in 1874; worked in the Free Thought movement led by Charles Bradlaugh, M. P., and in 1883 became deeply interested in Socialism; also took part in the Trades Union movement among unskilled laborers. Was a member of the London School Board, 1887-90, and in 1889 joined the Theosophical Society, becoming a pupil of Madam Blavatsky.

She has lectured on Theosophy in India and the United States, and has written many works and papers on the subject. As pupil of the Madam, because of her distinguished position, and devotion to Theosophy she was the one and only choice as successor to that aggressive leader.

Mrs. Besant is more talented than her predecessor, infinitely more honest, and unselfish. Her course shows how recklessly she disregards precedents and past beliefs, and her readiness to accept the new. She is a most remarkable woman, personally and intellectually. A strong, calm, clear and eloquent speaker of the style of Wendell Phillips. It is a strange anomaly that one so gifted with reason should fall into the belief in a doctrine that is absolutely devoid of reason, and shows how superstition holds by heredity the activity and conclusions of the mind.

V. R. 3: Q. Is it conclusive proof that a materializing medium is a fraud when he refuses to be handcuffed with cuffs not his own, but produced by some one in the circle stating that it may be impossible for them to get anything on account of these cuffs but his own working all right?

(2) What effect (if any) have such cuffs never before worn by the medium on these manifestations?

A. (1) It may not be conclusive evidence of fraud, but such refusal casts suspicion on the medium. There is nothing "magnetic" in one pair of handcuffs more or less than in another, and the only reason against using another pair would be that the new pair could not be worked, as easily as "his own."

(2) The "effect" of such new cuffs on such a medium would probably be the absence of all "manifestations." A sleight-of-hand performer, allowed his own "conditions," cannot be detected in his tricks.

Katharine Bates: If you hold seances at appointed seasons and with the earnest desire that your spirit friends only shall approach you, and hold in your minds that none other shall do so, you will have no further trouble by spirits coming you do not want. You have by sitting at any and all times, prevented your friends from holding steadfast, and allowed others to come in. You have also made the common mistake, of being anxious for some astonishing phenomena, and have not awaited patiently what may come to you. This anxiety of mind, and holding seances at such times as inclination or convenience suggests, is the ready way to open the door to all comers.

G. W. Woodman: Q. If the spirit world is a counterpart of this, with its actors all passing on from this life unchanged, why do spirits "obsess" mortals to gratify desires? Does it appear reasonable when they have a home of their own?

A. The questioner has by the wording of his questions given them answer. We have always believed, we may say known, that a great deal of this talk about "obsession" and influence of evil spirits," has come from mediums who have thus attempted to account for their own failures and derelictions by throwing the blame on this readily received scape-goat.

Cases of nervous prostration and clearly defined brain derangement have been flippantly explained by this ready theory, and spirit communion converted from angel intercourse to a terrible demonology. The crisis has been recently reached, and the logical conclusions toward which these crass theories and explanations tend, forced with terrible earnestness upon us. If there are "obsessions," the obsessing spirit comes because the door is opened for its coming. Whatever the obsessed may do they would do of their own accord were restraint removed. They do as they do because they are like the obsessing influence. Hence it is no palliation of the offense that they are under the control of an influence they say they cannot resist. Would any one dare to assert that an angel could be controlled by an evil spirit and dragged into sensuality and crime? As there is a possible state of health which is immune from the most virulent germs of disease, there is a spiritual state immune from any and every perverting influence. Nor is this an ideal or unattainable state, but simply a self-fortified attitude of well-balanced self-control. Neither is it antagonistic, but rather promotive of the most perfect sensitiveness, and invitive of the best spiritual influence. To acknowledge that one is helpless under the stress of an "obsessing" spirit, is disreputable, even admitting the whole contention, of the power of low and degraded spirits, and no shield against censure. It is time Spiritualism was freed from this blighting doctrine which tends to a revival of the absurd superstitions about witchcraft prevalent centuries ago, which have no place in the present.

Ninety-nine hundredths of all the cases of pretended "obsession," are caused by nervous prostration, more or less marked insanity, misunderstanding of the control, ignorance on the part of the control or deception on the part of medium. Failure in giving correct messages, contradictions, and moral delinquencies all meet with ready explanation by the claim that the medium is "obsessed" by evil spirits.

THOMAS LEES.

The ascension to a higher life of this noble man, has been already mentioned in The Progressive Thinker, and high tribute in his praise eloquently given by Mrs. I. W. Pope, but I would add my humble voice in the symposium of his friends. The more do I desire this, because it was impossible for me to redeem my promise, made many years ago, to speak the final parting words over the casket wherein reposed his mortality.

A friend of forty years, a true, generous, helpful friend; a man of splendid executive abilities, with his whole soul in the cause of truth, and it may be said that for twenty-five years he carried Spiritualism by his own devotion and self-sacrifice. The Progressive Lyceum was sustained and vigorous under his long conductorship, and the members were loyal in his assistance.

In all his efforts to build up the lyceum and sustain lecturers, his sister Tillie has nobly sustained him. As leader in the "Good Samaritans," she has been a sister of mercy to the distressed of her adopted city, and many a suffering child, and destitute mother has blessed her name. The sudden departure of her brother must, even with the sustaining power of the spiritual philosophy, be overwhelming to her sensitive nature. May good angels sustain and comfort her.

Morris Pratt School Library.

Although we have had but little time as yet to arrange our school library, and have said very little about it through the papers, we have the foundation laid for a good library. Mrs. Susie C. Clarke, that indefatigable worker, of Cambridge, Mass., has presented the school all of her works; the Librarian of the War Department of Congress has sent us several sacks full of fine books. Capt. Milan C. Edson, of Washington, D. C., has sent us several copies of his "Solaris Farm." Somebody has sent us the Banner of Light from its first issue up to very nearly the present time. I think there are possibly not more than a half-dozen copies missing. Last, though not least, Dr. D. R. Higbee, of West Branch, Mich., has sent to us his entire medical library. The Dr. is now near ninety years old, and he very sensibly wishes to dispose of all his worldly possessions before he passes to the hither side of life, so he sent us the fine donation of books above mentioned.

Mr. Warren, a retired merchant, a man who has been a lively member of the Baptist church until, I think, within a year, is now a student in our school. This gentleman puts in all his spare time in building book-cases for us.

We confidently hope that by the time our Wisconsin State Spiritualist Convention in the Institute comes off on the third Tuesday and three following days in April, to have a good and well-arranged library in our library hall. There is yet room for those who wish to donate books to send them on. We would be highly pleased to have all of the works of that old veteran reformer, Dr. Andrew Jackson Davis. We would like any or all the works of Emmanuel Swedenborg. Encyclopedias are all acceptable. The school will have a full assortment of my books. That grand old man, Dr. J. M. Peebles, it is hoped will remember the young men and women who are trying in the Institute to fit themselves for usefulness and will let them have the privilege of gleaning pearls of wisdom from his writings.

We hope to be able soon to show the citizens of Whitewater a library of which we need not be ashamed.

Angel of Light.

Humanitarian Work Should Be a Prominent Factor in Spiritualism.

IT IS WELL TO KEEP BEFORE THE PEOPLE THOSE ANGELS OF LIGHT WHO ARE CONSTANTLY BRIGHTENING THE HEARTS OF THE SICK AND POVERTY-STRICKEN, AND SOWING SEEDS OF KINDNESS BROADCAST AMONG THOSE WHOSE LOT IN LIFE HAS NOT BEEN CAST IN PLEASANT PLACES.

THE LITTLE CONVERSATION THAT STARTED IT ALL.

She—Every rich girl ought to make some sacrifice for charity's sake.

He—Well, what sacrifice are you going to make?..I should like to know; it would interest me.

She—Do you know I am thinking of cutting down my millinery bills—hats are so outrageously expensive.

He—Why don't you try to get along, then, without any at all?

..She (as if in deep thought—Quite true; I might do that.

He—I should like to bet you couldn't; not for a week, nor a month, let alone a year!

She—What'll you bet?

He (nonchalantly)—Oh, anything you say.

She—Now, look here, I'm perfectly serious; honestly, I am. I'll bet you one thousand dollars I won't wear a hat of any kind for a year.

He—Really, ah—h—, honest? Bet accepted. I'll put it in writing. But you won't, you know.

She—One thousand dollars I'll win on the bet, and one thousand dollars I'll save on my millinery bills. (With a quick computation of her fingers). This will be two thousand dollars for our poor little sick children (with quick, instinctive thought). I'll sign the wager, quick—and I'LL WIN OUT. I'LL WIN OUT. I'LL WIN OUT.

He—Good. It's a go (sotto voce) Only she won't, don't you know. It's a woman's dare. Fancy one of our set going without one new hat for a year! I'm a thousand to the good.

Miss Madeline Cutting, of New York and Pittsfield, Mass., a member of New York's "Four Hundred," young, fair to look at and heiress to a goodly fortune, has not been known to wear a hat in the picturesque and famous Massachusetts town where she lives most of the time, nor in New York, nor in any of the Southern resorts she has visited for the fashionable Spring jaunt for over one whole year.

This tale of a hat—or rather no hat at all—is one of the prettiest little stories that has crept out about New York's "Four Hundred" in a long time. But it is so familiar to the people of the little Berkshire town in Massachusetts, where it comes from, that they look upon it now as one of the town's traditions. They have ceased to gaze in wonderment at the tall, fair girl who almost daily, in rain or in shine, under hot summer skies or in one of the quick snow storms that sweep down from the hills, may be seen walking or driving, in the shops or on the streets, bareheaded and with no covering whatever, save the aureole of waving hair with which nature has crowned her—for charity's sake.

Miss Cutting is a daughter of Colonel Walter Cutting and grand-daughter of Robert L. Cutting, long one of the solid bankers of New York. She is related to the R. Fulton Cuttings and the Livingston and the Bayard and the Brockholst and all the other Cuttings, and made her debut in New York society like all the daughters of the extremely rich and fashionable Cuttings.

For the greater part of each year, since then, she has lived in Pittsfield, where Colonel Cutting has a fine summer residence, known as Meadow Farm.

The dialogue which your eye catches immediately in looking at this page, took place at Meadow Farm, and gives the key note to the story and why Miss Madeline Cutting never wears a hat. Miss Cutting is not a bit eccentric, and dreads publicity so much that she has tried by every hook and crook to destroy all pictures of her—this one on this page escaped her keen notice—but after she made the bet of $1,000 that she wouldn't wear a hat for one year, to have it to spend among the poor, she snapped her fingers at public opinion and replied to her father, who gently admonished her:

"I've heard of people catching cold coming home from church, but not going. And I don't give a rap, papa, what people say. I've laid the wager and I'm going to win it."

"Go ahead, then, little girl," said Papa Cutting, who in his inmost heart admired her high-hearted spunk. "Only don't get sick, dear."

The Dare to Miss Madeline Cutting.

This wager has now come to be one of the fascinating tales to travelers among the Berkshires, and people on the street corners, especially in Pittsfield, like to tell it to strangers in town, who inquire who the pretty girl without a hat may be. This is what they will tell you:

"She? Why, that is Miss Madeline Cutting. She is the richest heiress in town, but there is not a poor person here who does not love her. They are ready, one and all, to go down on their knees to her. How about the hat?

"Oh, you see, Madeline—they call her Madeline in Pittsfield and round about—was always thinking of ways to make people happy. Last winter, when there was so much distress, some friend of hers—a young man, of course—laid a wager with her that she would not have the courage to go for a year without a hat—for a year, mind you—even for the sake of having a thousand dollars to give away to the poor.

Miss Cutting Snaps Up the Wager.

Madeline snapped up the wager, and she has won it.

"And a good many poor people of Pittsfield have now been made comfortable through that thousand dollar bet. Since then she hasn't cared to wear a hat. At church, during the year she was winning the wager, she used to wear a sort of veil over her head, but it has come to be such a habit for her to wear nothing that we should be quite surprised to ever see her with a hat on again—even a 'going away' hat. She's a spunky, determined girl."

So, here's the story of how Miss Madeline Cutting began going without a hat. But it only is suggestive of the quiet good she is doing every day. A Pittsfield friend who is close to her is authority for the statement that she has spent over $50,000 in charity during the last six years.

When she was a young girl—just budding into womanhood—she became interested in a society called the Union for Work. It was then she learned the joy of helping others and learned the full beauty of the saying, "it is more blessed to give than to receive."

Helpfulness has now become the idea of her young life. She gives not only her "millinery" money, but a heart of sympathy and kindliness.

She doesn't "care a rap" if remarks are made about her because she goes hatless. And yet there is nothing in the slightest degree pronounced or eccentric about her. In spite of her good-comradeship with every one (and all her men friends call her "a good fellow"), she has the fine manners and the fine reserve of a high-bred American aristocrat. Frequently her charitable work is carried on in co-operation with Mayor Sisson, of Pittsfield, and with Mr. J. M. Fitzgerald, who holds the quite unique office of "City Almoner." Appeals for aid are made to her literally by the hundreds. She knows the uselessness of indiscriminate charity, and when she is in doubt of the worth of an applicant, she consults with Mr. Fitzgerald.

How She Works Among the Poor.

But there are many cases which are brought to her notice where she acts on her own swift, sure intuition. She does not wait for a family to die of hunger and thirst and cold before she holds out a helping hand. Sometimes mothers with unruly boys ask Miss Madeline to try her influence. There are several boys in Pittsfield who remember well, during the last year or two, the horse-sense dose of her plain talk, kindly, yet unsparingly frank, which Miss Madeline gave them—for advice.

The aged poor in the city almshouse are Miss Cutting's fondest admirers. Every Friday when she is in town she drives out there to have a cheery little chat with the old women and, perhaps, a game of cards with the old men. She carries candy and snuff for the women and tobacco for the men.

Then there are the forlorn, forsaken women of the Old Ladies' Home. They know and really love "Miss Madeline." There are not words enough in their vocabulary to express their admiration for her nor pet phrases enough to tell of their affection.

And not only in Pittsfield are Miss Cutting's good deeds to be told. Bellevue Hospital could tell of five children from Pittsfield brought to its shelter last year to ask for its skill and treatment. They were little friends of Miss Cutting who needed surgical treatment. She carried them all the way to New York, paid the expenses of transportation and medical service, and when they were cured brought them back home.

Doesn't Care a Rap How She Looks.

In Boston, at the Perkins' Institute for the Blind, is a young girl, Cora Crocker by name, who is another of Miss Cutting's proteges. Deaf, speechless and sightless, pitiful life was hers until "the angel of Pittsfield" heard of her and took her away from her sad surroundings to be healed, like Laura Bridgman or Helen Keller.

Miss Cutting, who is so admired by the people of Pittsfield, has frank, honest eyes, that look straight into your own, a peculiarly winsome smile, a happy laugh in her voice—and for all this and her manifold good deeds they call her the Angel of Pittsfield. "No, she doesn't care how she looks," to use the voice of the town. Her favorite street costume for the winter is a short square-cut black coat, lined with sheep's wool; in severest weather a long fur coat.

Winning Her Bet Bareheaded in a Blizzard.

She wears them swung open. To have seen her in a Berkshire blizzard, straight and lithe, with the snow playing hide and seek in her crown of fluffy hair and the wind tossing it this way and that, with her long-fleece-lined coat flung open as if no cold or sleet had power to chill her warm heart underneath, one almost feels that he had seen a vision of Eternal Youth.

Miss Cutting loves her Pittsfield friends so well that she does not like to leave them for long. Now and then she makes a flying trip to her New York home or to Boston. Often these trips are undertaken in behalf of some sick friend or of little Cora Crocker. In summer, when Pittsfield is gay with visitors, when the cottages at Lenox and Stockbridge and Great Barrington are open and en fete, all of Miss Cutting's leisure hours are claimed by her New York friends who summer in the Berkshires. But even then she never neglects her weekly visits to the old men and the old women, and doesn't forget to buy her weekly contribution of snuff and tobacco and soap and other simple little luxuries, which make life brighter for the dwellers in the twilight of old age.

North or South, Wears no Hat.

In the heart of winter, she sometimes takes a journey south, generally with her sister Juliana, who is more given to the "ways of the world." Last winter it was to Palm Beach, where Miss Madeline's beauty attracted much admiration. Still, there in the land of sunshine, she wore no hat. But very fair she looked when wrapped in the fleecy scarfs of mousseline and tulle, and the soft frou-frous that go with winter summering in the south.

Miss Cutting's beauty comes to her by inheritance. Her mother was a beauty when as "Pinkie" Pomeroy, the daughter of a rich Pittsburg (Pa.) man, she was one of the belles of the town. Her mother's sister, Miss Belle Pomeroy, who married into the English gentry, still is, by tradition, the handsomest bride that the sun ever shone on in Pittsfield.

LAKE HELEN CAMP, FLA.

Opening Day at the Sounthern Cassadaga Camp.

February 7, the opening day of camp, has been an ideal one. With the thermometer at 82, of course it was warm, but no one seemed to mind it very much.

The auditorium was very beautifully decorated, as has been the dancing pavilion, under the direction of Mrs. E. H. Thompson, of Lily Dale. A profusion of flowers adorned the platform.

Roses that would have been very dear in the North were donated by some who do not claim to be Spiritualists, while another purchased dozens of them because she wanted to make the place beautiful. Palms and pines were freely used, while of the long twining stems full of yellow bell-like blossoms of the jasmine there was no stint.

The flags of all countries invited the visitors to study them, and "Old Glory" served as a drapery in the rear of the platform.

The hard cement floor is covered in the aisles with heavy carpeting and had it not been for two circumstances there would have been no shadow over our hearts save for those who have been promoted from our number to the higher life.

We were all disappointed that Bro. Homer Altemus, who has served this association faithfully for two years, could not be with us, on account of illness. Mr. Altemus has many friends here who miss him and who pray he may soon be restored to health. Another we missed was our sweet singer, Miss Grace Hawtin, the niece of Prof. W. F. Peck, who is detained at home by the serious illness of her mother. We wish she could bring her mother into this balmy air. It would bring to her a healing power that would, we believe, banish disease. All send best wishes to Miss Grace.

In her absence, Miss Whitney and Miss Salinas of Brooklyn, assisted by Prof Peck, gave us very good music. The Isles of the Bye and Bye, sung as a solo by Mr. Peck, in which the ladies joined in the chorus, was particularly beautiful. The ladies expect to give some concerts before they return to the North.

President Bond made the opening address of the morning and then introduced Prof. Peck, who was followed by the writer. Vice-president Hilligoss then spoke. W. J. Colville was the last speaker of the morning and closed with an inspirational poem. Mr. Colville is not a stranger here. Nine years ago he was here—the year of the great freeze; he was then given the subject for a poem, "Our frozen orange trees." It was given again to-day and he changed from the sad strain of that time to the hopeful thought of the present.

Mr. Colville's subject for the afternoon was the Science of Being and the Harmony of Existence. Speaking in reference to The Psychological Crime, he said there was also Psychological Virtue. Mr. Colville as well as his guides, are optimistic and see good in everything.

Mr. Colville will give classes every week-day for the benefit of the association.

To let you see we are busy people here I will give you the program for the week. Monday afternoon, conference, and in the evening a card party.

Tuesday afternoon, lecture by Prof. Peck, and in the evening there will be a dance in the pavilion.

Every Wednesday afternoon and evening is devoted to the Ladies' Auxiliary. This week Mrs. Bartholomew will be the medium for the afternoon seance, and in the evening there will be an entertainment in the auditorium. Prof. Peck and Miss Carrigue, vice-president of the Ladies' Auxiliary, have charge of the evening entertainments.

Thursday afternoon the writer will speak and in the evening there will be a Dixie Gingerbread Social at the pavilion.

Friday afternoon, conference, and dance in the evening.

Saturday, lecture by Prof. Peck.

There are still rooms in the hotel and in Brigham hall for people who desire rooms upon the grounds, and good food at the dining-rooms and at Mrs. Spencer's.

Because of some unthought-of changes there are still rooms in the Apartment House and a few in cottages.

Thanks to those who have remembered the bazaar; Vermont, Michigan, New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio have been heard from.

I was wondering if everyone who reads of the Southern Cassadaga at Lake Helen, should send us ten cents, how much we would get. I know it would cost 12 cents, and a little paper to get it here, but how it would help this "winter child" of the South that we want made more and more beautiful, and also desire to have placed upon a strong financial basis.

Mrs. Sarah C. Brigham, of Fitchburg, Mass., is now in her cottage. She was kept at home by a very serious illness. We hope to see the beautiful story, The Light Among the Hills, in book form soon.

The writer has had a picture sent from her home at Westfield, N. Y., where a snow drift is eight feet high, completely covering the dining-room windows. We hear they set the table in the kitchen now.

How to Enjoy Breakfast.

"Just a roll and coffee, is all I ever eat for breakfast." How often you hear this statement, especially among women. Some men talk the same way. What's the trouble? Breakfast should be one of the best meals of the day. It is needed to get up steam for the body and nerves for the daily toil. When a person doesn't enjoy breakfast, there's something wrong with the stomach. In the majority of cases it is tired out and weak in the morning from working overtime trying to digest things which should never have been put into it and in fighting to get rid of poisonous, catarrhal waste matter. While this rough and tumble goes on in the stomach, the brain is made unnaturally active by weird dreams, some of them frightful in nature. Result—mental and physical exhaustion in the morning.

The stomach of a healthy person rests at night, so does his brain. If your appetite is bad, if you are restless at night, if you have bad dreams, if you are distressed after eating, if your breath is bad in the morning, if you are troubled with catarrh, if you are bilious, if you are constipated, if your kidneys do not act properly and if you are generally run down, you need Vernal Palmettona (formerly known as Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine). Ony one dose a day is required. Take it on going to bed. You will have perfect rest at night, a good appetite for breakfast and enjoy all your other meals. You can get it at all drug stores. If you want a free sample bottle, to try before you buy, send us your name and address. It will be sent promptly, postpaid. Vernal Remedy Co., 452 Seneca Building, Buffalo, N. Y.

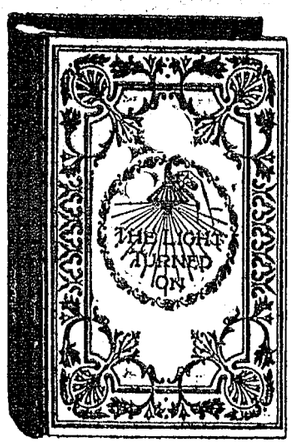
A Remarkable Doctor Book



HAS JUST BEEN ISSUED, ENTITLED

THE NATURE CURE

BY PHYSICAL AND MENTAL METHODS, ILLUSTRATED.

A Bridge from the Old to the New; the Dawn of a New Day in Medical Practice. A Clear, Short-Cut Treatise on the Cause and Cure of Disease.

By MARVIN E. CONGER, M. D.
Assisted by ROSA C. CONGER, M. D.

Nature Cure teaches how to heal by simple home remedies.

It teaches how Nature cures.

It does not use poisonous drugs.

It does not endorse dangerous experiments with the surgeon's knife.

It will save money in every home.

It is entirely free from technical rubbish.

It teaches how typhoid and other fevers may be cured at once.

It teaches how pneumonia, la-grippe, diphtheria and other forms of disease considered dangerous, may be cured in twenty-four hours.

It is, as a medical book for homes, THE BEST, and is up-to-date in every particular.

There is no similar book, no medical, hygienic or reformatory doctor book that compares with THE NATURE CURE.

The light is turned on to objectionable medical mysteries, latin prescriptions, dogmatic theories and dangerous experiments of the present expensive medical practice.

Every pains has been taken to make the leading points so plain that all, young and old, may easily understand. Condensed facts, short, clear-cut paragraphs are some of the attractive features of THE NATURE CURE.

The new and better methods of curing the sick and preventing disease, have never been so clearly stated in plain English for the plain people, as in NATURE CURE.

Our Definition of Medicine.—Any method or remedy that will remove, alleviate or modify pain and restore the sick to normal condition, is practical medicine.

Stripped of mystery and deception, the study and practice of medicine can be carried to success in every intelligent home. NATURE CURE will lead the way to certain success.

The best medical practice is the one that will cure in the least time with the least risk and expense.

Nature Cure is a true exponent of the practice of medicine as defined, and stands squarely upon truth and demonstration, rejecting theories and experiments wherever health and life are endangered.

The book contains 375 pages, and is finely illustrated; the mechanical and artistic work are the very best. Bound in fine English cloth, marble edges, $2.00; common cloth $1.50.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

8vo. Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "other-worldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BEYOND THE VAIL

A Sequel to "Rending the Vail."

The two volumes together as a record of practically obtained facts demonstrating the claims of Modern Spiritualism as to post mortal survival, are unique and overwhelming.

Every communication is from a full materialized spirit form, in good light, and either spoken audibly or written in full view by the form. There is not an automatic or trance message in the book.

It is illustrated by several engravings, the originals of which were drawn in the presence of the circle by a full form materialized spirit artist.

BEYOND THE VAIL is, as a rule, the experiences of spirits in both worlds—their own account of their lives on earth and their progress after death to their present condition of freedom from earth conditions. The narratives are intensely interesting, instructive and often highly dramatic.

Coincident with these are the profoundly philosophical comments of the controlling spirits of the seances. Prof. William Denton, Thomas Paine, Dr. W. H. Reed and others—covering, law, medicine, jurisprudence, theology and metaphysics. There are no books in existence of like character or of higher authority. Price, by mail, $1.75.

CELESTIAL DYNAMICS,

Being a Normal Course of Study in the Astro-Magnetic Forces of Nature.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE LIGHT OF EGYPT," "THE LANGUAGE OF THE STARS," ETC.

A magnificent and complete course of Astro-metaphysical study, embodying Vital Principles of Life, Mental Force, Sickness and Disease. With the only true and really Scientific method of treating the sick successfully.

Mental Healers, Meta-physicians, and all who practice the Healing Art Divine should give "Celestial Dynamics" a thorough and impartial study, and thus learn the real cause of their frequent failures.

No Astro-Student can afford to be without this work, if he would understand the Meta-physics of Astrology.

This work was specially prepared for publication to meet the demands of a large and very earnest class of people who cannot afford to pay for a regular course of instruction under a qualified teacher. And those who can afford this privilege will find the work an invaluable text-book to their studies.

History of the CHRISTIAN RELIGION to the Year 200,

BY CHARLES V. WAITE, A. M.

Fifth Edition—Revised, with Much Additional Matter.

A standard and reliable history of the earlier period of the church, giving facts that are not found in the so-called histories written by churchmen. This latest edition has been carefully and thoroughly revised, and it is a reliable magazine of facts, such as the honest inquirer wants. It opens up to the investigator and student a wide field of historical research in matters of fact wholly ignored by the regular church historians, and throws a bright glare of light on points heretofore carefully shrouded in darkness.

THE ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS

To the Editor:—Dear Sir, We have received many letters from different parts of the country as to the communication published in The Progressive Thinker, Jan. 23. We will say we cannot answer all of these letters, and take this means of saying, the one thousand dollars is for all contestants; none are debarred, no matter of what color or sex. If anyone can have one spirit materialized, we will hand to him or her the cash. Up to this writing no medium has answered the letter.

MATERIALIZATION.

Some Reflections Thereon by a Prominent Lecturer.

Will you allow me to make a few remarks for "the good of the order" anent the discussion concerning spirit materialization?

Those who know me best will bear witness that I am no friend to bogus mediumship, and they also know that I would expose the nearest relative I have if I should find them enacting the role of fake. In view of this fact, and the years of experience I have had, my opinion ought to be entitled to some consideration.

In the first place, experience and observation have convinced me that the general public, and at least one-half of the Spiritualists are not ready for the phase of manifestation known as materialization. The reason for this, as stated by me in a former article, is because this class persistently refuse to acquaint themselves with the underlying principles governing mediumship in general and this phase in particular.

Every now and then we see a great furore about the "exposure" of some medium, like that of Mrs. Reynolds, in California, recently published in The Progressive Thinker, wherein a great bluff is sent out by one Mr. Hale that he will give $1,000 for a genuine materialization. Of course this means, being interpreted, that Mr. Hale would at once wish to hedge his thousand dollars about with conditions that would not only prevent spirit materialization, but would stop a stone mason from spreading mortar on a wall.

I know a medium who is perhaps the best materializing medium now living, who holds this phase so sacred that she will not give it for a money consideration. The test condition which she invariably demands, is for a committee of ladies to disrobe her, place her in a close-fitting black suit, with a black wrapper and slippers, with not even a white handkerchief about her. Under these conditions I have again and again seen from ten to twenty-five full-form spirits of both sexes and all ages, emerge from the cabinet, and be fully recognized by their friends. I have seen my own wife stand in the center of the room and talk to me until the force gave way and her form melted into thin air without returning to the cabinet. And all of those forms were clad in dazzling white robes.

I am fully satisfied that this phase of mediumship includes four departments, viz., materialization, etherealization, transfiguration, and personation. And it is the latter phase which, through the careless of managers or the spirits themselves has led to all the so-called exposures of innocent mediums.

That the spirits can take the body of an unconscious medium out of a cabinet and personate with it, I think is a fully established fact. But when they do this they should always explain it in advance, and guides that will not do so are responsible for all such difficulties.

But the best preventive would be for Spiritualists to use common sense and quit demanding that medium shall be scapegoats for their own ignorance and greed. For some there are who are who are never satisfied, and if their own father materialized and stayed with them twenty-four hours, in both sun and gas light, they would be after another test the next day! A genuine medium's life is a hard one at best, and it is certainly not made more endurable by the ignorant demands of phenomena fiends and fraud hunters.

The ignorant public, and not mediums, is responsible for what truth there is in The Great Psychological Crime.

J. Harvey Mott, whom I positively know to have been a wonderful materializing medium was driven to desperation again and again by fools and knaves, who persisted in violating the conditions and laws which governed his manifestations.

There is not a practical scientist on earth who could succeed with his demonstrations if some one persisted in placing adverse conditions upon him.

Yours for justice to mediums,
C. W. STEWART.

Letter From Investigator.

As one who has investigated Spiritualism for many years, and who knows all the "ins" and "outs" of materializations, and who is a firm believer in all the phenomena, I feel thankful that the recent exposure of Mrs. Elsie Reynold's methods was made. I know that Mr. Hale and Mr. Cherry are gentlemen in every sense of the word, and will give better conditions by far for a materialization test than can be found in any promiscuous circle, hastily coming together, and in which marvelous manifestations occur. How often do we hear of excellent results where nine-tenths of the circle are unmitigated skeptics. Now a medium can make One Thousand Dollars under conditions exceptionally FAVORABLE FOR A GENUINE SPIRIT MANIFESTATION, but unfavorable for fake work. In case of disrobing a medium, that has not been found a good test, for there are a dozen ways where material can be furnished, and detection avoided. The only test that materializing mediums will not submit to was invented by S. S. Jones and consists in confining the medium by placing a mosquito bar over him (or her) and tacking the same to the floor. INVESTIGATOR.

HOME CIRCLE STUDY.

Degree would fill a book as large as "Rending the Vail."

Spirit Vincent Chase, father of one of our mediums, is the spirit recorder of all the proceedings, and maybe some day it will be arranged through a mortal and given to the world.

Jesus of Nazareth has controlled many times at our circles, and given us grand truths. On one occasion he said, "I am the God of this planet. My Father gave it to me, and I gave my life for it."

He speaks of "The Father"—sometimes "My Father." He says the orthodox do not preach the word right, nor do they pray correctly. He does not say anything about his precious blood, nor of the atonement, nor of hell fire, nor of "Infinite Intelligence." Henry Ward Beecher, Charles Spurgeon and Dwight L. Moody meet with us and address the "spirits in prison."

The prophet Daniel says: "War is coming—the most bloody and cruel ever yet realized by man; but for the elect's sake, those days shall be shortened," and that is why we are enlightening Catholic spirits. My next will be a chapter on Gods.

FRANK COLLINS.

Our Ascended Brother, Thomas Lees.

One by one the columns of the Spiritual Temple on its mortal side are falling prostrate in the persons of its prominent and old time defenders, and the strain of its support grows the tenser upon those who remain—still we recognize the fact that the world of causes is still powerful in this world of effects, and feel to bid our co-laborers in the earthly vineyard to continue to discharge their duties boldly and patiently and await the actions of the higher powers, certain that while our gifted workers in the mortal are stricken down others will be raised by the Invisible Intelligences to carry on to completion the work they here so nobly advanced during their day.

Whereas, in the fullness of time, by the edict of Nature, our spiritual brother and lyceum co-worker, Thomas Lees, has passed on to the higher life and left behind many who will sorrow for his seeming loss, therefore be it, by the Boston Spiritualist Lyceum resolved,

That, as we are enjoined to "weep with those who weep" we tender our fraternal sympathy and heartfelt condolence to all his kindred and friends who miss his genial companionship, and we hope they may be comforted by the knowledge that made him a victor over death ere his transition.

Resolved, That, as we are also enjoined to "rejoice with those who rejoice," we congratulate our ascended brother that he has finished his laborious earthly career, has passed the gateway of mortality, and is now enjoying the fruits of his well spent life. We trust that he will often revisit his coworkers on earth, and inspire them with the fidelity, zeal and courage which ever characterized his lyceum labors.

Resolved, That we congratulate the spirit denizens of the sphere to which he has migrated, that so worthy a companion has come to abide and co-operate with them. And especially do we congratulate the lyceums of the Summerland, that they have received so valuable an accession to their ranks, and may peace and joy ever attend his upward progress. Committee:

DUG DISCOVERS GOLD MINE.

Common Mongrel Leads Master to Ledge of Ore.

Thinking their dog was chasing a mountain lion or some other wild beast, H. Roth and A. E. Montmorency, two miners from Nye county, Nevada, seized their guns and followed until they saw the dog come to a stop on the top of a great bowlder. The animal was making no attempt to discover the lost trail, but was standing rigid on the rock, with his nose pointing in the air. As soon as his masters arrived he wagged his tail, barked once or twice, and disappeared in the underbrush.

Surprised by the strange behavior of the animal, the men began an investigation, and soon discovered that the rock was the outcropping of a rich ledge of ore containing gold and silver. Measurements of the body was taken, and it was learned that the mine was 42 feet wide, and extended in a visible line for over 2,250 feet. An assay of the ore was made, and it was found to run from $8 to $126 per ton.

The ledge is located in Nye county, seventy-five miles from Tonopah and twenty-five miles east of Downieville, the famous old mining camp, which employed hundreds of men in the days of the pioneers. It is a well-traveled part of the country, and many old miners have prospected in that region, but it remained for a dog to discover the hidden gold.

The animal is a common mongrel, without a pedigree, and is a cross between a collie and a half-breed bird dog. He was given to the men by a sheep herder whom they knew. Mr. Roth says he is not for sale.

Roth and his partner have been prospecting together for some time, and have a small claim near Tonopah. Roth was formerly a jeweler, and it was he who paid the expenses of the two, as Montmorency was entirely without funds. Their outfit consists of a few blankets, a tent, cooking utensils, provisions, a burro, and a dog. The men say a dog is an absolute necessity, as without him one cannot hope to discover a golden ledge.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

STOMACH TROUBLES CURED

If you suffer from Dyspepsia, Stomach, Liver, or Bowel Trouble of any kind, read this liberal offer. IT WILL BE WORTH MONEY TO YOU.

Do you suffer from dyspepsia, indigestion, or stomach, liver, or bowel trouble of any kind? If you do, why not let us cure you? We do not mean help you by doing you with a strong, stimulating bath and Rhubard Compound, or patent "Dyspepsia Pill." Such things will stimulate and case temporarily, but in the end will only irritate and further weaken the already diseased and weakened membranes. We Will Completely and Permanently Cure You. We will go to the very foundation of your trouble, will remove the causes, strengthen and tone up the affected membranes, perfect the digestion, regulate and strengthen the bowels, and make you as strong and hearty as you ever were. We could give you testimonials by the thousand of those we have cured of stomach troubles in all forms and stages, but they would not tell to you what the treatment will do for YOU. The only absolute proof is in the treatment itself, and knowing the Wonderful Cures we have made for others, and believing that we have a treatment that will Positively Cure any case, no matter how complicated or long standing or how many have failed in the past, that we will send a full two weeks' treatment to any sufferer desiring to give it a trial. Many are cured by this test treatment alone. Why not make a trial of it yourself and learn what it will do for you? It Is Free. Can Telepathy Explain?
Results of Psychical Research.
By Minot J. Savage.
Dr. Savage, in this book of 243 pages, discusses problems that have vexed intelligent minds probably to a greater extent than any others, saving those of the religious life. He states a great number of well-authenticated instances of spiritist revelation or communication. His discussion is frank and fearless, and merits the widest reading, for he deals with facts and experiences. Price, cloth, $1.00.

It is certainly interesting. Price, cloth, 75 cents.

The Influence of the Zodiac Upon Human Life,
With Character Readings of Persons Born Upon the Cusp.
The principles found in this volume are both a science and a religion, for a better and a far happier humanity. It points to the planets as an index to the human character and liability to diseases; also gives the gems and colors suited to temperaments evolved under certain planets. But the author, ELEANOR KIRK, lays special stress upon the fundamental principle that "All maladies known to man can be entirely dominated, forever cast out, by those who realize that mind is the master and body the servant." Price, cloth, $1.00.

Self Contradictions of the Bible.
One hundred and forty-four propositions, theological, moral, historical and speculative; each proved affirmatively and negatively by quotations from Scripture, without comment. Price, 15 cents.

Longley's Choice Collection OF BEAUTIFUL SONGS.
Here is a book of songs for public meetings and the home that is full of music and poetry that reach the soul. The book is just the right size, neatly constructed, plainly printed on a splendid quality of paper, and contains 76 songs.
WORDS THAT ARE TRUE.
"These songs are adapted to the needs of societies and to the home; they are spiritual, and breathe a tender sentiment to the cultured soul. —Lyman C. Howe.
"This collection of songs breathes a pure spiritual harmony, and has an uplifting tendency."—Dawning Light.
"The songs and music are of a nature to inspire those who hear them with new and higher resolves." D. W. Hull.
"There are some things in our personal history that never fade from memory. One in mine has been fresh for fifty years. I went one night to hear the eloquent lecturer, Prof. S. B. Brittan, but I have no recollection of a thought he advanced or a word uttered. But with him was a young man who sang, 'What shall be my angel name.' The man, the song have been singing in my consciousness ever since; the man was Prof. Longley, the song one of his earliest compositions."—J. S. Loveland.
Longley's latest book of songs comprises the cream of all his former books and many new ones, and can be had in decorated covers for 60 cents; plain, 40 cents.

Practical Methods to Insure Success.

The Father Delivers the Funeral Discourse

Maj. C. H. Mathews Delivers a Funeral Discourse Over the Remains of His Daughter, Miss Sarah Agnes Mathews, at New Philadelphia, Ohio.

My friends, on this solemn occasion, it may seem an innovation for a man to make an address at the funeral of a member of his own family. But, my friends, we must look for many social changes in the 20th century. The great world of to-day is on the qui vive for the reception of new ideas.

"The world is waking from its phantom dreams,
To make out that which is, from that which seems;
And in the light of day shall blush to find
What things of night had power enough to blind
Its vision; what thin walls of musty gray
As if of granite, stopped its onward way."

One of the great—in fact the greatest question of the ages, has been and still is: "If a man die, shall he live again?" I am glad to be able, from the testimony of arisen personal friends and relatives, in whom I have the utmost confidence, to assert the continuity of life in that great future that awaits the whole human family.

Spiritualism, (of which the world knows more to-day than it has ever known before), asserts with the greatest assurance the continuity of life, and settles the vexed question of the ages explicitly, and with the great German author, Kotzebue, says. "There is another and a better world!"

This, notwithstanding some notable orthodox Christian clergy, in their wisdom, assert: "We do not yet know that death does not end all."—Bishop Foster.

Sarah Agnes Mathews, my dear daughter, who was bereft of a mother's tender care in 1857, was born March 4, 1853, and would be 51 years old on the 4th of March, 1904. She was of a peculiarly mild and gentle disposition and, for one afflicted as she has been for nearly a score of years, exhibited remarkable fortitude of endurance that was the wonder of her many relatives and friends. She has known for many years past that she could not possibly endure for her allotted time on earth, and having an abiding confidence in the future state, she was fully prepared for the great reality of that condition.

"To trace each feature of departed worth,
Distinguished excellence in fitting terms
Portray, and virtues eminent proclaim;
How vain the task! Alone then let the hand
Of gratitude inscribe this simple truth
Beloved of all she lived, by all lamented died."

When she was scarce three years of age, she was adopted and cared for by Mr. and Mrs. James A. Thompson, her uncle and aunt, who have cared for her and her younger sister; Mrs. Thompson survives at the ripe age of 86 years. Her invaluable motherly, tender care has been fully appreciated.

Spiritualism, (of which it is my privilege, briefly, to speak to-day), positively affirms the continuity of conscious existence of the soul of man, in a spiritual body, after physical death; it teaches us that the soul, through a vast variety of phenomena, can and does demonstrate that continued existence to those still in the mortal body. These "manifestations," now so common, are the common heritage of humanity, and though sometimes simulated, nevertheless furnish a residuum of evidence which defies all solution upon any other hypothesis than that they are the doings of disembodied spirits. To this conclusion every unbiased investigator has come. In fact, no person of sound mind and memory ever did investigate sincerely and honestly, with an earnest desire to investigate and learn the great truths of Spiritualism but became converted. These investigators, I am proud to be able to assert, to-day include the brainiest galaxy of men and women—and the rulers of two continents—who thoroughly investigated the Spiritualistic science, and placed themselves on record as knowing its truthfulness.

But, my friends, however inopportune it may be considered by Mother Grundy to discourse on this subject to-day, I have a carte blanch from the Great Ruler of the Universe, who is all and in all, to go forth and give these truths to the world.

Some one asks the question: "What do Spiritualists believe?" It can hardly be termed a "belief." We claim it to be a knowledge that transcends all mere belief, and is founded upon great spiritual truths that have been revealed to mankind from the earliest years of recorded history. It is, therefore, difficult to make a statement applicable to all. Hudson Tuttle, of Berlin Heights, who has devoted his whole life to the elucidation of the philosophy of Spiritualism, says:

1.—"Man is a dual being—a physical structure and a spirit. The spirit is an organized form, evolved by and out of a physical body, having corresponding form and development.

2.—"This spiritual being is immortal.

3.—"Death is the separation of this duality, and does not affect the spirit morally or intellectually.

4.—"The spirit holds the same relations to the spirit world that man holds to physical nature.

THIRTY EIGHT FEB 15

5.—"The spirit there, as here, works out its own salvation, receiving the reward of well doing, and suffering for wrong actions.

6.—"The knowledge, attainment and experience of the earth-life, form the basis of the spirit life, which is hence a continuance of the same existence.

7.—"Spiritual bodies are evolved by, and eliminated from physical bodies. They differ in grades of morality and intelligence, as men differ on earth.

8.—"These departed spirits, retaining all their love and affection, can and do return and communicate with those in this life. Their capability of so doing does not depend on their intelligence or morality.

9.—"Mediumship rests on sensitiveness, which is not dependent on culture or morals, though elevated and controlled thereby.

10.—Individualized spirit is the reality and the highest type of creative energy. In this sense man is divine, and endowed with infinite capabilities, and united in brotherhood, having common origin, purpose and destiny."

Having thus given you a glance of the spiritual philosophy, I should like to cite you to the many distinguished men and women, and journalists that have accepted its truths and placed themselves on record in its defense during the last 56 years. But this would occupy too much time and perhaps weary your patience. I am sorry to say, but candor compels the admission that, during all these 56 years, since Spiritualism has been given to the world of thought, the church has persistently ignored these manifesting spirits, investigators have been denounced as lunatics and victims of delusion. But I am glad to say that people are beginning to do their own thinking, and a new era of religious thought is destined to permeate the civilized world.

My dear friends, this theme is so exhaustive, that you will excuse me for feeling interested on this mournful occasion. It is unnecessary for me to eulogize my daughter, you all knew her. I will close my remarks by a few lines from memory:

"First, find thou truth; and then, although she strays
From beaten paths of men, to untrod ways,
Her leading follow straight, and abide the fate,
And whether scorn or smiles thy passing greet,
Or find'st thou thorns or flowers beneath thy feet,
Fare on, nor fear thy fate at heaven's gate."

"May the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, be and abide with you all now and forevermore. Amen!"

FOR TEMPERANCE DAY.

Mark that poor, degraded creature,
Lost to honor, sense and shame,
With vice stamped on every feature,
Scarce he's worthy of man's name.
To him no noble deeds are traced,
A trackless waste he's trod;
Each day and hour he has debased
The image of his God.

An outcast self-doomed does he roam,
With naught to make life bright,
No holy ties bind him to home—
O'er home he casts a blight.
His kindred tears may fall in vain
And angels plead for peace,
Unheeded clanks vile passion's chain—
Unheeded scorn—disgrace.

How swiftly speeds his dark career;
Perhaps a felon's doom
Shadows the hidden path that's near,
Leading him to the tomb;
Or on a pallet lowly lying,
In some gloomy prison cell,
Or in some pauper home he's dying,
Waiting for the final knell.

When Death has his victim numbered,
And the die of life is cast,
Conscience awakes, though long it slumbered,
And unveils the bitter past;
For the draught that once enchanted
Now he drains of Sorrow's cup—
By dark specters he is haunted,
Which remorse has conjured up.

Death's icy chill now o'er him steals,
And lips unused to prayer
To heaven shriek his wild appeals,
Half mingled with despair.
Unmourned he fills an early grave
In some neglected spot,
His name sinks in oblivion's wave,
The drunkard is forgot.

—Fannie Geraldine O'Grady.

WHEN THE TIME SHALL COME.

When the time shall come, shall I rejoice
To lay earth's burdens calmly by,
And turn to list the summoning voice
With joyful pulse and happy sigh?

When the time shall come, will all the care
Of life and sorrow roll aside
And be no more, while longing prayer
For loved ones gone be satisfied?

When the time shall come, will all my strife
And battle for the right be won,
And glancing backward, will my life
Seem but a dream, scarce yet begun?

When the time shall come, will there be one
To grieve that I'm not at her side,
Or will she pass before my sun
Has set—a-near the waiting tide?

When the time shall come, how, when or where?
The laws of life and death ne'er fail.
Shipwrecked I can not be; their care
Will see me "safe within the veil."

From the Spirit Realms.

Spirit Carlyle Petersilea.

While on Earth Mr. Petersilea was a medium for the transmission of important letters from those long in spirit life. Now, having become a freed spirit himself, he will convey his best thoughts through the mediumship of his devoted wife, and we are sure they will prove interesting to our readers.

LETTER NUMBER THREE.

Now, friends, I want you to be patient with me, for I shall tell you nothing but the truth.

My father bore me upward for a space, and then threw me from him. "Learn to help yourself," he said sententiously; and I fell, and floundered, and rose and fell, and floated, and floundered. I felt almost precisely as I did when a boy and learning to swim. I caught at my father; he would sustain me for a little, and then throw me from him again.

"Now, Carlyle," he said, "concentrate your mind. Call together your will-power and be a man once more. You will find it easy enough to stand upright, and move about, without assistance, if you do so."

I knew very well that he was speaking the truth; but I had been partially helpless for two or three months, leaning upon, and being sustained by my precious wife—for I would let no other person come near or touch me.

"Oh! how selfish," I hear you say. Perhaps so. But in my helpless condition she was the world to me, and all there was in it. But I obeyed my father, as I had been accustomed to when a child; and I gathered myself together and exerted my will-power to the utmost; and, soon, I found myself moving along by my father's side quite easily; a few pitches to the right and left, sinking down a little occasionally, but on the whole gaining strength every moment.

"Now," said my father, "we will take a seat here in this arbor, and you can rest and look out for a while."

We approached a beautiful arbor, covered by trailing vines and the sweetest and most fragrant of flowers. I sunk down into what seemed a most restful seat and looked forth. O, my God! what a world of beauty lay stretched out peacefully before me. Peace—peace! my soul cried—rest and peace. My life, as a musician, had not been peaceful. It had been one great struggle since my early boyhood. I had known neither rest nor peace; but here was rest and peace at last. "No—no! Not so. My wife—my wife! What would she do? How be able to live without me? O, my poor wife!" and I groaned aloud. My father's watchful eyes were upon me.

"Carlyle," he said, "gather yourself together, rest and be at peace. Exert your will-power and you will be able to help your wife, otherwise you cannot do so."

That was wise—that was sensible; and I knew it. So I gathered in this rest, this peace. I was immortal, and this was eternity. Why, eternity lay stretched out before me, and my past struggles rose up as foolish and futile. I had always been obliged to work on time, and never had time enough. Oh! how it now rolled in upon my soul that there was no end to time—that I could take all the time I wanted for everything or anything; and I drew a great sigh of restful relief. Rest! I felt as though I could rest forever, and peace lay spread out before me most invitingly.

The landscape was not so very different from that of earth, except that it was exceedingly more beautiful. I could see a vast spiritual ocean, and hear the soft and restful murmur of the vibrating waves. I could see hills and dales, mountains and meadows. I could see sparkling rivers and brooks, and placid ponds and lakes. It seemed as though my sight was eternal—not limited as on earth. My eyes seemed to take in a vast area, as though I were looking over thousands and thousands of miles, where, on earth, I could see but a short distance. This was a joy in itself, and those vibrating waves of eternity, how peacefully they rolled; and while my soul was drinking in joy and rest and peace, I involuntarily turned my eyes toward the entrance to the arbor. A lady stood there—a lady so transcendently beautiful that I caught my breath in a kind of rapture.

Friends, it is impossible for me to describe to you her beauty. No painting or work of art that the earth holds can compare with it. The most beautiful woman that ever lived on the earth is but a suggestion of this greater, more ethereal, exalted and heavenly beauty. Her great, dewy, blue eyes were looking directly into my own. Her long, golden hair, partly concealed her form like a vail, and actually trailed among the flowers at her feet. Her gauzy, flowing robes were palely golden. Her face transparent and softly rounded like that of a beautiful cherub. Her age—well, age could not count with such a being as stood there before me. She might have been a thousand years old, so I thought, if age means beauty in spirit life. I trembled at her gaze but dared not speak. Who was she? Who could it be? Dear reader, for the moment it never entered my mind who she could be.

She stretched out those beautiful, perfect arms toward me; but I simply stared at her in the most stupid manner. She covered her eyes with her perfect hand—a hand that made me think of blush roses and lilies and sweet heavenly passages in Mozart's music—as though a wave of sorrow swept through and agitated her lovely form.

"Carlyle," she said; and her voice was low and sweet as the breeze sighing through trees filled with scented blossoms—"Carlyle" and still I stupidly stared at her.

"Mary," said my father, "how can you expect to be recognized by the child you left so many years ago on earth—the child who cannot even remember his mother—the child who never knew a mother's care?"

I trembled at these words, and my breath came pantingly. I tried to rise but could not.

"Mother—mother! Do we meet at last?" She approached and folded me in her arms.

"My boy—my little Carlyle that was—my little cherub that I wanted so much to take with me—at last, at last you have come!" and she fondled and kissed me as though I were still her little boy of three years that she left fifty-six years ago on the earth, while she was exploring the heavenly spheres.

"We are all here now," she said. "You are the last to come."

I groaned aloud. "No—oh, no!" I said; "not the last. My wife—my wife! She is not here. She is left, all, all alone, down in the cold and cruel world, stunned, and nearly crazed with grief. Mother, if indeed you are my mother, help me to help her. You, in your beauty and holiness, are happy; but she, who has been to me everything that life holds dear, is in sorrow and darkness, beset by grief and cares that are too heavy for her failing strength. Help me to help her, oh, my father—oh, my mother! I love her more than myself; she is far dearer to me than my own life, or my own happiness. I can never be happy, even here in this beautiful world, while she has a grief or a care."

"And have you not in your heart, the least little bit of love for me?" asked this angelic being—my mother.

I looked at her, as I tried to analyze my own feelings. I was given to analysis. What musician is not? Did I love this perfect, this holy, this exquisitely beautiful angelic being—this mother whom I could not remember—this mother who was to me as a stranger whom I had never seen? Yes; my soul intuitively loved and worshiped her. A feeling, something as we are supposed to have toward God, filled my being; but my love and anxiety for my wife, bore down, and overshadowed all other love, and I was impatient to return to her again. My mother's heavenly altitude was too far removed from my own; my father's, even, was nearer to me than hers. My soul cried out in her presence, "holy, holy, holy!" but I was not holy—still of the earth earthy.

"Let us go back," I said. "I long to be with my wife. I want to comfort her. She has comforted me for many years; assuaged my grief and sorrow, poured healing balm into my wounds, and opened my vision to the gates of Eternal Life; and, now, the brightest angel in the heavens, be it who it may, shall not beguile me from her side—for, mother, she has comforted, shielded, supported and cared for me in my sickness, weakness and helplessness, and I will not stay, even in heaven among the angels, away from her."

"Carlyle is right," said my father. "He is obeying the true law of his being; but, my son, you cannot help her until you get a little more strength yourself. You have been gathering love and beauty, rest and peace, but you still need wisdom and strength. These are of slow growth. You cannot be strong while your wife is so weak. You cannot be wise while her mind is so clouded by grief. She is the other half of yourself, consequently you must grow together or not at all. The cord that binds you to her is stretched but not severed."

"Thank you, my father, for saying that; and it shall never be severed."

"Never," answered my father.

"Never," reiterated the gentle voice of my mother. Never! never! never! came the echoes again and again.

Now this gave me courage and strength, and I arose with the intention of returning at once.

"It is not necessary that we go back for some hours yet," said my father. "Time is different here from earthly time. Your wife is still sitting in the same chair as when you left. Our life is higher and its vibrations finer and more rapid than those of earth. They are there still, just as we left them. You can do nothing more just now. Wait until the evening falls upon the earth; then we will return; and while we wait, let us improve the time allowed me to impart to you a little more wisdom, and with wisdom comes strength.

JESUS A COLORED MAN.

Rev. Webb Says He Was, and Gives Bible Facts.

Jesus Christ was a black man, says the pastor of a church at Seattle, Wash. It was only a few days ago when Elder J. M. Webb of the Church of God, quoted chapter and verse from the Bible in a recent sermon to prove that Jesus Christ was a black man and that his features and form were not pretty. Elder Webb is a negro, and he seems convinced that the Savior belonged to the same race as himself.

The elder said that Solomon was a black man and that wise men told the daughters of Jerusalem not to look upon him because he was black.

Elder Webb starts in by saying that Christ was born out of the tribe of Judah, and to trace his genealogy he goes back to Abraham's time, and says that after the death of Sarah, Abraham married an Ethiopian wife named Keturah, who bore him six sons. It is from this stock the elder claims that Jesus Christ sprung.

In his sermon Elder Webb traced the journey of Jacob and his sons down into Egypt and said that two of the sons had Canaanite wives. He said that the Canaanites and Egyptians are all descended from Ham, who is the father of the Ethiopian race. The Israelites remained in Egypt several hundred years and married and intermarried with Ethiopian blood.

Moses, too, married an Ethiopian woman, and Aaron and his wife did not like her because her skin was black. Aaron's wife was stricken with leprosy later on, so she ceased to talk against her black sister-in-law.

The elder claims that just before Moses died the great prophet and lawyer said that God would raise up a prophet who would come out of Israel, from the line of the black generation that Abraham, Simon, Judah and Moses had brought into Israel by intermarrying with Ethiopian women.

Coming down to David's time, Elder Webb says that the psalmist married the wife of Uriah, who was a Hittite, all of whom were descendants of Ham, and that it was from his mother that Solomon got his black skin.

From David the Elder traced the family right down to the birth of Jesus Christ, nearly two thousand years ago, and quoted Isaiah that when the Savior should come to judge the world "His hair will be like wool and not straight."—Ex.

Premonitions.

A majority of women have premonitions, says the New York Press. One clever matron, speaking of the Chicago holocaust, said: "I have been in three theaters that burned down, and on each occasion had a forewarning of what was to happen. There was something in the air. A cold breath, as if a draught had suddenly been created, indicated to me that there was approaching danger. I quietly withdrew long before there was any suggestion of flames. My mother was often influenced in the same way. Some people call it 'a rabbit running over one's grave.' It is an uncanny feeling. Whenever mother felt it she would tell us that some one was about to die—some friend or acquaintance. I never knew her to be wrong."

That Mysterious Wind.

Most of us have experienced that mysterious wind. God was in it, perhaps, when the "still small voice" spoke to Elijah on Mount Horeb. It does not blow, however. The lightest feather is not disturbed by it. Yet we feel it. A chill sensation creeps over us, much like that which one feels on entering a cold-storage vault, except that it seems to affect the mind, heart, soul and all the senses as well as the outer cuticle. If there are spirits in the air it may be their aura which affects us. At sight of ghosts we feel the same identical sensation—whether they be nightmares or some fantastic vision of a disordered brain. There is unquestionably a psychic influence; something not exactly definable, but mesmeric, clairvoyant, hypnotic and somnambulistic.

At the Brooklyn Fire.

At the time of the Brooklyn horror, the Kate Claxton Two Orphans' hecatomb, the first man to leave the theatre remained outside. "What's the matter?" said an acquaintance. "Don't like the piece?" "Very much," was the reply, "but somehow or other can't feel comfortable. I feel like a haunted house. If I were superstitious I'd believe something bad is going to happen around here—an explosion, a railroad disaster, a shipwreck or that sort of thing." He must have felt the speaking wind that never blows, but always forewarns.

In a Panic.

I have been in panics and felt the same sensation of cold and mystery before the outburst of reason. Once in a railroad train I felt it. The "rabbit ran over my grave," and my hair almost stood on end following the imaginary beast's aura. "Something is about to happen," I whispered, anticipating a collision. Almost before the words were out of my mouth, and before we had time to think of preparing for an accident, passengers in the rear began piling over us in a wild delirium of fear, yelling, crying, gasping. Some crowded pell mell through the forward end of the car. Others dived through windows, husbands pulling their wives after them. In a trice the car was empty of all except myself and my companion, who had been pinned between seats. As we arose and looked back the headlight of a following engine drew close up to the rear of the train and stopped. The incident happened a short time after a horrible butchery on the same road, and the nerves of passengers were unstrung.

Education Needed.

Our schools have a fire drill that teaches children what to do in the event of flames breaking out. Our theatres have printed in their programme the exits "to be used in case of fire." Some have these possible loopholes of escape designated by red lights. But who sees exits when dread panic has taken possession of the audience and paralyzed the senses? Who is to tell what he would do in such an emergency? I believe that the roof of every theatre should be an immense reservoir, the flood gates of which would be opened automatically when fire breaks out. The management might then megaphone from the foyer: "Everybody remain seated! It is better to be drowned than burnet alive!" What we need first is a fire proof theatre; secondly—education in the art of escaping.

A DREAM OF LONG AGO.

I stand in the land of the Long Ago,
And my heart is light and my mind is free,
And the breezes are soft as the winds that blow
O'er the isles of the old Aegean Sea.
It is only a dream—would I never could wake
To the throb and to yearn for the youth-time gone;
Would it could last; for the heart must ache
When the Real comes back and the Dream has flown.

I lie by the river of Long Ago,
In the golden time of the golden June.
Oh, the grass is sweet, and the river's flow
Is whispering over the dear old tune
That I hear with a passionate content,
Tho' my heart's ablaze and my pulse aglow;
But I never dream that this life was meant
To hold such a pain as this Long-Ago.

Only a dreamer, and only a dream;
But was there ever a dream like this?
Of lilac and roses, and the gleam
Of a girl's warm eyes, and the clinging kiss
Of a boy's first love—had it been the last,
As I swore in my fervor it should be so!
Perhaps there would be no sting to the past
Or pain in this dream of the Long Ago.

All Agree That the Soul Is Immortal.

There has been a great deal of opposition to Spiritualism by the churches and religious sects of the world and in so doing they have, in effect, condemned all of their own doctrines which are worth preserving. For the great central idea of all religions is the immortality of the soul—the continuity of life—without which they "become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal."

A great many of the churches inculcate the ridiculous notion that it all depends upon what poor, weak, erring humanity may believe about the attributes of the Unknown God, which the Apostle Paul declared to the Athenians, whether the life beyond is happy or miserable. Cicero said he did not see how one soothsayer could look another in the face without laughing. How one orthodox preacher can look another in the face without a broad smile is not apparent.

The Christian Bible asserts that the ways of God are past finding out, and that His judgments are unsearchable; yet the poor struggling soul is required to know all about God and His laws, and to conform to such laws and love their author, on the pain of being consigned to an eternity of misery after death!

The Christian churches and sects also are quite willing to believe that in good old Bible times the souls of the departed communicated with the souls of the living in dreams and otherwise; and they will tell you in the same breath, because the good book says so, that God is no respecter of persons.

Now if the Lord is no respecter of persons, and it seems that such must be the truth, then He permits the communion of the incarnate soul with the discarnate soul just as much to-day as he ever did, and communion of saints across the narrow line of death can occur just as well in America as in Jerusalem. And miracles may happen quite as well to-day as at any former period in the history of the world.

But aside from these and other minor things which the churches and religious cults believe that they believe, they are solid on the main question of the continuity.

The Alpha and Omega of Spiritualistic teachings is that the individual soul can never die; that its course is onward and upward and never backward and downward; that life after what we call death is progressive and continuous; that in proportion that we are intelligent and virtuous in this life, so will be our status when we reach the next stage of life. As we sow so shall we reap; that good deeds and not professions make up the character of the individual soul, and that if real success is reached it must be by well directed effort. There is no sleight-of-hand by which a brutal nature, by the wand of conversion, can be transformed into a saint! CARL C. POPE.

JOHN RUSKIN.

The English Artist and Eloquent Writer.

To the Editor:—John Ruskin, an English artist and eloquent writer on art and nature, and who preceded your correspondent on the earth plane only nine months, was born in London in February, 1819, while your subscriber was born in Bristol, 120 miles distant.

At the age of 51, some of Ruskin's writings were published in Philadelphia, Pa., in which he says: "I had been educated in the doctrines of a narrow sect." It was at Oxford and in the Episcopal, "Established" Church of England. Little wonder that he should so honestly utter the confession above quoted. Aside from the morality inculcated in his lectures, it is observed that he was one of the pioneers in the "Higher Criticism" of the Bible.

Here is a sample of Ruskin's deadly thrusts at the church, as late as 1871:

"The dramatic Christianity of the organ and aisle, of dawn service and twilight revival. * * * This gas-lighted and gas-inspired Christianity we are triumphant in, and draw back the hem of our robes from the touch of the heretics who dispute it. * * * Your wealth, your amusement, your pride, would all be alike impossible, but for those whom you scorn or forget. * * * It is difficult to estimate the true significance of these things. * * * We permit or cause thousands of deaths daily, but we mean no harm; we set fire to houses and ravage peasants' fields, yet we should be sorry to find we had injured anybody. * * * Thomas Chalmers, an eminent Scottish divine (says Ruskin) at the end of his long life, having had much power with the public, uttered the impatient exclamation, 'The public is just a great baby!' * * * The more I see of our national faults or miseries, the more they resolve themselves into conditions of childish illiterateness and want of education." * * * How much like one of our millionaires was that remabrk, "The public be d—d!"

Ruskin, it will be observed, had not then the knowledge possessed by the world to-day in regard to the continuity of life and the ability of our arisen friends to return to earth and tell us of the realities of the life beyond the grave, else he would not have used words like these:

"Is our life forever to be without profit, without possession? Shall the strength of its generation be as barren as death, or cast away their labor as the wild fig tree casts her untimely figs? Is it all a dream, then, the desire of the eyes and the pride of life? or, if it be, might we not live in a nobler dream than this? The poets and prophets, the wise men and the scribes, though they have told us nothing about a life to come, have told us much about the life that is now. * * * Is this what has come of our worldly wisdom, tried against their folly? This our mightiest possible, against their impotent ideal? or have we only wandered among the spectra of a baser felicity, and chased phantoms of the tombs, instead of visions of the Almighty; and walked after the imagination of our evil hearts, instead of after the counsels of Eternity, until our lives—not in the likeness of the clouds of heaven, but of the smoke of hell—have become "as a vapor, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away?"

"Does it vanish, then? Are you sure of that—sure that the nothingness of the grave will be a rest from this troubled nothingness; and that the coiling shadow, which disquiets itself in vain, cannot change into the smoke of the torment that ascends forever?"

As these lectures were published thirty-two years ago, let us hope the great philanthropist, John Ruskin, has had fuller evidence of a life beyond the grave, which his inadequate religious experience did not furnish.

One of our great American authors, more than seventy years ago, (before the era of Spiritualism) wrote as follows:

"It cannot be that earth is man's only abiding place. It cannot be that our life is a bubble cast up from the ocean of Eternity to float a moment upon the waves and then sink into darkness and nothingness? Else, why is it that the aspirations which leap like angels from the temple of our hearts, are forever wandering abroad unsatisfied? Why is it that the rainbow and cloud come over us with a beauty that is not of earth, and then pass away and leave us to muse upon their faded loveliness? We are born for a higher destiny than that of earth! There is a realm where the rainbow never fades; where the stars shall be spread out before us like islands that slumber in the ocean, and where the beautiful beings that here pass before us like shadows, stay in our presence forever!"

I make this quotation, as it was stored away in memory's garret, nearly seventy years ago. It is substantially as the great author penned it. A thing of beauty is a joy forever!

LIFE AFTER DEATH.

Some say that when, with aching heart,
We bend the cold, pale face above;
And softly on the pulseless breast,
Fold the still hands of those we love
That is the end. There is no morn
After the deep, dark night of death;
We are but matter, mind and soul,
All perish with the passing breath.

It cannot be, for oftentimes,
Within the long year since he died;
A presence, that I know full well,
Comes back to me at eventide.
I see the same kind, patient face,
Except devoid of pain and care;
And feel the well-remembered touch
Fall tenderly on brow and hair.

In vain materialists may seek
We are immortal to disprove,
Since from across the silent grave,
Dear hands reach out to us in love.
And tender eyes they meet our own,
With the glad look they had of yore;
And fond lips tell us that they live
Upon a brighter, fairer shore.

The Father Delivers the Funeral Discourse

Maj. C. H. Mathews Delivers a Funeral Discourse Over the Remains of His Daughter, Miss Sarah Agnes Mathews, at New Philadelphia, Ohio.

My friends, on this solemn occasion, it may seem an innovation for a man to make an address at the funeral of a member of his own family. But, my friends, we must look for many social changes in the 20th century. The great world of to-day is on the qui vive for the reception of new ideas.

"The world is waking from its phantom dreams,
To make out that which is, from that which seems;
And in the light of day shall blush to find
What things of night had power enough to blind
Its vision; what thin walls of musty gray
As if of granite, stopped its onward way."

One of the great—in fact the greatest question of the ages, has been and still is: "If a man die, shall he live again?" I am glad to be able, from the testimony of arisen personal friends and relatives, in whom I have the utmost confidence, to assert the continuity of life in that great future that awaits the whole human family.

Spiritualism, (of which the world knows more to-day than it has ever known before), asserts with the greatest assurance the continuity of life, and settles the vexed question of the ages explicitly, and with the great German author, Kotzebue, says. "There is another and a better world!"

This, notwithstanding some notable orthodox Christian clergy, in their wisdom, assert: "We do not yet know that death does not end all."—Bishop Foster.

Sarah Agnes Mathews, my dear daughter, who was bereft of a mother's tender care in 1857, was born March 4, 1853, and would be 51 years old on the 4th of March, 1904. She was of a peculiarly mild and gentle disposition and, for one afflicted as she has been for nearly a score of years, exhibited remarkable fortitude of endurance that was the wonder of her many relatives and friends. She has known for many years past that she could not possibly endure for her allotted time on earth, and having an abiding confidence in the future state, she was fully prepared for the great reality of that condition.

"To trace each feature of departed worth,
Distinguished excellence in fitting terms
Portray, and virtues eminent proclaim;
How vain the task! Alone then let the hand
Of gratitude inscribe this simple truth
Beloved of all she lived, by all lamented died."

When she was scarce three years of age, she was adopted and cared for by Mr. and Mrs. James A. Thompson, her uncle and aunt, who have cared for her and her younger sister; Mrs. Thompson survives at the ripe age of 86 years. Her invaluable motherly, tender care has been fully appreciated.

Spiritualism, (of which it is my privilege, briefly, to speak to-day), positively affirms the continuity of conscious existence of the soul of man, in a spiritual body, after physical death; it teaches us that the soul, through a vast variety of phenomena, can and does demonstrate that continued existence to those still in the mortal body. These "manifestations," now so common, are the common heritage of humanity, and though sometimes simulated, nevertheless furnish a residuum of evidence which defies all solution upon any other hypothesis than that they are the doings of disembodied spirits. To this conclusion every unbiased investigator has come. In fact, no person of sound mind and memory ever did investigate sincerely and honestly, with an earnest desire to investigate and learn the great truths of Spiritualism but became converted. These investigators, I am proud to be able to assert, to-day include the brainiest galaxy of men and women—and the rulers of two continents—who thoroughly investigated the Spiritualistic science, and placed themselves on record as knowing its truthfulness.

But, my friends, however inopportune it may be considered by Mother Grundy to discourse on this subject to-day, I have a carte blanch from the Great Ruler of the Universe, who is all and in all, to go forth and give these truths to the world.

Some one asks the question: "What do Spiritualists believe?" It can hardly be termed a "belief." We claim it to be a knowledge that transcends all mere belief, and is founded upon great spiritual truths that have been revealed to mankind from the earliest years of recorded history. It is, therefore, difficult to make a statement applicable to all. Hudson Tuttle, of Berlin Heights, who has devoted his whole life to the elucidation of the philosophy of Spiritualism, says:

1.—"Man is a dual being—a physical structure and a spirit. The spirit is an organized form, evolved by and out of a physical body, having corresponding form and development.

2.—"This spiritual being is immortal.

3.—"Death is the separation of this duality, and does not affect the spirit morally or intellectually.

4.—"The spirit holds the same relations to the spirit world that man holds to physical nature.

THIRTY EIGHT FEB 15

5.—"The spirit there, as here, works out its own salvation, receiving the reward of well doing, and suffering for wrong actions.

6.—"The knowledge, attainment and experience of the earth-life, form the basis of the spirit life, which is hence a continuance of the same existence.

7.—"Spiritual bodies are evolved by, and eliminated from physical bodies. They differ in grades of morality and intelligence, as men differ on earth.

8.—"These departed spirits, retaining all their love and affection, can and do return and communicate with those in this life. Their capability of so doing does not depend on their intelligence or morality.

9.—"Mediumship rests on sensitiveness, which is not dependent on culture or morals, though elevated and controlled thereby.

10.—Individualized spirit is the reality and the highest type of creative energy. In this sense man is divine, and endowed with infinite capabilities, and united in brotherhood, having common origin, purpose and destiny."

Having thus given you a glance of the spiritual philosophy, I should like to cite you to the many distinguished men and women, and journalists that have accepted its truths and placed themselves on record in its defense during the last 56 years. But this would occupy too much time and perhaps weary your patience. I am sorry to say, but candor compels the admission that, during all these 56 years, since Spiritualism has been given to the world of thought, the church has persistently ignored these manifesting spirits, investigators have been denounced as lunatics and victims of delusion. But I am glad to say that people are beginning to do their own thinking, and a new era of religious thought is destined to permeate the civilized world.

My dear friends, this theme is so exhaustive, that you will excuse me for feeling interested on this mournful occasion. It is unnecessary for me to eulogize my daughter, you all knew her. I will close my remarks by a few lines from memory:

"First, find thou truth; and then, although she strays
From beaten paths of men, to untrod ways,
Her leading follow straight, and abide the fate,
And whether scorn or smiles thy passing greet,
Or find'st thou thorns or flowers beneath thy feet,
Fare on, nor fear thy fate at heaven's gate."

"May the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, be and abide with you all now and forevermore. Amen!"

FOR TEMPERANCE DAY.

Mark that poor, degraded creature,
Lost to honor, sense and shame,
With vice stamped on every feature,
Scarce he's worthy of man's name.
To him no noble deeds are traced,
A trackless waste he's trod;
Each day and hour he has debased
The image of his God.

An outcast self-doomed does he roam,
With naught to make life bright,
No holy ties bind him to home—
O'er home he casts a blight.
His kindred tears may fall in vain
And angels plead for peace,
Unheeded clanks vile passion's chain—
Unheeded scorn—disgrace.

How swiftly speeds his dark career;
Perhaps a felon's doom
Shadows the hidden path that's near,
Leading him to the tomb;
Or on a pallet lowly lying,
In some gloomy prison cell,
Or in some pauper home he's dying,
Waiting for the final knell.

When Death has his victim numbered,
And the die of life is cast,
Conscience awakes, though long it slumbered,
And unveils the bitter past;
For the draught that once enchanted
Now he drains of Sorrow's cup—
By dark specters he is haunted,
Which remorse has conjured up.

Death's icy chill now o'er him steals,
And lips unused to prayer
To heaven shriek his wild appeals,
Half mingled with despair.
Unmourned he fills an early grave
In some neglected spot,
His name sinks in oblivion's wave,
The drunkard is forgot.

WHEN THE TIME SHALL COME.

When the time shall come, shall I rejoice
To lay earth's burdens calmly by,
And turn to list the summoning voice
With joyful pulse and happy sigh?

When the time shall come, will all the care
Of life and sorrow roll aside
And be no more, while longing prayer
For loved ones gone be satisfied?

When the time shall come, will all my strife
And battle for the right be won,
And glancing backward, will my life
Seem but a dream, scarce yet begun?

When the time shall come, will there be one
To grieve that I'm not at her side,
Or will she pass before my sun
Has set—a-near the waiting tide?

When the time shall come, how, when or where?
The laws of life and death ne'er fail.
Shipwrecked I can not be; their care
Will see me "safe within the veil."

From the Spirit Realms.

Spirit Carlyle Petersilea.

While on Earth Mr. Petersilea was a medium for the transmission of important letters from those long in spirit life. Now, having become a freed spirit himself, he will convey his best thoughts through the mediumship of his devoted wife, and we are sure they will prove interesting to our readers.

LETTER NUMBER THREE.

Now, friends, I want you to be patient with me, for I shall tell you nothing but the truth.

My father bore me upward for a space, and then threw me from him. "Learn to help yourself," he said sententiously; and I fell, and floundered, and rose and fell, and floated, and floundered. I felt almost precisely as I did when a boy and learning to swim. I caught at my father; he would sustain me for a little, and then throw me from him again.

"Now, Carlyle," he said, "concentrate your mind. Call together your willpower and be a man once more. You will find it easy enough to stand upright, and move about, without assistance, if you do so."

I knew very well that he was speaking the truth; but I had been partially helpless for two or three months, leaning upon, and being sustained by my precious wife—for I would let no other person come near or touch me.

"Oh! how selfish," I hear you say. Perhaps so. But in my helpless condition she was the world to me, and all there was in it. But I obeyed my father, as I had been accustomed to when a child; and I gathered myself together and exerted my will-power to the utmost; and, soon, I found myself moving along by my father's side quite easily; a few pitches to the right and left, sinking down a little occasionally, but on the whole gaining strength every moment.

"Now," said my father, "we will take a seat here in this arbor, and you can rest and look out for a while."

We approached a beautiful arbor, covered by trailing vines and the sweetest and most fragrant of flowers. I sunk down into what seemed a most restful seat and looked forth. O, my God! what a world of beauty lay stretched out peacefully before me. Peace—peace! my soul cried—rest and peace. My life, as a musician, had not been peaceful. It had been one great struggle since my early boyhood. I had known neither rest nor peace; but here was rest and peace at last. "No—no! Not so. My wife—my wife! What would she do? How be able to live without me? O, my poor wife!" and I groaned aloud. My father's watchful eyes were upon me.

"Carlyle," he said, "gather yourself together, rest and be at peace. Exert your will-power and you will be able to help your wife, otherwise you cannot do so."

That was wise—that was sensible; and I knew it. So I gathered in this rest, this peace. I was immortal, and this was eternity. Why, eternity lay stretched out before me, and my past struggles rose up as foolish and futile. I had always been obliged to work on time, and never had time enough. Oh! how it now rolled in upon my soul that there was no end to time—that I could take all the time I wanted for everything or anything; and I drew a great sigh of restful relief. Rest! I felt as though I could rest forever, and peace lay spread out before me most invitingly.

The landscape was not so very different from that of earth, except that it was exceedingly more beautiful. I could see a vast spiritual ocean, and hear the soft and restful murmur of the vibrating waves. I could see hills and dales, mountains and meadows. I could see sparkling rivers and brooks, and placid ponds and lakes. It seemed as though my sight was eternal—not limited as on earth. My eyes seemed to take in a vast area, as though I were looking over thousands and thousands of miles, where, on earth, I could see but a short distance. This was a joy in itself, and those vibrating waves of eternity, how peacefully they rolled; and while my soul was drinking in joy and rest and peace, I involuntarily turned my eyes toward the entrance to the arbor. A lady stood there—a lady so transcendently beautiful that I caught my breath in a kind of rapture.

Friends, it is impossible for me to describe to you her beauty. No painting or work of art that the earth holds can compare with it. The most beautiful woman that ever lived on the earth is but a suggestion of this greater, more ethereal, exalted and heavenly beauty. Her great, dewy, blue eyes were looking directly into my own. Her long, golden hair, partly concealed her form like a vail, and actually trailed among the flowers at her feet. Her gauzy, flowing robes were palely golden. Her face transparent and softly rounded like that of a beautiful cherub. Her age—well, age could not count with such a being as stood there before me. She might have been a thousand years old, so I thought, if age means beauty in spirit life. I trembled at her gaze but dared not speak. Who was she? Who could it be? Dear reader, for the moment it never entered my mind who she could be.

She stretched out those beautiful, perfect arms toward me; but I simply stared at her in the most stupid manner. She covered her eyes with her perfect hand—a hand that made me think of blush roses and lilies and sweet heavenly passages in Mozart's music—as though a wave of sorrow swept through and agitated her lovely form.

"Carlyle," she said; and her voice was low and sweet as the breeze sighing through trees filled with scented blossoms—"Carlyle" and still I stupidly stared at her.

"Mary," said my father, "how can you expect to be recognized by the child you left so many years ago on earth—the child who cannot even remember his mother—the child who never knew a mother's care?"

I trembled at these words, and my breath came pantingly. I tried to rise but could not.

"Mother—mother! Do we meet at last?" She approached and folded me in her arms.

"My boy—my little Carlyle that was—my little cherub that I wanted so much to take with me—at last, at last you have come!" and she fondled and kissed me as though I were still her little boy of three years that she left fifty-six years ago on the earth, while she was exploring the heavenly spheres.

"We are all here now," she said. "You are the last to come."

I groaned aloud. "No—oh, no!" I said; "not the last. My wife—my wife! She is not here. She is left, all, all alone, down in the cold and cruel world, stunned, and nearly crazed with grief. Mother, if indeed you are my mother, help me to help her. You, in your beauty and holiness, are happy; but she, who has been to me everything that life holds dear, is in sorrow and darkness, beset by grief and cares that are too heavy for her failing strength. Help me to help her, oh, my father—oh, my mother! I love her more than myself; she is far dearer to me than my own life, or my own happiness. I can never be happy, even here in this beautiful world, while she has a grief or a care."

"And have you not in your heart, the least little bit of love for me?" asked this angelic being—my mother.

I looked at her, as I tried to analyze my own feelings. I was given to analysis. What musician is not? Did I love this perfect, this holy, this exquisitely beautiful angelic being—this mother whom I could not remember—this mother who was to me as a stranger whom I had never seen? Yes; my soul intuitively loved and worshiped her. A feeling, something as we are supposed to have toward God, filled my being; but my love and anxiety for my wife, bore down, and overshadowed all other love, and I was impatient to return to her again. My mother's heavenly altitude was too far removed from my own; my father's, even, was nearer to me than hers. My soul cried out in her presence, "holy, holy, holy!" but I was not holy—still of the earth earthy.

"Let us go back," I said. "I long to be with my wife. I want to comfort her. She has comforted me for many years; assuaged my grief and sorrow, poured healing balm into my wounds, and opened my vision to the gates of Eternal Life; and, now, the brightest angel in the heavens, be it who it may, shall not beguile me from her side—for, mother, she has comforted, shielded, supported and cared for me in my sickness, weakness and helplessness, and I will not stay, even in heaven among the angels, away from her."

"Carlyle is right," said my father. "He is obeying the true law of his being; but, my son, you cannot help her until you get a little more strength yourself. You have been gathering love and beauty, rest and peace, but you still need wisdom and strength. These are of slow growth. You cannot be strong while your wife is so weak. You cannot be wise while her mind is so clouded by grief. She is the other half of yourself, consequently you must grow together or not at all. The cord that binds you to her is stretched but not severed."

"Thank you, my father, for saying that; and it shall never be severed."

"Never," answered my father.

"Never," reiterated the gentle voice of my mother. Never! never! never! came the echoes again and again.

Now this gave me courage and strength, and I arose with the intention of returning at once.

"It is not necessary that we go back for some hours yet," said my father. "Time is different here from earthly time. Your wife is still sitting in the same chair as when you left. Our life is higher and its vibrations finer and more rapid than those of earth. They are there still, just as we left them. You can do nothing more just now. Wait until the evening falls upon the earth; then we will return; and while we wait, let us improve the time allowed me to impart to you a little more wisdom, and with wisdom comes strength.

JESUS A COLORED MAN.

Rev. Webb Says He Was, and Gives Bible Facts.

Jesus Christ was a black man, says the pastor of a church at Seattle, Wash. It was only a few days ago when Elder J. M. Webb of the Church of God, quoted chapter and verse from the Bible in a recent sermon to prove that Jesus Christ was a black man and that his features and form were not pretty. Elder Webb is a negro, and he seems convinced that the Savior belonged to the same race as himself.

The elder said that Solomon was a black man and that wise men told the daughters of Jerusalem not to look upon him because he was black.

Elder Webb starts in by saying that Christ was born out of the tribe of Judah, and to trace his genealogy he goes back to Abraham's time, and says that after the death of Sarah, Abraham married an Ethiopian wife named Keturah, who bore him six sons. It is from this stock the elder claims that Jesus Christ sprung.

In his sermon Elder Webb traced the journey of Jacob and his sons down into Egypt and said that two of the sons had Canaanite wives. He said that the Canaanites and Egyptians are all descended from Ham, who is the father of the Ethiopian race. The Israelites remained in Egypt several hundred years and married and intermarried with Ethiopian blood.

Moses, too, married an Ethiopian woman, and Aaron and his wife did not like her because her skin was black. Aaron's wife was stricken with leprosy later on, so she ceased to talk against her black sister-in-law.

The elder claims that just before Moses died the great prophet and lawyer said that God would raise up a prophet who would come out of Israel, from the line of the black generation that Abraham, Simon, Judah and Moses had brought into Israel by intermarrying with Ethiopian women.

Coming down to David's time, Elder Webb says that the psalmist married the wife of Uriah, who was a Hittite, all of whom were descendants of Ham, and that it was from his mother that Solomon got his black skin.

From David the Elder traced the family right down to the birth of Jesus Christ, nearly two thousand years ago, and quoted Isaiah that when the Savior should come to judge the world "His hair will be like wool and not straight."—Ex.

Premonitions.

A majority of women have premonitions, says the New York Press. One clever matron, speaking of the Chicago holocaust, said: "I have been in three theaters that burned down, and on each occasion had a forewarning of what was to happen. There was something in the air. A cold breath, as if a draught had suddenly been created, indicated to me that there was approaching danger. I quietly withdrew long before there was any suggestion of flames. My mother was often influenced in the same way. Some people call it 'a rabbit running over one's grave.' It is an uncanny feeling. Whenever mother felt it she would tell us that some one was about to die—some friend or acquaintance. I never knew her to be wrong."

That Mysterious Wind.

Most of us have experienced that mysterious wind. God was in it, perhaps, when the "still small voice" spoke to Elijah on Mount Horeb. It does not blow, however. The lightest feather is not disturbed by it. Yet we feel it. A chill sensation creeps over us, much like that which one feels on entering a cold-storage vault, except that it seems to affect the mind, heart, soul and all the senses as well as the outer cuticle. If there are spirits in the air it may be their aura which affects us. At sight of ghosts we feel the same identical sensation—whether they be nightmares or some fantastic vision of a disordered brain. There is unquestionably a psychic influence; something not exactly definable, but mesmeric, clairvoyant, hypnotic and somnambulistic.

At the Brooklyn Fire.

At the time of the Brooklyn horror, the Kate Claxton Two Orphans' hecatomb, the first man to leave the theatre remained outside. "What's the matter?" said an acquaintance. "Don't like the piece?" "Very much," was the reply, "but somehow or other can't feel comfortable. I feel like a haunted house. If I were superstitious I'd believe something bad is going to happen around here—an explosion, a railroad disaster, a shipwreck or that sort of thing." He must have felt the sneaking wind that never blows, but always forewarns.

In a Panic.

I have been in panics and felt the same sensation of cold and mystery before the outburst of reason. Once in a railroad train I felt it. The rabbit ran over my grave," and my hair almost stood on end following the imaginary beast's aura. "Something is about to happen," I whispered, anticipating a collision. Almost before the words were out of my mouth, and before we had time to think of preparing for an accident, passengers in the rear began piling over us in a wild delirium of fear, yelling, crying, gasping. Some crowded pell mell through the forward end of the car. Others dived through windows, husbands pulling their wives after them. In a trice the car was empty of all except myself and my companion, who had been pinned between seats. As we arose and looked back the headlight of a following engine drew close up to the rear of the train and stopped. The incident happened a short time after a horrible butchery on the same road, and the nerves of passengers were unstrung.

Education Needed.

Our schools have a fire drill that teaches children what to do in the event of flames breaking out. Our theatres have printed in their programme the exits "to be used in case of fire." Some have these possible loopholes of escape designated by red lights. But who sees exits when dread panic has taken possession of the audience and paralyzed the senses? Who is to tell what he would do in such an emergency? I believe that the roof of every theatre should be an immense reservoir, the flood gates of which would be opened automatically when fire breaks out. The management might then megaphone from the foyer: "Everybody remain seated! It is better to be drowned than burnet alive!" What we need first is a fire proof theatre; secondly—education in the art of escaping.

A DREAM OF LONG AGO.

I stand in the land of the Long Ago,
And my heart is light and my mind is free,
And the breezes are soft as the winds that blow
O'er the isles of the old Aegean Sea.
It is only a dream—would I never could wake
To the throb and to yearn for the youth-time gone;
Would it could last; for the heart must ache
When the Real comes back and the Dream has flown.

I lie by the river of Long Ago,
In the golden time of the golden June.
Oh, the grass is sweet, and the river's flow
Is whispering over the dear old tune
That I hear with a passionate content,
Tho' my heart's ablaze and my pulse aglow;
But I never dream that this life was meant
To hold such a pain as this Long Ago.

Only a dreamer, and only a dream;
But was there ever a dream like this?
Of lilac and roses, and the gleam
Of a girl's warm eyes, and the clinging kiss
Of a boy's first love—had it been the last,
As I swore in my fervor it should be so!
Perhaps there would be no sting to the past
Or pain in this dream of the Long Ago.

All Agree That the Soul Is Immortal.

There has been a great deal of opposition to Spiritualism by the churches and religious sects of the world and in so doing they have, in effect, condemned all of their own doctrines which are worth preserving. For the great central idea of all religions is the immortality of the soul—the continuity of life—without which they "become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal."

A great many of the churches inculcate the ridiculous notion that it all depends upon what poor, weak, erring humanity may believe about the attributes of the Unknown God, which the Apostle Paul declared to the Athenians, whether the life beyond is happy or miserable. Cicero said he did not see how one soothsayer could look another in the face without laughing. How one orthodox preacher can look another in the face without a broad smile is not apparent.

The Christian Bible asserts that the ways of God are past finding out, and that His judgments are unsearchable; yet the poor struggling soul is required to know all about God and His laws, and to conform to such laws and love their author, on the pain of being consigned to an eternity of misery after death!

The Christian churches and sects also are quite willing to believe that in good old Bible times the souls of the departed communicated with the souls of the living in dreams and otherwise; and they will tell you in the same breath, because the good book says so, that God is no respecter of persons.

Now if the Lord is no respecter of persons, and it seems that such must be the truth, then He permits the communion of the incarnate soul with the discarnate soul just as much to-day as he ever did, and communion of saints across the narrow line of death can occur just as well in America as in Jerusalem. And miracles may happen quite as well to-day as at any former period in the history of the world.

But aside from these and other minor things which the churches and religious cults believe that they believe, they are solid on the main question of the continuity.

The Alpha and Omega of Spiritualistic teachings is that the individual soul can never die; that its course is onward and upward and never backward and downward; that life after what we call death is progressive and continuous; that in proportion that we are intelligent and virtuous in this life, so will be our status when we reach the next stage of life. As we sow so shall we reap; that good deeds and not professions make up the character of the individual soul, and that if real success is reached it must be by well directed effort. There is no sleight-of-hand by which a brutal nature, by the wand of conversion, can be transformed into a saint! CARL C. POPE.

JOHN RUSKIN.

The English Artist and Eloquent Writer.

To the Editor:—John Ruskin, an English artist and eloquent writer on art and nature, and who preceded your correspondent on the earth plane only nine months, was born in London in February, 1819, while your subscriber was born in Bristol, 120 miles distant.

At the age of 51, some of Ruskin's writings were published in Philadelphia, Pa., in which he says: "I had been educated in the doctrines of a narrow sect." It was at Oxford and in the Episcopal, "Established" Church of England. Little wonder that he should so honestly utter the confession above quoted. Aside from the morality inculcated in his lectures, it is observed that he was one of the pioneers in the "Higher Criticism" of the Bible.

Here is a sample of Ruskin's deadly thrusts at the church, as late as 1871:

"The dramatic Christianity of the organ and aisle, of dawn service and twilight revival. * * * This gas-lighted and gas-inspired Christianity we are triumphant in, and draw back the hem of our robes from the touch of the heretics who dispute it. * * * Your wealth, your amusement, your pride, would all be alike impossible, but for those whom you scorn or forget. * * * It is difficult to estimate the true significance of these things. * * * We permit or cause thousands of deaths daily, but we mean no harm; we set fire to houses and ravage peasants' fields, yet we should be sorry to find we had injured anybody. * * * Thomas Chalmers, an eminent Scottish divine (says Ruskin) at the end of his long life, having had much power with the public, uttered the impatient exclamation, 'The public is just a great baby!' * * * The more I see of our national faults or miseries, the more they resolve themselves into conditions of childish illiterateness and want of education." * * * How much like one of our millionaires was that remabrk, "The public be d—d!"

Ruskin, it will be observed, had not then the knowledge possessed by the world to-day in regard to the continuity of life and the ability of our arisen friends to return to earth and tell us of the realities of the life beyond the grave, else he would not have used words like these:

"Is our life forever to be without profit, without possession? Shall the strength of its generation be as barren as death, or cast away their labor as the wild fig tree casts her untimely figs? Is it all a dream, then, the desire of the eyes and the pride of life? or, if it be, might we not live in a nobler dream than this? The poets and prophets, the wise men and the scribes, though they have told us nothing about a life to come, have told us much about the life that is now. * * * Is this what has come of our worldly wisdom, tried against their folly? This our mightiest possible, against their impotent ideal? or have we only wandered among the spectra of a baser felicity, and chased phantoms of the tombs, instead of visions of the Almighty; and walked after the imagination of our evil hearts, instead of after the counsels of Eternity, until our lives—not in the likeness of the clouds of heaven, but of the smoke of hell—have become "as a vapor, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away?"

"Does it vanish, then? Are you sure of that—sure that the nothingness of the grave will be a rest from this troubled nothingness; and that the coiling shadow, which disquiets itself in vain, cannot change into the smoke of the torment that ascends forever?"

As these lectures were published thirty-two years ago, let us hope the great philanthropist, John Ruskin, has had fuller evidence of a life beyond the grave, which his inadequate religious experience did not furnish.

One of our great American authors, more than seventy years ago, (before the era of Spiritualism) wrote as follows:

"It cannot be that earth is man's only abiding place. It cannot be that our life is a bubble cast up from the ocean of Eternity to float a moment upon the waves and then sink into darkness and nothingness? Else, why is it that the aspirations which leap like angels from the temple of our hearts, are forever wandering abroad unsatisfied? Why is it that the rainbow and cloud come over us with a beauty that is not of earth, and then pass away and leave us to muse upon their faded loveliness? We are born for a higher destiny than that of earth! There is a realm where the rainbow never fades; where the stars shall be spread out before us like islands that slumber in the ocean, and where the beautiful beings that here pass before us like shadows, stay in our presence forever!"

I make this quotation, as it was stored away in memory's garret, nearly seventy years ago. It is substantially as the great author penned it. A thing of beauty is a joy forever!

LIFE AFTER DEATH.

Some say that when, with aching heart,
We bend the cold, pale face above;
And softly on the pulseless breast,
Fold the still hands of those we love
That is the end. There is no morn
After the deep, dark night of death;
We are but matter, mind and soul,
All perish with the passing breath.

It cannot be, for oftentimes,
Within the long year since he died;
A presence, that I know full well,
Comes back to me at eventide.
I see the same kind, patient face,
Except devoid of pain and care;
And feel the well-remembered touch
Fall tenderly on brow and hair.

In vain materialists may seek
We are immortal to disprove,
Since from across the silent grave,
Dear hands reach out to us in love,
And tender eyes they meet our own,
With the glad look they had of yore;
And fond lips tell us that they live
Upon a brighter, fairer shore.

A Trenchant, Well Reasoned Philosophical Criticism.

"MIND FROM MATTER."

In the San Francisco Examiner, of January 15, Professor Larkin, of Lowe Observatory, writes under the above heading, claiming substantially that matter is transmuted into mind. Had the article been written by a layman, it would have received the ridicule of the general public. For while the assertions in support of his proposition are numerous, his evidence is most conspicuous by its total absence.

He says: "The division of matter into particles so infinitesimal that human minds cannot think of them, by means employed by J. J. Thompson, is one example." But he fails to intimate, even, how matter, though divided into infinitesimal particles can be transmuted—"raised up"—into mind. He makes no assertion in that direction which appeals to the approval of the trained intellect.

How does matter, infinitely divided or otherwise, become transformed into consciousness, or other recognized attributes of mind? A bald assertion is no proof. Imagine a right line drawn tangent to the earth's surface at Mount Lowe, extending through space. Professor Larkin could not by the aid of his telescope locate the termination of such line, or a point beyond which no space exists. He might, were it possible, use a million telescopes, one after the other, each having a magnifying power a million fold of its immediate predecessor, and at each sweep of the heavens with his successive telescopes, new worlds, before unknown, would meet his astonished gaze, but no terminal point of the tangential line could be discovered. He might through endless ages continue the process, and at each sweep of a superior telescope, new worlds, new systems, and amazing wonders of the most thrilling interest would meet his most astonished gaze, but no terminus to the tangential line, no point would be discovered beyond which space does not exist.

Now let him reverse the process, with microscopes of varying powers. Had he lived before the invention of the microscope he would have believed with the philosophers of that day, that the elements of which the earth is builded are four: Earth, air, fire and water. But with the microscope, and improved instruments for investigation and research, he peers into the infinitesimal constituents of matter, and finds that what were considered atoms, or elements, at one observation, prove, with the aid of better and more powerful instruments, to be composed of similar atoms and elements. And could each successive observation be made with microscopes of higher magnifying power and more delicate instruments, the process might continue through countless ages without discovering a particle of matter so small as to be without weight, length, breadth and thickness—so small as to be incapable of being broken into fragments still infinitely smaller. Now, at what point along the tangential line of observation and research, either in the region of the infinite, or in that of the infinitesimal, does a particle of matter become transmuted—"raised up"—into mind—into the conscious, thinking, intelligent ego? Is there any evidence in support of his proposition, or must we—poor laymen—be content with the naked assertion?

Again he says: "The dissipation of all matter now existing in the sun and bodies composing the solar system is another." Science has established the fact that all matter in the universe is in motion, from the immensity of worlds rolling through endless space, to the most infinitesimal particles swimming in the ocean of ether that fills up all the inter-atomic spaces. "A lump of matter," says Sir Oliver Lodge, "is as surely composed of atoms as a house is built of bricks." And science admits that no two of these atoms are contiguous. The lump of matter is composed of non-contiguous material particles and non-material spaces, something like the solar system.

And these inter-atomic spaces are filled with a connecting medium designated by scientists as "ether." This all-pervading ether is not composed of atoms or particles, and as Sir Oliver Lodge says:

"It is not matter as we know it"..."It is not matter in the sense we use the term." Again in speaking of ether, he says: "Substance it may be, matter it is not." And in this, all physicists and philosophers agree with Sir Oliver Lodge. From the time of Faraday to the present time, it has been scientifically demonstrated that every atom of matter can have associated with it, a certain definite charge, or quantity, of electricity, to which Dr. Johnstone Stoney gave the name of "Electron." This Electron, so far as known to scientists at present, is, so to speak, the ultimate unit, or atom of electricity. A particle of matter with one or more electrons attached is called an "Ion." An atom with an electron in excess is a "negative Ion," and one with an electron in deficit, is a "positive Ion." These particles of matter are in constant motion, they are hauled through the inter-atomic spaces of ether by the attached electron, and are coming into constant collision. Sir Oliver Lodge says: "The Electron may be compared to a horse, and the particle of matter, to which it is attached to a vehicle, or body to be hauled along."

These particles of matter have been approximately counted, weighed and measured, by Professor J. J. Thompson, Dr. Johnstone Stoney, Loschmidt, Lord Kelvin and others. From these most delicate and astounding experiments, it has been found that sixty hundred million times one hundred millions of them, occupy only about three cubic centimeters, or about as much as could be held in an ordinary thimble.

Some of these are positive and some are negative, the positive traveling in one direction, and the negative in the opposite. Through the experiments of Clerk Maxwell, Schuster, Crookes, J. J. Thompson, and others, it is found that the atom is not ultimate, as formerly supposed, but it is itself a compound composed of thousands of smaller infinitesimal particles. And so far as known, this amazing motion of the particles, atoms and molecules as they swim through ether is due to the dynamic energy of the electric unit, the Electron, to which they are attached. But whether this energy is inherent in the Electron, or whether it, in turn, is acted upon by some other potential energy, is undetermined. But nowhere in this field of research does it appear that a single particle, atom, or molecule of matter was ever transmuted, or "raised up," into mind.

As all material forms are in constant and eternal motion, from worlds and systems rolling through the immensity of infinite space to the infinitesimal particles and molecules that vibrate and swim through the inter-atomic oceans of Ether, "the dissemination of matter existing in the sun, or solar system," the "evaporation of particles of radium," or the refinement of matter into "light, electricity, or radiance," proves only that there is a constant and eternal ebb and flow of all material forms, whether infinitesimal particles, or worlds and systems. It affords no evidence that matter is "raised up" into mind.

Again he says: "Alcoholic and other poisons acting on brain cells can disturb, distort and finally destroy the mind." The assertion is entirely gratuitous.

There is a large class of men, scientists, able men and profound thinkers, whose opinions are worthy of consideration, who hold that mind is distinct from the human organism—the physical, material body—and superior to it. There is a vast accumulation of facts, a large mass of evidence, tending to support this contention, which can not be ruthlessly set aside by a mere empty assertion. Under this contention, the mind is the potential actor, the brain and the physical organism, the instrument. There is another class of able men, scientists and profound thinkers, among whom, I take it, Professor Larkin is numbered, whose opinions are equally deserving of consideration, who contend that the physical organism is the sum total of man.

If, then, one belonging to the first class should enunciate the proposition that the mind is an entity distinct from the organism, and superior to it, it would be only resonable that he should prove his proposition, or, at least, put forward statements that would meet the concurrence of the trained intellect. It will not do to rest upon a flippant assertion. So, also, if one of the second class enunciates the proposition that the physical organism—the brain—is the mind, the conscious, intelligent ego, he must support his proposition by adequate proof. It is now up to Professor Larkin to prove that an injury to the brain or a destruction of it, affects or destroys the mind. If you cut the telephone wire, or injure or destroy the phone, no communication can be transmitted to the other end of the line. But you must not suppose that by destroying the phone you have killed the man behind the phone. So, also, if it be true that the brain is the instrument through which the mind—the ego—communicates with mind, you must not imagine that an injury to the brain, or a destruction of it, injures, or kills the man behind the brain.

Again he says: "Put a galvanometer,"..."in circuit in a nerve in the human body, on its way to the brain, and irritate the nerve,"..."by twisting, pinching, pricking, or tapping, the needle of the apparatus will instantly move. Put the same little detective in a nerve of metal, twist, prick, or tap it, the needle moves over the index.

Put cocaine, chloroform, or other anesthetics on the living nerve, the needle comes to rest; put the same poison in the same quantities on the iron nerve, the needle rests." From this he seems to infer that a bar of iron is a conscious, intelligent, living entity.

If that be so, perhaps a few crowbars ought to be sent to college to prepare them for professorships in our colleges and universities.

These experiments with the galvanometer amount to this, and nothing more. Streams of electricity course along the nerve of the human body, and in like manner electricity flows over bars of iron, or other metallic substances. By tapping the nerve you interrupt and disturb the flow of electricity, and this disturbed condition of the circuit causes the needle to move over the index, and in like manner the disturbed condition of the circuit flowing over iron causes a similar deflection of the needle, so, also, "cocaine, chloroform and anesthetics have the same effect upon the electric current, whether its circuit be over a human nerve or a bar of iron. These experiments only prove the effect of such drugs upon the electric current.

They prove nothing as to life, consciousness, or intelligence, either in the human nerve or the bar of iron. They present no evidence, nor the semblance of evidence, that matter is transmuted—"lifted up"—into mind. Quoting from Hudson's Law of Mental Medicine, he says: "All organic tissue is made up of microscopic cells, each one of which is a living, intelligent, entity. This includes the bones, hair and nails, as well as the muscle and nerve, and all other portions of the organic structure." The cell is a structural unit in the living organism, as much so as a brick is in a building. Each cell has its function to perform in subordination to the power that builds up the organism, whatever that power may be. They are like the rank and file of an invading army, marching to the tap of the drum, in obedience to the power that builds and shapes the human body, positing through fixed and determinate law, each each structural cell at that point in the organism where its special and peculiar function is to be performed. Sir John Tyndall, one of England's ablest scientists, in his life-time, and a hard-headed materialist, after discussing the mechanical growth of the physical organism, said: "Here you have one-half of our dual truth. Let us now glance at the other half.

"Associated with this wonderful mechanism of the animal body, we have phenomena no less certain than those of the physics, but between which and the mechanism of the body, we discover no necessary connection. A man, for example, can say: 'I feel, I think, I love.'

"But how does consciousness infuse itself into the problem? The human brain is said to be the organ of thought and feeling....But the passage from the physics of the brain to the corresponding facts of consciousness is unthinkable. Granted that a certain definite thought, and a definite molecular action in the brain occur simultaneously, we do not possess the intellectual organ, nor apparently any rudiment of the organ, which enables us to pass by a process of reasoning, from the one to the other. They appear together, but we do not know why. In affirming that the growth of the body is mechanical, and that thought as exercised by us, has its correlative in the physics of the brain, I think the position of the materialist is stated as far as that position is a tenable one. I do not think he is entitled to say that his molecular groupings and his molecular motions explain everything. In reality they explain nothing. The utmost he can affirm is the association of the two classes of phenomena of whose real bond of union he is in absolute ignorance."

These words have ever remained unchallenged by scientists and materialists the world over. And the problem that "Mind is raised up from matter," remains unproven.

SPIRIT TRAVELS WHILE BODY SLEEPS.

BUFFALO WOMAN EIGHTEEN DAYS WITHOUT FOOD—MRS. LIZZIE EVELYN BARR, OF PORTER AVENUE, A PUZZLE TO SCIENTISTS—SHE REMAINS IN CATALEPTIC STATE FOR DAYS AND ACCOMPLISHES "ASTRAL PROJECTION."

The Society for Psychical Research is missing something. Right here in Buffalo is a "case" for one of its investigators and an exceedingly interesting one at that.

The simple statement that a Buffalo woman, for a period of eighteen days, absolutely refused to partake of food, does not on the face of it seem a startling announcement. But when one digs into the history of the person who looks with scorn on blue points, terrapin and other delicacies of the season for almost three weeks and yet remains in good health and spirit, pursuing the even tenor of her way with a calm disregard of the conventional three squares per day, the sensational features of the case crop up thick and plenty.

On Tuesday, January 5, Mrs. Lizzie Evelyn Barr of No. 407 Porter avenue, sat down to a bountifully-spread table in her own home and contented herself with waching the members of her family eat. She could not be persuaded to eat a mouthful and from that day to Friday, the 22d of January, her aversion to food continued.

Puzzle to Physicians.

Mrs. Barr is a Spiritualist and a medium and has a record for strange conditions probably unequaled by any other woman in the United States. During the past fifteen years she has more than once attracted attention through the press on account of the apparently abnormal conditions she exhibited at various times and for which the physicians summoned failed to account to their own satisfaction or to the friends and acquaintances who are deeply perplexed and alarmed concerning her.

Since Mrs. Barr became a believer in Spiritualism she has frequently been unconscious for days at a time, while friends and doctors worked vainly to release her from what seemed to be a state bordering closely on death. She would lie rigid, cold and almost inanimate, all efforts to revive her, such as the application of fomentations and the chafing of her icy limbs, meeting with no response. Nor did powerful electric currents conveying a voltage through her body sufficient to kill a dozen men cause even the quiver of a muscle.

In this condition Mrs. Barr, so 'tis said, was controlled by various "spirits," who assured her distracted relatives that she would in due time awake from her unnatural and prolonged sleep unharmed. The "guides" or "controls" announced that they were subjecting her to such conditions for the purpose of demonstrating their power and to convince unbelievers in the Spiritualistic cult of the truth of spirit return.

Her Kinzua Trance.

One trance in particular which occurred when Mrs. Barr was living in Kinzua, Pa., about thirteen years ago, was made the subject of numerous newspaper articles at the time—New York, Philadelphia and Buffalo dailies sending correspondents to write up the case which presented many sensational features. Of these the most remarkable were the application of scorching heat and strong electric currents without apparent effect.

Not only was she insensible to pain, but the scalding applications, hot irons, etc., left no impression in the form of burns and the tremendous voltage of electricity, no trace whatever.

On this occasion the late Dr. Stranahan, of Warren, Pa., was the physician in charge. He acknowledged at the time that he was completely mystified and unable to account through the known laws of medical science for the distinguishing features of Mrs. Barr's trance. After forty-eight hours of this immobility and insensibility the sleeper awoke as from a peaceful, dreamless slumber, asked for food and expressed the most intense surprise at the solicitude of those around her, declaring that she never felt better in her life and demanding to know "what the fuss was all about."

Astral Projection.

In addition to these prolonged trances some weird stories have appeared in print and have been vouched for by responsible persons, concerning a state of unconsciousness, called stattvolism, with which Mrs. Barr is accredited.

Statuvolism, so far as the writer is able to ascertain, is similar to what is known among theosophists as "projecting the astral body." Plainly stated, it means that the spirit can be separated from the body and appear at a distance with all the semblance of the material presence.

Among the theosophists of the East this is believed to be an absolutely normal condition and one that can be produced at will by those who understand the natural laws governing it.

To Mrs. Barr, however, belongs the distinction of being the first woman on record in this country to assume the statuvolic state.

The following from a paper devoted to psychic phenomena, under date of April 16, 1892, gives a brief account of a statuvolic trance, if it may be termed, as exhibited by Mrs. Barr:

Spirit Spirited to Gotham.

"Her person became rigid and was ostensibly under the control of some unseen power. This continued for half an hour before she returned to consciousness. Upon being questioned concerning herself during that time, she said: 'I have a faint recollection of being carried through space. My control held me by the hand and conveyed me to a large city, New York, he said. A moment later I found myself in a large room or hall containing many persons. At one end was a raised platform on which I saw a beautiful young woman handsomely dressed, who, I afterwards learned, was Miss Clara Parsons, a popular young medium, also controlled by the poet Longfellow. I was pleasantly greeted by her, when I noticed that I was in a handsomely and richly furnished apartment with many ladies present in evening dress. I then felt ashamed of my kitchen costume, but forgot about it soon as Miss Parsons introduced me as her dear friend, Mrs. Lizzie Barr, of Kinzua, Pa. After being cheered, I spoke, but do not remember what I said. I only can recall that I was conscious, and was being controlled by a spirit to speak. When I ceased, Miss Parsons kissed me and next I found myself here again.'

"The writer of this made it his duty as an investigator to obtain the address of Miss Parsons and ask for a description of the seance and, if one was held on that evening.

"The following letter (of which I hold the original) tells the story:

Longfellow a Control.

"New York, March 14, 1892.

"'Mr. T. L. Wilson:

"'Dear Sir:—Yes, we had a very enthusiastic as well as satisfying meeting at my house on the evening of February 1st, about 200 persons being present. Mrs. Lizzie Barr of Kinzua came. She developed splendidly through my control, Mr. Longfellow, who is hers as well, I believe. The last was a splendid one. Mrs. Barr must be a medium of remarkable development, etc.

CLARA PARSONS.

"Yours.

"To my mind this seems conclusive proof, but this is not the only one in confirmation of this statuvolic power or gift. She has also appeared to friends here by prearrangement for experiment's sake."

When asked by a reporter for The Courier what reason she assigned for her prolonged fast, Mrs. Barr said:

Spirit Guides Sustain Her.

"I believe this condition was brought about by a severe tax on my spiritual and mental powers and that my spirit friends and guides sustained me in some way so that I did not need food—digestion and assimilation requiring more vitality than I was at that time able to command through my own physical powers.

"I was not hungry and when urged to partake of food was absolutely unable to retain even so much as a mouthful of milk or an oyster. I had no sensation of taste and, though I have been able to eat a little for a day or so, I might as well chew up a piece of cloth or paper even now as food for all the taste there is in what I eat.

"While my fast continued I was perfectly well, but at times felt a slight weakness or dizziness, which lasted only a few moments at a time.

Have Business Acumen, Too.

"I have the utmost faith in my spirit guides to take care of me, although I had medical advice and was counselled not to eat until I felt that food was desirable.

"For the past four years my guides have controlled me daily to direct the making of an electrical invention which is now nearing completion. Of late the demands on my time and strength have been very arduous and I believe that this peculiar state is designed by my spirit friends to recuperate and afford me strength for the final effort to complete the work with which I have been so long engaged."

When asked to describe the invention to which she referred, Mrs. Barr said she was not permitted to divulge its nature until the work was finished.

Beyond Material Science.

Henry Hanson, an electrical expert, who has been a member of the family for many years, receives and puts into operation the advice of her guides. Numerous complicated drawing were shown the writer from which, it is said, the apparatus constituting the invention was made, and which Mrs. Barr and Mr. Hanson and others declare were not produced by human agency.

Mr. Hanson, while decling to go into details, says that the invention is based on a finer law than is known in the scientific world to-day and which has already been demonstrated satisfactorily to him, but that publicity of any sort at the present time he does not consider desirable.—Buffalo (N. Y.) Sunday Courier.

DISEASE.

Is It Caused by Obsession?—A Curious Experience With Catholic Spirits—They Surround a Man's Bed and Use "Howly Wather."

Having read the experiences of many others in regard to obsession, it is but fair to give the readers of The Progressive Thinker some of my experiences, by way of recompense. It is also a source of study to Spiritualists, are these various experiences.

About twelve years ago, I was staying a few months in Denver, investigating occult phenomena. A friend of mine was a spiritual teacher and healer of some note, and among his patients he was called upon to treat was an old man upwards of 60 years of age, for inflammatory rheumatism. He had been suffering great torments for two or three months and could get no relief from the medical fraternity, and as a last resort, through the agency of an acquaintance, he was persuaded to try this Spiritualist healer.

He was, by the way, a strong Catholic, and it was only to relieve him from extreme torture that he was willing to try almost anything.

I went with the healer to see and hear what I could, as I was an investigator. He gave the old man a magnetic treatment, and when ready to depart he kindly told him he would leave his patient in the hands of good Father Ryan, at one time a Catholic priest when in earth life. He was known to many Spiritualists for his beautiful poetry. He was no longer under the influence of that faith, however. He said also in case he should see spirits during the night not to be frightened as they would not do him harm, but come to his relief.

The next day we called to see how the old gentleman was progressing. To our astonishment his wife met us at the door, and said he did not care to have us come in, alleging as the very strong reason that we were of the devil, and he was afraid of us. But we kindly induced the old lady to let us go in at least and talk with him, assuring her that we would not treat him unless he so desired. She finally consented to allow us to go in to see him, and he related the following experiences he had the previous night:

"About midnight last night, there came about a dozen spirits and stood around me bedside. They set a bowl of wather upon me stomach, and then each of thim washed their hands in the wather. Thin they took some of the wather and sprinkled it over me and the bid. Presently there appeared at the foot of the bid a black divil with tusks in his head an inch long, and leered down at me.

"I knew his was the divil, and I called for me wife to bring the howly wather. She did so, and sprinkled it over me and the bid and to the room, and I defy all the divils in hell to stay where that howly wather is.'

Having received his reason for not wishing further treatment and learned that he had sent for the priest whom he was expecting every soon, we took our leave.

Now the question is, what was it that he saw? The priest used his power and cast out the obsessing spirit that was causing him such excruciating pains and torture; and when he resisted his method, by calling the holy water, did the devil again take possession of him? The man died in less than 10 days from the time of treatment.

Does not this corroborate the teachings set forth by the New Testament, and the healing by casting out of evil spirits? If not, how can it be explained? The facts can be substantiated if you wish them.

"Poems of Progress." By Lizzie Doten. In this volume, this peerless poet of Spiritualism may be read in her varied moods, "from grave to gay, from lively to severe." It is a book to be treasured and richly enjoyed by all who love genuine poetry, and especially by Spiritualists. The volume is tastily printed and bound. Price $1.

HIGHLY COMMENDED.

"Mediumship and Its Laws, Its Conditions and Cultivation."

I have been reading Mr. Hudson Tuttle's book, "Mediumship and Its Laws, Its Conditions and Cultivation, during the past few days, and as it so effectually vindicates mediumship, describing the proper way to form circles and gain the varied forms of mediumship—trance, clairvoyance, psychometry, and also the physical manifestations in their highest and purest forms, I therefore believe that its importance has not been fully understood; that it should have a wider circulation. It is not a book to be read once and laid aside, but one which should be studied until its teachings are fully comprehended.

It is of inestimable value to every Spiritualist or investigator who takes any interest whatever in the phenomenal side of Spiritualism, or who desires to understand the laws governing the return of the departed—and this will include nearly everyone not bereft of those finer influences which actuate humanity, for it teaches so plainly how to avoid the dangers of mediumship, that it is well nigh indispensable to the individual who desires to escape its lower forms and make himself worthy of the presence of a higher class of controls.

Its logic is unassailable, its advice uplifting, and withal it will be of priceless value to all who desire a fund of information with which to combat the charges made by those who think it a "crime" to heed the advice of those who have passed from mortal vision.

I present a few extracts from the book which are particularly applicable at this time, showing the dangers of mediumship and how to avoid them:

"Unless the spirit realm can be approached with unbiased judgment and uncompromising reason it becomes dangerous ground. .... 'Thus saith the Lord' becomes 'thus saith the spirits' with even more disastrous results. Responsible reason yields place to an irresponsible spirit intelligence that impels its blind devotees, not in the course of right, but in the opposite direction."

"The will should always dominate. It is a great injustice to the individual for another to usurp control. The medium thus becomes a mere instrument, and a slave to the will of another. On the contrary the medium should hold himself superior to whatever control may come; should be able to command himself, and thereby the spirits who may or may not enter his sphere."

"When it is found that one is capable of coming into rapport with spiritual influences; that long-desired communion can be held with departed loved ones, the tendency is, in the ecstasy of the moment to yield all other interests to this new-found joy. The paramount laws and conditions of such control are not thought of, and the dangers not regarded. The influences are allowed to usurp the place of the will, and dictate in the most ordinary affairs of life. If only true and trustful friends, the guardian angels, held this control, there would be no danger, although such surrender of personality would be anything but desirable, but by this constant absorption the vital force becomes so weakened, the unsuspecting medium falls into the unresisting state, and passive to any influence, which in the nature of things he cannot know the character of. There are always those who gladly avail themselves of such opportunities, who not to awaken distrust in their instruments, for a time personate the friends who have previously communicated, and thus gain complete control, which they then recklessly use ....Simple purity of thought is not a safeguard, for that may be from ignorance of wrong, and without knowledge a source of danger. It is not absence of inclination, or temptation, but resistance because of wide-knowledge, which holds perfect balance, and all degrading motives and influences in abeyance.... Thinking of the undesired influence, and talking about it with friends, is an exciting cause, and should be discontinued. Those thus sensitive often talk about their troubles until every shadowy whim becomes a reality and fastens on the mind with an energy increasing at every recital. The only advice is that given to those suffering from physical disease: Do not think about it, do not talk about it. Think and talk about things above and beyond."

"The story of Christ and the tempter is instructive. He did not say: 'I am so exquisitely sensitive that the evil as well as the good spirits use me; Satan as well as the prophets.' He exercised the prerogative of developel mediumship and placed the evil spirit beneath his feet."

"Do you want a guide to lead you up to the highlands of spiritual being? Earnestly set your house in order for the reception of a divine guest. Sweep from your door every trace of selfishness, envy, hate, lust, desire, for if you would have the presence of an angel, be as near to the ideal angel as is in your power. Yes, you can choose, but not by simply wishing. The guide who enters your door will be as your innermost spirit.

"If you take a thousand people as they come, and have them write messages, would their communications be superior to those received from spirits? Yet those from the latter source are not from an average, but usually inferior class. Engaged as they are, each in his or her own advancement, it is with greatest sacrifice that elevated spirits come to earth....The lower circles make no such sacrifice....Ever near, they are ready to communicate at all times."

"The wandering fortune-teller represents passivity, while culture of this gift is represented in the sages of the past, as Socrates, Confucius, Mohammed, Lincoln, and hosts of others, who by the concentration of their training became responsive to the thoughts of superior beings."

"There is no use of spirits writing that which has already been demonstrated, to save some indolent medium the trouble of reading it in book or paper. No, learn all you can, from every source available....What has been gained, can only be known by reading the literature of Spiritualism. It is a fountain of new thought, and prepares the mind for receptivity of its own."

"It cannot be denied with truthfulness that excessive use of mediumship impairs the health. It rapidly exhausts the nervous force, just as excessive study or physical labor would do, only more rapidly. But this does not testify against its use, any more than illness often brought on by physical fatigue would show that labor is harmful.... The sweeping assertion, however, that 'all the best' mediums suffer in health or become dissolute, is unsupported by facts."

"All great movements have their dangers, and the brighter the light, the deeper the contrasting darkness."

It is not so much the object of Spiritualism to paint the alluring beauty of the next life as to impress the importance of right living in this."

The quotations given above but faintly outline the immense amount of information contained in this valuable though unostentatious book, and if it was carefully perused, and its advice heeded by every sensitive before attempting to act as mediator between the material and the spiritual worlds, there would be no need for such a book as the one recently discussed at length in your columns. The book, however, speaks better for itself than I am capable of doing and all should try to emulate the high standard set by Mr. Tuttle.

NEW BOOK.

Psychic Light.

BY MRS. DRAKE.

Important Addition to Our Literature.

Mrs. Maud Lord Drake has a national reputation as a medium. The manifestations given through her mediumship have been most marvelous. She has written a book with this title: "PSYCHIC LIGHT—THE CONTINUITY OF LAW AND LIFE." It is a ponderous volume of 600 pages. It will hold your attention from the beginning to the end. It is chockful of stirring incidents. On another page will be found a review of the work by Prof. Singer. Everybody should read this new contribution to our Spiritualistic literature. Price of this large volume, only $1.50 postpaid.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE BIBLE TELL IT.

JOHN E. REMSBURG'S GREAT WORK

The late R. G. Ingersoll stated in one of his famous lectures on the Bible: "Somebody ought to tell the truth about the Bible." John E. Remsburg, former President of the American Secular Union, has taken this obligation upon himself, and the fruits of his studies on the subject are now published in the shape of nearly 500 pages. The "higher criticism" has already plowed this field over quite deeply, but it has reached the ear of the public only in a fragmentary way, and even at that has found a very reluctant echo in the press. So much the more reason for rejoicing that this comprehensive work, got up in simple and popular language, is all contained in a single synoptically arranged book. The separate chapters of the work appeared in consecutive order in an uninterrupted series of articles in the New York Truth Seeker.

The facts set forth in this book about the Bible, its origin, its compilation, its preservation, its falsehoods, its credibility, and the morality it inculcates, are only partially known to the majority of ministers and priests, and it is earnestly to be desired that well-to-do Freethinkers may take it upon themselves to make energetic propaganda of the modern "higher" elucidation of the Bible by gratuitous distribution of this book to public libraries, or to Messrs. the pastors. The enormous expenditure of time and labor which the author imposed upon himself, the astonishingly low price of the book as compared with the attractive form in which it is gotten up, as well as the unanswerable logic of the composer—he lets the holy book for the most part speak for itself—are indeed worthy of the highest praise.

Ingersoll's desire that somebody should at last tell the whole truth about the Bible has been brilliantly fulfilled. No Freethinker worthy of the name can afford to pass over Remsburg's book in silence. Like Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," may it, let us hope, find admirers and translators in other languages. And again, like Paine's book, may this brilliant work bring to its author the praise of posterity.—Der Freidenker (Milwaukee).

This great work on the Bible by Mr. Remsburg is most valuable—it is an encyclopedia of information in regard to the Bible, and surpasses in importance all other works of the kind now published. It is up-to-date in every particular. Price, $1.25, instead of $1, as stated last week.

A VERY IMPORTANT CALL IS MADE.

A GENEROUS OFFER, AND A CALL TO SPIRITUALISTS.

To the Spiritualists at Large:—A generous offer has been made by a prominent Spiritualist in this city to give ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS to the Mediums' Relief Fund of the N. S. A., for the benefit of aged and needy mediums, provided the Spiritualists at large will contribute another Thousand Dollars to the same relief fund by the first of June next. The N. S. A. is now paying out a large monthly sum in pensions to worthy mediums; the calls for aid increase and the fund is constantly being depleted. Let every generous soul who has not already done all possible for this worthy object, kindly send contributions, large or small, to the following address, each will be acknowledged with thanks. The generous man who makes the offer desires to be unnamed to the public.

TWO IN ONE

A COMBINATION OF

"The Question Settled" and "The Contrast" Into one Volume.

BY MOSES HULL.

This highly instructive and interesting work is a combination into one volume of two of Mr. Hull's splendid works. By this arrangement the cost is such that the reader is enabled to secure the two books combined at the same price as was formerly asked for them separately. This volume contains 442 pages and is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains an excellent portrait of the author.

THE QUESTION SETTLED

is a careful comparison of Biblical and Modern Spiritualism. No book of the century has made so many converts to Modern Spiritualism as this. The author's aim, faithfully to compare the Bible with modern phenomena and philosophy, has been accomplished. The adaptation of Spiritualism to the wants of humanity; its moral tendency; the Bible Doctrine of angel ministry; the spiritual nature of man, and the objections offered to Spiritualism, are all considered in the light of the Bible, nature, history, reason and common sense, and expressed clearly and forcibly.

THE CONTRAST

consists of a critical comparison of Evangelicalism and Spiritualism. It is a most able production, and is a perfect storehouse of facts for those who wish to defend Spiritualism, or find arguments against the assumptions of Orthodoxy.

Fiftieth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism.

An elegant pamphlet containing an account of the exercises at Rochester and Hydesville, N. Y., at the celebration of the Fiftieth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism. It contains the addresses of some of the most noted speakers present. It contains the picture of the Hydesville cottage, wreath, etc. Price, 15 cents.

Death Defeated, or the Psychic Secret of How to Keep Young.

This book goes to the foundation of things—health, the laws of health, the foods to eat, the subject of marriage, who should marry and who should not marry, the causes of divorce, the proper time for conception, gestation, the determining of sex, animal flesh-eating, what Herodotus, Hesiod, Homer, Pythagoras, Shelley, Graham and others ate, the foods that produce long life and how to live "immortal" on earth, etc. This book is written in Dr. Peebles' usually clear, crisp style, and attracts the reader from the very first through its facts, logic and convincing arguments. Very handsomely bound in cloth. Price $1.

This finely illustrated volume of between three hundred and four hundred pages, by Dr. Peebles, treats exhaustively of inoculation, cow-pox and calf-lymph vaccination from Jenner's time to the present. It tells how the cow-pox pus poison is obtained—how the vaccine virus, while causing many deaths, sows the seed of eczema, pimpled faces, cancers, tumors, ulcers and leprosy. It gives a history of the several years' battle against vaccination in England. Parliament making it "optional" instead of compulsory. This book should be in every school library and family. Price $1.25.

THE OTHER WORLD AND THIS. A compendium of Spiritual Laws. No. 1, New White Cross Literature. By Augusta W. Fletcher, M. D. In this volume the author, in the thirty-nine chapters, discusses a wide variety of subjects pertaining to Spiritualism, from a spiritualistic standpoint. She evinces the powers of a trained thinker, both in matter of thought and fine literary style, and capability of thought expression. The subjects are well handled with conciseness and yet with clearness. It will prove a rich addition to any Spiritualist's library, and a most excellent book for any one seeking information concerning Spiritualism and its teachings. Price $1.50.

PSYCHE Is the invention of a practical medium, under spirit guidance, and is designed to develop mediumship. Many, by its use, have received long communications from spirit friends, and express great satisfaction. Price, $1, and 20 cents extra for expressage.

INVISIBLE HELPERS

A Very Excellent and Comprehensive Work.

One from the Theosophical Standpoint.

This work, "Invisible Helpers," written by C. W. Leadbeater, the remarkable English psychic (whose lectures have graced the columns of The Progressive Thinker), is certainly very interesting and suggestive throughout. It treats of the "Universal Belief in the Invisible Helpers," the "Angel Story," "Work Among the Dead," "What Lies Beyond." The work is neatly bound in cloth, and the price is 55 cents.

The Religions of the East.

CRUEL GODS OF INDIA—DEITIES OF BRAHMIN FAITH RESPONSIBLE FOR VAST MISERY AND WOE—ANIMAL LIFE IS SACRED—WILLIAM E. CURTIS DESCRIBES HOW JAINS AFFORD PROTECTION TO LIVING THINGS.

William E. Curtis, writing from Bombay, India to the Chicago Record-Herald, gives some valuable statistics and facts in reference to that far-away country. He says:

Bombay, January 30.—Of the 300,000,000 people in India 207,000,000 belong to the Hindu or Brahmin faith, 63,000,000 are Mohammedans, 10,000,000 are Buddhists, 3,000,000 are Christians, 2,000,000 are Sikhs and 1,300,000 are Jains. Besides, these are a number of minor sects, the most important and interesting of which are the Parsees. It is difficult to give an accurate idea of Brahminism, but theoretically it is based upon the principles set forth in a series of sacred books known as the Vedas, written 4,000 years ago. Its gods were originally physical forces and phenomena—nature worship, which was once common to all men, the sun, fire, water, light, wind, the procreative and productive energies and the mystery of sex and birth, which impressed with wonder and awe the mind of primitive humanity.

But these deities become more and more vague and indefinite in the popular mind, and the simple, instinctive appeal of the human soul to a Power it could not see or comprehend was gradually debased into what is now known as Brahminism, and the most repugnant, revolting, cruel, obscene and vicious rites ever practiced by savages or barbarians. There is nothing in the Vedas to justify the cruelties of the Hindu gods and the practices of the priests. They do not authorize animal worship, child-marriage, the burning of widows or perpetual widowhood, but the priests have built up a stupendous system of superstition, of which they alone pretend to know the mystic meaning, and their supremacy is established. Thus the religion of the Vedas has disappeared and has given place to terrorism, demon worship and idolatry.

The three great gods of the Hindus are Siva, Vishnu and Brahma, but besides these are innumerable other deities, some 30,000,000 altogether, which have been created from time to time by worshipers of vivid imagination. When we speak of Hinduism as a religion, however, it is only a conventional use of a term, because it is not a religion in the sense that we are accustomed to apply that word. In all other creeds there is an element of ethics; morality, purity, justice and faith in men, but none of these qualities is taught by the Brahmins. With them the fear of unseen powers and the desire to obtain their favor is the only rule of life and the only maxim taught to the people. And it is the foundation upon which the influence and power of the Brahmins depend. The world and all its inhabitants are at the mercy of cruel, fickle and unjust gods; the gods are under the influence of the Brahmins; hence the Brahmins are holy men and must be treated accordingly. No Hindu will offend a Brahmin under any circumstances, lest his curse may call down all forms of misfortune. A Hindu proverb says, "What is in the Brahmin's books, that is in the Brahmin's heart. Neither you nor I knew there was so much evil in the world."

The census of 1901 returned 2,728,812 priests, which is an average of one for every seventy-two members of the Hindu faith, and it is believed that, altogether, there are more than 5,000,000, including religious mendicants of various kinds and attendants employed about the temples who are dependent upon the public for support. A large part of the income of the pious Hindu is devoted to the support of priests and the feeding of pilgrims. Wherever you see it, wherever you meet it, and especially when you come in contact with it as a sight-seer, the Hindu religion excites nothing but pity and abhorrence.

Buddhism is very different, although Buddha lived and died a Hindu, and the members of that sect still claim that he was the greatest, the wisest and the best of all Hindus. But no two religions are so contradictory and incompatible as that taught by Buddha and the modern teachings of the Brahmins. The underlying principles of Buddha's faith are love, charity and unselfishness, universal brotherhood and spiritual and physical purity. He believed in none of the present practices of the Hindu priests.

There is a striking resemblance between the teachings of Buddha and the teachings of Christ. You will find passages in the New Testament, reporting the words of the Savior, that seem like plagiarism from the maxims of Buddha, and, indeed, Buddhist scholars often tell of a myth concerning a young Jew who came from Syria with a caravan under instruction in a Buddhist monastery in Thibet. Thus they account for the silence of the scriptures concerning the doings of Christ between the ages of 12 and 20, and for the similarity between his sermons and those preached by the founder of their religion.

Buddha taught that good actions bring happiness and bad actions misery; that selfishness is the cause of sin, sorrow and suffering, and that the abolition of self, sacrifices for others and the suppression of passions and desires is the only true plan of salvation.

He died 543 years before Jesus was born, and within the next two centuries his teachings were accepted by two-thirds of the people of India, but by the tenth century of our era they had forgotten, and a great transformation had taken place among the Indo-Aryan races, who began to worship demons instead of angels and teach fear instead of hope, until now there are practically no Buddhists in India with the exception of the Burmese, who are almost unanimous in the confession of that faith. It is a singular phenomenon that Buddhism should so disappear from the land of its birth, although 450,000,000 of the human race still turn to its founder with pure affection as the wisest of teachers and the noblest of ideals.

The teachings of Buddha, however, still survive in a sect known as the Jains, founded by Jina, or Mahavira, a Buddhist priest, about a thousand years ago, as a protest against the cruel encroachments of the Hindus. Jina was a Perfect One, who subdued all worldly desires; who lived an unselfish life, practiced the golden rule, harmed no living thing, and attained the highest aim of the soul, right knowledge, right conduct, temperance, sobriety and chastity.

There are now 1, 334, 148 Jains in India, and among them are some of the wealthiest, most highly cultured and most charitable of all people. They carry their love of life to extremes. The true believer will not harm an insect, not even a mosquito or a flea. All Hindus are kind to animals, except when they ill treat them through ignorance, as is often the case. The Brahmins teach that murder, robbery, deception and every other form of crime and vice may be committed with the favor of their gods. They teach that the gods themselves are guilty of the most hideous depravity, and that the sacrifice of wives, children, brothers, sisters and friends to convenience or expediency for selfish ends is justifiable. Indeed, the British government has been compelled to interfere and prohibit the sacrifice of human life to propitiate the Hindu gods; it has suppressed the thugs, who, as you have read, formerly went about the country killing people in order to acquire holiness; it has prohibited the awful processions of the car of Juggernaut, before which hysterical fanatics used to throw their own bodies, and the bodies of their children, to be crushed under the iron wheels, in the hope of pleasing some monster among their deities. The suppression of infanticide, which is still encouraged by the Brahmins, is now receiving the vigilant attention of the authorities.

Every effort has been made during the last fifty years to prevent the awful cruelties to human beings that were common in Hindu worship, but no police intervention has ever been necessary to protect dumb animals; nobody was ever punished for cruelty to them; on the contrary, animal worship is one of the most general of practices among the Hindus, and all cows are sacred. But the Jains go still further and establish hospitals for aged and infirm animals. You can see them in Bombay, in Delhi, Lucknow, Calcutta and other places where the Jains are strong. Behind their walls are hundreds of decrepit horses, diseased cows and bullocks, mangy dogs and cats and every kind of sick, lame and infirm beast. Absurd stories are told strangers concerning the extremes to which this benevolence is carried, and some of them have actually appeared in published narratives of travel in India. One popular story is that when a flea lights upon the body of a Jain he captures it carefully, puts it in a receptacle and sends it to the asylum where fat coolies are hired to sit around all day and night and allow fleas, mosquitoes and other insects to feed upon them. But although untrue, these ridiculous stories are valuable as illustrating the principles in which the Jains believe. They are strict vegetarians. They will not kill an animal or a fish or a bird, or anything that breathes, for any purpose, and everbody can see that they strictly practice what they preach.

King Edward VII, Emperor of India, has more Mohammedans among his subjects than even the Sultan of Turkey, who is the nominal head of that sect. The 60,000,000 Moslems in India are an enterprising, intelligent and determined people. There is a great deal that is good in the teachings of the Koran, although they have been perverted, and a large proportion of those who profess its faith have shown manliness, devotion to duty, temperance and honesty that must be admired. Several officials of the government have told me that Mohammedans make the best officials in the service and can be trusted farther than any other class, but, speaking generally, Islam has been corrupted and debased in India just as it has been evrywhere else.

One of the results of this corruption is the sect known as Sikhs, which numbers about 2,000,000. It thrives best in the northern part of India, and furnishes the most reliable officials and the best soldiers for the native army. The Sikhs retain much that is good among the teachings of Mohammed, and have a Bible of their own, called the Adi-granth, made up of the sermons of Nanak, its founder, who died in the year 1530. It is full of excellent moral precepts; it teaches the brotherhood of man, the equality of the sexes; it rejects caste, and embraces all of the good points in Buddhism, with a pantheism that is very confusing. It would seem that the Sikhs worship all gods who are good to men, and reject the demonology of the Hindus. They believe in one Supreme Being, with attributes similar to the Allah of the Mohammedans, and recognize Mohammed as His prophet and exponent of His will. They have also adopted several Hindu deities in a sort of indirect way, although the Sikhs strictly prohibit idolatry. Their worship is pure and simple. Their temples are houses of prayer, where they meet, sing hymns, repeat a ritual and receive pieces of "karah prasad," a consecrated pastry, which means "the effectual offering." They are tolerant, and not only admit strangers to their worship, but invite them to participate in their communion.

But the most interesting of all the sects in India are the Parsees, the relics of one of the world's greatest creeds, descendants of the disciples of Zoroaster, the Persian fire worshipers, who sought refuge in India from the persecution of the all-conquering Mohammedans about the seventh century. They have not increased in numbers during all that time, but have retained the faith of their fathers undefiled, which has been described as "the most sublime expression of religious purity and thought except the teachings of Christ." It is a curious fact, however, that although the Parsees are the most enterprising people in India and the most highly educated, they have never attempted to propagate or even to make known their faith to the world. It remained for Anquetil Duperron, a young Frenchman, a Persian scholar, to translate the Zend Avesta, which contains the teachings of Zoroaster, and may be called the Parsee bible. And even now the highest authority in Parsee theology and literature is Professor Jackson, who holds the chair of oriental languages in Columbia University, New York. Professor Jackson is now in Persia engaged upon investigations of direct interest to the Parsees, who have the highest regard and affection for him, and great confidence in the accuracy of his treatment of their theology.

The Parsees have undoubtedly made more stir in the world in proportion to their population than any other race. They are a small community, and number only 94,000 altogether, of whom 76,000 reside in Bombay. They are without exception industrious and prosperous, nearly all being engaged in trade and manufacturing, and to them the City of Bombay owes the greatest part of its wealth and commercial influence.

WILLIAM E. CURTIS.

W. T. STEAD'S REMARKABLE SEANCE WITH A PARISIAN SEERESS.

CRISIS IN THE FAR EAST WAS PREDICTED—RUSSO-JAPANESE WAR THE FIRST ACT IN UNIVERSAL CONFLICT.

In lieu of the Russo-Japanese war just opened, it is interesting to recall Mr. Wm. T. Stead's remarkable seance with the famous seeress of modern Europe, Mme. Mongruel. The seance was held in the compartments of Mme. Mongruel, at No. 6 Rue Chaussee d'Antin, Paris, on July 31, 1900, and shortly after its consummation was given great publicity by the Paris and London journals, extended accounts of it appearing also in New York and Chicago papers in early September of that year.

Mr. Stead, who as editor of the London Review of Reviews,, and as author and reformer of world-wide fame, needs, of course, no introduction, had held a series of seances with the famous medium during the tenure of the Boxer rebellion in China and had received remarkably accurate presentations of conditions there at the time, as later dispatches proved. Not the least noteworthy of these was the information vouchsafed that the legations were safe, in face of a then recent telegram from Shanghai telling of how every European had been massacred with all imaginable atrocities by the Chinese imperial troops and boxers.

It was at one of these later seances that the topic with which this writing deals was revealed. Mme. Mongruel had just described the scene of confusion and bloodshed at Pekin when, in a lull of conversation, Mr. Stead asked her if she could see anything as to the future.

"Yes," she replied, " there is going to be a very great war with much bloodshed."

"Really?" Mr. Stead said. "When?"

"It has already begun," she said. "This is the first act."

"Tell me," said Mr. Stead, "how it will come about."

"The allied army," replied Mme. Mongruel, "will fight and defeat the Chinese. They will beat China terribly, but they will not destroy her altogether. They will pardon her. She will be forced to cede land to Russia and Germany, but as an empire China will remain practically intact. The time will come, perhaps, at the end of a year, when the Japanese will retire, very well pleased with themselves, and they will take no more part in a war against China.

"Then," Mme. Mongruel goes on to say, "you will think that there is going to be peace, but there will not be peace, for the war which has begun in the East will begin again in China and this time the Turks will be involved and the fate of Constantinople will be decided. It will be a great war, and a terrible war. I do not like to look," she said. "It is too awful, for it is a war all round the world. Ah, my poor France," she said. "I will not look further; I cannot bear to see."

Further than this, states Mr. Stead, Mme. Mongruel would not say, only adding that she expected the war would not end for two years. At first, Mr. Stead reports she said twelve months, but at a second sitting she said twelve months for the war in China (which is now in progress), and another twelve months following for the universal war which is to break out and "involve both hemispheres in ruin."

Whether one has belief of the powers ascribed to Mme. Mongruel by Mr. Stead, or not, it will be noticed that her prediction that immediate results of the Boxer rebellion would entail another war, has proven in every particular correct. It is easily discernible from the prediction that Russia and Japan would be the first involved in such struggle, now an actuality.

The retention of land by Russia and Germany on the close of the Boxer rebellion and the subsequent withdrawal of Japan from Chinese soil on demand of the Powers, as depicted by Mme. Mongruel, is now a matter of history.

Pertinent to the subject of a world war is the Constantinople telegram of recent date that that port is making every preparation to profit by Russia's preoccupation with affairs in the far East. It has already become known that extensive arrangements are under way in Turkey to facilitate the mobilization of troops and, so the report says, little doubt is felt in Constantinople that the preparations of the Sultan are for the purpose of leveling a blow at Bulgaria intended to crush her. Bulgaria, on the other hand, is desperately engaged in strengthening her defenses. In view of this Mme. Mongruel's reference to the Moslem kingdom would appear significant.

Russia's alliance with France as well as Great Britain's with Japan, and Germany's strong pro-Russian sentiment, are also worthy of cogitation in this connection. Should Japan be attacked by two powers at once, Great Britain is bound by treaty, to go to her rescue. Russia, in her present sore straits, would gladly welcome the aid of France or Germany, and the former, under pressure of public opinion, would not be backward in entangling herself, while the latter, also, would not be reluctant to enter the struggle herself and break the Franco-Russian alliance with an eye toward possible expansion in China. Our Secretary of State's note to the Powers that the integrity of China must be preserved in the present struggle would add to the predicted imbroglio. And, furthermore, it is only too likely from present indications that China herself may take sides with Japan.

Well, the suspense, at best, will not be long, according to Mme. Mongruel. Whether this Titan conflict takes place as predicted or not, students of the affairs of nations generally concede some such struggle before the political horizon of Europe can be cleared and an epoch of peace and spiritual progress prevail.

Mme. Mongruel, the seeress is now in her seventy-fifth year and enjoys a reputation as clairvoyant and prophetess that antedates the days of the Second Empire. She first attracted attention by prophesying the advent of Napoleon, and has since then searched the dim recesses of futurity with remarkable success.

Remember, please, that we have only two books which we send out now for 25 cents each. We cannot allow you to select any other book or books in their place.

Remember, please, that you are not entitled to any of these Premium Books unless you send in with your order a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker.

Remember, please, that the safest way to make a remittance is to secure a postal order.

Read our Premium Offer, AND DO NOT WRITE TO US FOR ANY OTHER TERMS. You must send $1 for The Progressive Thinker when you order one or more premium books. Please bear this in mind.

Remember, please, that mistakes and trouble may be avoided by dealing direct with this office, instead of through a news agent.

Every person who sends in a yearly subscription to The Progressive Thinker can have until further notice, the two following books for 25 cents each: "The Religion of Man and Ethics of Science," by Hudson Tuttle, and "Seers of the Ages, or, Spiritualism Past and Present," by Dr. J. M. Peebles. Both exceedingly valuable, and though widely different, each one fills an exceedingly important niche in the literature of Spiritualism.

If you order only one book, and that one neither of the books mentioned above, the price is 50 cents.

If you order two books, and neither of them the above mentioned, the price is 90 cents.

We have TEN Premium Books only, and you can select from them as follows:

Lastly all of these TEN valuable Premium Books here announced are sent out, all postage prepaid, for $3.10, a price never before equaled in this country or Europe. The following is the list:

TEN REMARKABLE BOOKS FOR $3.10.

1—The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World, Vol. 1.
2—The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World, Vol. 2.
3—The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World, Vol. 3.
4—Art Magic, or Mundane, Sub-Mundane and Super-Mundane Spiritism.
5—Ghost Land, Spiritualism, Occultism.
6—The Next World Interviewed.
7—The Occult Life of Jesus.
8—A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands.
9—The Religion of Man and Ethics of Science.
10—Seers of the Ages, or Spiritualism Past and Present.

Read This Carefully Before Remitting.

When you send in your subscription to The Progressive Thinker, carefully look over the books which you desire in this list, and their price, and send for them. They are very valuable. They are intensely interesting. They are elevating in tone and will do you good. In remitting do not fail to enclose a dollar for The Progressive Thinker.

These ten books, substantially and elegantly bound, and printed in the neatest style of the printer's art, will be furnished to our subscribers for $3.10, a price which modern machinery and enterprise has rendered possible in The Progressive Thinker office only. Sending out these books, however, at the prices we do, does not reduce the price of the subscription of the paper, apparently or otherwise, a single cent, for that cannot be afforded for less than one dollar per year, in view of the fact that we publish such a vast amount of reading matter.

In conclusion, bear in mind that the postage on these ten premium books is about ONE DOLLAR, leaving this office only $2.10, illustrating the great bargain you are getting—a bargain the like of which was never known before on this material plane.

CLUBS! CLUBS! CLUBS! CLUBS!

To Clubs of ten or more we offer the following terms to each one: The Progressive Thinker one year, and ONE of the following books, $1.15: "The Religion of Man and Ethics of Science"; "Seers of the Ages, or Spiritualism Past and Present"; "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands"; "The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World," Vol. 3. The one who gets up the Club will be entitled to the paper one year free, and any two of the books he may select among our list of premiums.

Man and the Spirit World as Disclosed in the Bible." By Rev. Arthur Chambers, Associate of King's College, London. An excellent book for Christian people who would investigate and learn the facts of Bible teachings as well as modern spirit phenomena. Price, cloth, $1.10.

Bible and Church Degrade Woman. By Elizabeth Cady Stanton. Comprises three essays on "The Effect of Women Suffrage on Questions of Morals and Religion." Price, 10c.

Man the Microcosm. His Infinite and Divine Relations. Intuition—The Light Within. By Giles B. Stebbins. Price, 10 cents.

Father Tom and the Pope, Or a Night at the Vatican. Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "poteen," and an Irish recipe for "conwounding" the same. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

THE ROMAN OCTOPUS.

ITS EFFORTS TO STRANGLE OUR FREE SCHOOL SYSTEM.

An Open Letter to Rev. Jas. M. Hayes.

Rev. James M. Hayes—
St. Ignatius College, Chicago.

My Dear Sir:—I have read with much interest your defense of Archbishop Quigley's position on the public school question published in the Daily News of Feb. 1.

I trust that you will remember that we owe the fact and blessing that the state and church are separate, to the genius and wisdom of a Catholic, Charles Carroll of Carrollton, a member of the Constitutional Convention that created the national constitution.

Recognizing the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, which of course includes the privilege of worship in harmony with conscience, a decision untrammeled, which means an individual opinion regarding duty to God and fellow-man.

It is to the general and individual interest to have an intelligent, moral and industrious population to decide concerning matters in which the entire public is vitally concerned.

Public policy is outlined and citizens vote on its issues, the majority vote decides the contest. Our public school system as it exists to-day is the result of public opinion in which no creed or religion is taught.

Why?

Because the interests of the state are entirely terrestrial in their nature, concerned entirely in the intellectual, moral and economical welfare of all the people.

A nation as well as an individual should provide for its own household. Morality, arts, literature, science, etc., are taught in all our schools, leaving the student free to be taught by parents, priests and their friends in religious matters.

The Brahmin, Confucian, Mohammedan and many other religions can be equally taught here, as well as that religion denominated Christian.

History bids us beware of church and state dual government.

"Godless schools" do you say? Indeed! A term used with a view to render our schools odious to the unthinking and uneducated classes.

Catholics, Protestants, Freethinkers, Agnostics and those your church terms Pagan and Infidel, have an equal privilege in our public schools where no religious creeds are mentioned—only the different branches of education are taught—the single purpose being to develop intelligent moral citizenship.

While attending school sixty-five years ago the Bible was read, hymns sung and petitions were made to God and Christ to bless the schools. The teachers were Protestants. Catholics complained because the Bible read was Protestant. Under these conditions the demurring was justifiable.

The public policy accordingly was changed to a purely secular basis, so that neither Catholic nor Protestant could justly complain. Now we find the Catholic hierarchy again complaining with derogatory criticism, hence the odious term, "Godless schools," is applied to the entire system of public education.

The church thus completely reverses its attitude compared with its contention sixty years ago. A question here arises, was this a plan originally adopted to ultimately place the education of the entire people under the complete control of the Catholic church. The course thus pursued certainly creates that impression in the minds of the Protestant and secular portion of the people.

The united wisdom of the American people has devised and formulated a grand system of public education, wholly approved without complaint from any source except the Catholic portion, the latter only complaining of paying taxes to support these institutions of public instruction which are free to all who are disposed to patronize them.

Disinterested observers are likely to conclude that the controllers of the Catholic church lack confidence in the efficiency of the fundamental basic principles on which their system of religion is founded.

It is your privilege in this country to proselyte for your church by all fair means, but not to condemn the methods of education decided upon by a constitutional majority of the sovereign people.

It is no evidence of godlessness on the part of the devisors of the public school system because the plans confine the efforts of teachers to instruct in all the branches of education and training, for to include credal religious instructions in the many scores of isms and dogmas denominated religion would infringe upon the time necessary for secular study and rob the parents and priests of their prerogative.

We are fortunate to live in this progressively intellectual country and scientific age where there are no church inquisitions to accuse, condemn and execute without an opportunity for defense; a free country, a free people to freely discuss all subjects, to educate and train the youth and, then leave the parents and church to teach any shade of religion they choose, without calling on the community to pay the expense of so doing.

If the public school courses of teaching does not meet the approval of any church organizations, there are two courses for them to pursue; one is to refuse to patronize the schools, the other to alter the laws constitutionally provided.

Tracing the history of so-called Christian countries, with their constant warfare upon each other and upon Science particularly, the true savior and civilizer of all religions, only for the martyrs who perished in behalf of the promulgation of science, by the power controlling the church, holding the state in secondary position, what, suppose you, would be the status of civilization today?

It is not our purpose to criticise the motives, only the conduct of those in highest authority along down the ages.

If the axiom holds good, "By their fruit shall ye know them," the recorded acts of their lives alone should be sufficient to counsel the maintenance of wholly secular, instead of ecclesiastical inquisitional institutions.

"Science bows at no human shrine; she seeks neither praise nor applause; she only asks investigation." Happily she did not perish with her votaries who redeemed the world from the thralldom of the dark ages, which ages were the direct result of the tyranny of the powers which directed and controlled ecclesiastics.

Commencing with Emperor Constantine's convention, known as the Nicene council, I must decline to relate or comment upon conditions that followed in limited detail; all science, art and literature perished; the dark ages, the night of ignorance and superstition became universal, enduring for more than thirteen hundred years, in all of which time Europe did not double her population.

Rome, the mistress of the world, fell from her grandeur, with five million intelligent active people to five hundred thousand vagabonds; then, as the darkest hour is just before the break of day, a Copernicus, a Bruno, a Galileo was born, who in turn gave birth to science, the forerunner. They nurtured the science child with the loss of their liberty and blood; it survived, had many votaries, whose numbers have constantly increased notwithstanding the church was ever alert with fagot and fire to suppress their heresy.

For full four centuries the warfare has been waged. As the Science child increased in influence and importance, in that proportion the church decreased in its power to control.

As time makes progress, science will continue its evolutionary development, then finally there will come the naturally true and only enduring RELIGION, THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY, THE FATHER-MOTHERHOOD OF GOD, THE BROTHER-SISTERHOOD OF MAN.

Yours, for the good time coming,
C. H. HORINE.

ADMIRES THE SEERS OF THE AGES.

I have finished reading "Seers of the Ages," by Dr. J. M. Peebles. Whereas all of the premium books are within themselves peerless, containing grand truths and sublime thoughts beautifully set with rare gems, yet the greatest of all the gems in the coronet of refined gold is the "Seers of the Ages." It is based on solid facts, kindly expressed, free from aggressive tones, yet persuasive in its truths; the fragrance of its knowledge sweet as the aroma of celestial fields, kindles anew the flame burning on the altar of my soul. Its author, who knows whereof he speaks, it seems, did not give the half that he could. The hungry soul is always calling for more, more! His brain is packed solid with scenes, experiences, wonders, both physical and spiritual, things that most of the world think about as remarkable, he is familiar with, having seen, tasted, touched and handled. We only regret that the Christian readers cannot take in some of the experiences of this gifted writer and thinker. We much wish that they could lay aside their dry bread, in which there is no sweetness, and come to our bountifully spread table and partake of the nectar thereof. May this grand author and his co-workers in the vineyard of research, tarry in the mortal and develop fairer qualities and purer Spiritual literature still. The Progressive thinker is growing better, were it possible, every issue. Its productions gleam its pages with glorious joy, that, "If a man die he lives again." Death is the open door to a higher life that we love and cannot forget our earthly lives, our joys and sorrows.

"More than all I thank thee, Heavenly Father that I live;
The bounties from thy hand I will most surely give;
Free from orthodoxy, and its dead and withered heart,
I'll sing God's praises in my soul, and in life do my part."

How Some of Our Readers Can Make Money.

Having read of the success of some of your readers selling Dish-washers, I have tried the work with wonderful success. I have not made less than $9.00 any day for the last six months. The Mound City Dish-washer gives good satisfaction and every family wants one. A lady can wash and dry the dishes without removing her gloves and can do the work in two minutes. I got my sample machine from the Mound City Dish-Washing Co., of St. Louis, Mo. I used it to take orders and sold 12 Dish-washers the first day. The Mound City Dish-Washer Co. will start you. Write them for particulars. Ladies can do as well as men.

LAKE HELEN CAMP, FLA.

Notes From Southern Cassadaga Camp.

The arrivals at Camp Cassadaga during the past week and stopping at Hotel Cassadaga are W. W. Wheeler, Oakfield, Wis.; Mrs. S. R. Guild and Mrs. T. H. Kelley, of Brookline, Mass.; Mr. E. E. Vail, New York; James Burge and wife, A. Ely and E. Jennie Connel, New York; H. P. Gray and Leana Burns, Fairfax, Ga.; Mrs. Julia Pierson, Brunswick, Ga.; Frank Wilder, Spring Valley, Minn.; W. W. Stewart, wife and child, Conway, Fla.; Mr. Chandler, W. Palm Beach, Fla.

Those who are at the Webster, just outside the grounds are F. H. Wheelan, San Francisco, Cal.; Willard D. Ball, Cincinnati, Ohio; Mr. and Mrs. A. D. Evarts, Bristol, Vt.; Mrs. Flora A. Bishop, Melrose, Mass.; Dr. Wm. G. Maynard, Chicago, Ill.; Col. J. B. Chesney, Baltimore, Md.; O. G. Wanless, Anoka, Minn.; J. B. Steele and wife, Pittsburg, Pa.; W. W. Marshall and wife, Hardwick, Vt.; C. H. Anderson, Rerlands, Cal.; Mrs. J. Vignier, Lily Dale, N. Y.; Mrs. J. S. Duss, Economy, Pa.; Col. R. T. Van Horn and wife, Kansas City, Mo.

The opening week of the Southern Cassadaga Camp has been a very busy one notwithstanding there has been two days of very inclement weather. The cold breezes from the Northeast have not been pleasant, but when we read about the weather in the North we feel greatly blessed that we are only receiving faint zephyrs in comparison.

Mr. Colville's morning lessons have gone on most successfully, gaining in numbers and interest each day.

The dances have been very pleasant, with an absence of the rough element very perceptible, beginning at 7:30 and closing promptly at 11.

The Dixie Gingerbread Social was quite an event; although it was very rainy over fifty were present.

Conferences on Monday and Friday.

On Tuesday, Prof. Peck gave the first of a series of five lectures upon The Religion of Evolution, which he expects to give, the first being The Evolution of Worlds.

On Thursday afternoon the writer spoke upon the subject, "And He Went to His Own Place."

On Saturday, Mr. Colville spoke from subjects which were given by the audience: Divine Metaphysics, Eternal Punishment; and The Twin Brothers, Sleep and Death, and closed with a poem from different subjects chosen by those present.

Sunday morning, the 14th, a goodly number came in from the adjoining towns and with the campers there was a very fine audience. Mr. Colville was the speaker of the morning and discoursed upon the subject, Man Visible and Invisible, and closed with an improvised poem.

Our singers, Miss Whitney and Miss Salinas, aided by Prof. Peck, are doing good work. Prof. Longley's songs are great favorites here and the ladies sing them with great expression. They will cheer the world long after their author has said good-bye to pains and age but "Though they may forget the singer they will not forget the song."

Mr. Budington's Hymnals are used for Congregational singing and prove very acceptable as familiar tunes are sung with words adapted to them that sing into souls the gospel of Spiritualism.

The afternoon sermon was opened with a solo by Mr. Colville, "Angels Ever Bright and Fair." He was accompanied by Miss Whitney upon the organ.

Mr. Peck's discourse was listened to with intense interest by the large audience and his conclusions that there was intelligence in all the lower forms of life—that all nature was alive with sensation—that there must be an Infinite Intelligence that ruled the worlds. At the close of his lecture President Bond requested Mr. Peck to improvise a poem upon the subject of the afternoon which he did in a way that made the strangers wonder.

The Ladies' Auxiliary has already placed over one hundred dollars in the hands of the treasurer of the Association. This sum was made possible or nearly a fourth of it by the kindness of our sister, Mrs. Fannie Root, who has for weeks been very ill. Two years ago she began the blocks for a quilt, of which she did every stitch. Every block was stamped differently, and she outlined every figure before she had her most serious sickness. Mrs. Eva Carrigue, vice-president of the Ladies' Auxiliary, sewed them together and feather-stitched all the seams, then Mrs. Rachel Bryan, of Indiana, took the quilt and put it on the frames and attended to the quilting, which willing hands helped about. No long stitches were allowed—Aunt Rachel's eagle eye would see them. After it was most beautifully completed, Mrs. Bryan sold $25 worth of tickets upon it and J. D. Kilmer, of Willoughby, Ohio, drew the quilt. Mrs. Bryan says it's no trouble to sell tickets on anything—why, they came for tickets after they were all gone. "Thanks to every one who helped to finish it," was the word Mrs. Root sent next day, even though very ill she thinks of the cause and called for The Progressive Thinker to read the moment the fever had gone down so she could see to read. So many of both women and men are willing to help about our work and entertainments, I am afraid I should forget to mention all if I began to name them.

The Butler House was begun less than ten days ago and is now enclosed and will be finished before long.

Mr. W. Carroll and wife, Dr. Carroll, of Jamestown, N. Y., came a week ago. Mrs. Carroll is in poor health but hopes for speedy improvement.

Mrs. Bartholomew, Mrs. Brown and Mrs. Steele have done excellent work at the Wednesday afternoon seances for the benefit of the Woman's Auxiliary. Mrs. Bartholomew's trumpet seances are considered very convincing.

A load of people drawn by four white horses visited the camp on Saturday, and took dinner at the Spencer House.

Our corresponding secretary, Mrs. J. D. Palmer, has recovered from her severe cold, and will send information about the camp to those who desire it.

HEALING THE SICK.

"They Shall Lay Their Hands on the Sick, and They Shall Recover."

My father-in-law, of Mancelona, Mich., has had many spiritual experiences. This narrative I wrote down as he told it to me and I reproduce it here.

"Forty years ago my family and I lived near Petersburg, Monroe county, Michigan. There I became acquainted with a family named Rose, leaders in the Methodist church at that place.

"After I had moved away, I returned to look up evidence to get my pension. I called on other old acquaintances first, thinking I would not call on the Rose family for fear I would get into a religious discussion with Mr. Frank Rose; as we were both Masonic brothers, I wanted our friendly relations to continue.

"One day I was going past the house, not intending to call. When I was opposite the door, I was stopped and could not go any farther. I was in a normal condition and could not see anything in the way; but I felt with my hands and feet some obstruction like a stone wall, which was a spiritual obstruction. I looked around in wonderment. I saw Mr. Rose, whom I had passed unobserved. I returned to him near the fence and made myself known. Then he insisted on my staying all night with him. When I promised, we started for his house. He stopped me and told me his wife was very sick, and not expected to live. We went into his house and visited together. During our short visit, Mrs. Rose called him into her sick room several times to wait upon her. Then she told him to ask me to come in to take off her fever.

"Then he said to her: 'You are becoming awful flighty. Shall I not call in the girls to look after you until I run down for the doctor?'

"'No! Call in Mr. Lesher to take the fever off; for the angels have told me that they stopped him out in the road to come in here to take the fever from me.'

"Then Mr. Rose invited me into her room. I walked up to her bed and took hold of her hand. Then I said, 'Mrs. Rose, you have an awful fever.'

"She replied, 'The angels have told me that they stopped you out in the road to take this fever off from me. Now, do you think you can do it?'

"'Yes, indeed,' said I. Then a clairvoyant trance came over me, and I saw above her head her angel band of five, and opposite was my spirit band of five whom I recognized. Then I told her to be perfectly quiet for a few minutes. I quoted these words of Jesus: 'They shall lay their hands upon the sick and they shall recover,' and Mr. Rose repeated after me the same words. So saying, I laid my hand on her head.

"Soon she said, 'Mr. Lesher, now feel my pulse and see how the fever is all gone.'

"'I see that the fever has left,' I replied.

"'Now, Frank, you see what the angels can do when we give them a chance,' said she.

"'Yes, I see now,' replied Mr. Rose.

"The woman recovered, and many similar cases have I healed. It makes me happy, because their thankful thoughts flow back to me. Such blessings make me rich in spirit, richer than worldly possessions can make me. As there are no pockets in a shroud, gratitude and thankfulness for kind acts are the most pleasing possessions to take with us here and hereafter."

Psychic Properties of "N" Rays.

Any thing that in any way tends to cast light upon and elucidate any form of psychic science, is of interest and value to those engaged in the investigation of psychic subjects of whatever grade or form. Hence it will be read with interest that French metaphysicians and scientists are prone to investigations into occult mental and physical phenomena, and are never satisfied unless they have something unusual to engage their attention. Professor Charpentier, a Paris student, following up the experiments of Professor Blondiot, another Frenchman, has found that the penetrating lights, the "N" rays, discovered by the last named savant, are diffused by the human body, and have many peculiar and useful qualities. They are capable of traveling through metals and opaque substances, under certain conditions, and excite and brighen up phosphorescent bodies. Sunlight contains "N" rays, which, when the sunlight has been shut out, continue to pass through the interposed barrier, and will excite the phosphorescence of a small quantity of feebly insulated sulphure of calcium contained in a thin tube of glass. A cigarette paper dipped into fresh water will intercept these rays, while if salt water is used it is not a barrier.

Professor Charpentier, using a totally dark room, approached platino-cyanure of barium and found that, as he drew nearer to it, its luminosity increased, thus proving that "N" rays are sent out by the body. He found, too, that the brightness of the object increased when he contracted his muscles. It was asserted at first that these rays are stored in the body by the sun, but Dr. Charpentier has found that, after remaining hours in total darkness, his body gave out more and stronger "N" rays than before.

There is much speculation as to the effects this new discovery will have on medical science. One writer, in discussing the matter, tells of the case with which an examination of the heart may be made by "N" rays.

"A little luminescent object may be moved slowly over the skin around the cardiac region," he says; "the exact limits of the organ and the exact character of its pulsations wil be beautifully shown by the increasing and decreasing luminosity of that little luminescent object, pulsating light in response to the 'N' rays sent out in greater intensity when nearer to the contracting muscle."

It is asserted, too, that these "N" rays are responsible for the powers exerted by hypnotists, telepathists and mind-readers, the person diffusing many and strong rays easily dominating one who is weak in that respect. According to Sterling Heilig, who writes from Paris regarding the new discovery, it will be a very important factor in psychological investigations.

The Anti-Toxin Trust.

It may be thought by the people at large that the doctors are not making much use of the recently discovered anti-toxins, but the fact that there are three great manufacturing establishments engaged in the preparation of them shows that they are used to a large extent, and now that these establishments have entered into a trust for the purpose of enhancing the already exorbitant price, indicates that it is not humanity for which they labor, but money. If the anti-toxin possessed the qualities they claim for it, to put a price on it beyond the reach of all but the wealthy would be little short of murder. This is what they have done, doubled and tripled the price, and the doctors divide the exorbitant charges with them. It is not probable that one in a thousand of those treated with their remedies know anything about them. The doctor recommends them as something sure to cure, and the parents by the bedside of a suffering child do not allow a few dollars to stand between its restoration and death. They would give all they possess, even their own souls, for a cure.

What are anti-toxins, and how are they made?

The numerous serums (anti-toxins) for diphtheria, tetanus, consumption, pneumonia, etc., are prepared in a similar manner. We will illustrate by diphtheria. In sterilized flasks of beef broth, diphtheria germs are placed and these flasks are placed in an "incubator" for two or three weeks when a scum forms over the surface, and by the growth of the germs a most violent poison, a toxin has been formed by them in the fluid. The broth is then filtered through porcelain to separate the germs from the poison fluid, for it is the latter that is used. Then a horse in a stable where a hundred or more are kept, has a quantity of this fluid injected into its veins. Not enough to kill, but a terrible fever sets up and the horse is desperately sick. When it recovers a larger injection is given. The horse is again down with fever, but sooner recovers. This is repeated until the animal is not affected by the largest quantity. The blood has been prepared, and now the poor victim has to give it up. A few quarts a day, until it is judged that he can spare no more.

This blood is allowed to coagulate, and is filtered, for it is only the watery part that is wanted. It is mixed with a disinfectant, and put up in tubes hermetically sealed, a dose in a tube, ready to be injected into the veins of any one whom the doctors declare suffering from diphtheria, if the friends interested are willing to pay the charges.

A horse will supply an immense amount of this fluid, and the only cost is the use of the animal for the short time he is suffering the several attacks of fever, and recovering his strength from loss of blood. To the promoters of this scheme there is a veritable Klondike in a horse that is able to yield several thousand dollars worth of anti-toxin serum. It is manufactured and used with the same audacious confidence that has been given all new remedies, with a sublime trust in the ignorance of the patients who pay the bills and take the consequences. That these toxins are beneficial, is not admitted by all physicians, nor by half of them. The best informed hesitate over their use, and those who have employed them well know how uncertain, and often fatal are the results. If the toxins were unquestionably curative as claimed, the manufacturers who have tripled the price which was exorbitant before, should be dealt with as criminals.

Happily the toxin serum is not what is claimed for it, and for the good of the patients it were well if the trust made prices absolutely prohibitory. The whole practice with these anti-toxins is based on the wildest scheme of quackery ever recorded, and the strangest thing is that the medical profession should give it attention. The toxin in the blood of the horse is none the less poisonous, and the horse-serum is affected with the fever which is the symptom of its ferment and diseased condition. Is it not self-evident, does it need a word of argument, that such serum, the rotten blood of a horse, can be injected into the veins of a child, and not produce the most serious disturbance? Is it not sufficient to cause death? And we find in the history of cases given by physicians, that frequently after giving this remedy, there is heart failure, or general collapse. This is always referred to the disease, but the same dose given to a well person would give rise to the same symptoms.

Is the materia medica exhausted, and has all the treatments and remedies up to the present time for pneumonia, consumption, lock-jaw, diphtheria, etc., been valueless? Are physicians willing to confess that up to this time they have been as empirical as the veriest quack?

Escaped Premature Burial, Lives Seven Days, and Then Dies.

The following from Harrisburg, Ill., has many points of interest to the psychologist, and emphasizes the contention of The Progressive Thinker for more care in making sure that the spirit has really departed:

An incident which occurred here a few days ago equals, if it does not surpass some of the miracles related in the Bible. Ulysses S. Roberts had been afflicted with consumption for nearly a year. Two weeks ago his condition became worse and a few days later he called his wife and two children to his bedside and, kissing them good-bye, told them of his fast approaching end. In the presence of the family, Rev. A. S. Maxey of the First Methodist Episcopal church, Attorney R. S. Marsh, the family physician and relatives, he apparently died.

An undertaker was called and all necessary preparations were being made for the funeral. Three hours had elapsed, when suddenly the supposed dead man smiled and opened his eyes.

Roberts asked them how long he had been gone, and when told three hours, he said:

"That's strange; it seems to me I have been gone a thousand years. I have been in heaven and I have been so happy."

He told of his meeting with his father, who had long preceded him, and other relatives and friends. Many questions were asked by Rev. Mr. Maxey concerning heaven and the description given by Roberts was wonderful. Among other things he said the Lord sent him back to perform a mission.

"But," said he, "I have just seven days to remain on earth, when I will leave you until we meet up yonder."

When asked by Rev. Maxey as to how Jesus appeared, he said he was almost always happy, except that at times when he beheld this earth steeped in sin an expression of sadness overshadowed his face.

True to Roberts' prediction, on the seventh day and the very hour named, he passed away—for the second time, his relatives firmly believe:

If this man was so weakened by disease that he sank into a death trance, how was it possible for him to return again to mortal life? The only plausible answer is that the trance is a recuperative process and the spirit gathers strength by spirit aid, to stay a little longer.

It is also remarkable that his experience, like all trance subjects, is colored by his belief, thus becoming clearly subjective, while other things appear contrary to his expectations and are as clearly objective.

It emphasizes the necessity of making absolutely certain that our friends here left their mortal bodies before burial.

CULTURE.

The Best Scholars in the World Blunder.

A Maumee, Ohio, Spiritualist remarks, January 30, that mediums stumble over syllables. He is right. The English language is "fearfully and wonderfully made," and it is not surprising that those from the "spirit side of life" find its nouns, verbs, predicates, subjects, cases, tenses, moods, nominatives barriers to inspiration, unless the medium is educated. It is but just to the mediums to admit that many, yes, many of the finest scholars are constantly tripping over "prepositions," and, to an alarming extent, are guilty of redundancies, pet phrases, that is, stereotyped expressions.

Mr. Charles Watts, of England, is one of the most accurate speakers of English I ever heard. So was Col. Ingersoll an almost perfect English speaker; but bear in mind that there are no infallibles in language or religion. In Chautauqua assemblies I sat for hours, pencil and note-book in hand, listening to the most distinguished scholars that Christianity has produced, and they all failed!

Yes, the Maumee Spiritualist is right in saying, "several of our best lecturers" violate the rules of language. I have endeavored to help them over the rough places. One young gentleman in Chicago, an easy speaker, but a blunderer, employed the word aura a number of times, so I knew his use of the fine word was not a lapsus linguae. He said "ora." We will send it after "rel-lums."

Almost universally Spiritualists, not the mediums and best lecturers only, but the "laity," mispronounce the pretty French word "seance." As near as I can represent it with common letters, they say "se-ans." It should be "sa," long a, not long e; "ongs"—the "o" sounds of o in "on," thus, "sa-ongs," primary accent on second syllable. All the French spirits from those rel-lums have never overcome this error.

One of your finest lecturers says "men-ace" (accent wrong—should be on first syllable).

Another eloquent gentleman says "empyr-ean"—wrong accent and wrong vowel-sound. Accent the penult, thus: empy-rean—long e sound in next to last syllable.

There are grammarians, orthoepists, linguists of the first magnitude in the "land that is brighter than day;" but, for some unaccountable reason, they have never deigned to teach "the children of earth" how to speak! A public lecturer, under inspiration, said, "We can come to you, but you cannot come to we." At a sa-ongs the spirit of Murray purported to be present. "Are you the spirit of Lindley Murray." Spirit: "I are!"

Let the good work go on.

WEAVER IS OPEN TO CONVICTION.

Famous General and Politician on Spiritualism—Declares That His Neighbor Woman Can Perform More Wonderful Stunts Than Anna Eva Fay Ever Did.

"I'm not a Spiritualist, and I'm not a scoffer. I'm simply open to conviction."

With these words General James B. Weaver, famous as a warrior and a politician and more recently showing marked tendencies to blossoming into an oil magnate, closed a dissertation on Spiritualism to a group of newspaper men at the Savery hotel. Reference to some feat of Anna Eva Fay called forth the general's remarks.

"Very wonderful; very wonderful, no doubt," began Mr. Weaver. "I should like very much to witness a performance by Miss Fay, but, do you know, nothing you have said about her can compare for a moment with the wonders performed by a neighbor woman of mine down at Colfax.

"I refer to Mrs. DeWolf Kiser. She and her husband live near us, and we are excellent friends. The Kisers are well-to-do and highly respectable. They have plenty of this world's goods for their own comfort and are not seeking to make capital of Mrs. Kiser's peculiar power. My friend Kiser often invited me over to his house and urged me to witness some of the remarkable things done by his wife. He sometimes remarked that several of my 'departed friends' desired to speak to me.

Determines to Try a Seance.

"At last I called on the Kisers and I want to tell you that I was wholly unprepared for the developments. Mrs. Kiser asked me to think of some one whom I would like to talk with. I thought of three persons. One was my mother, another was a political friend and another was a veteran with whom I served in the Civil war. They represented the dearest persons to me that had departed this life. Mark you, Mrs. Kiser didn't know anything about any of them and I didn't even tell her their names. I simply thought of them. Presently she remarked that there was a big, fat, jolly fellow that wished to speak to me. She said he said 'Hello, Jim,' and that he had been wanting to see me for a long time. She went ahead and detailed his conversation which was remarkably similar to his style of addressing me. There were 'ear marks' by which I could have recognized his talk from out of a hundred and it is mysterious to me that Mrs. Kiser was able to describe these features so accurately. She described his personal appearance to a nicety and finally concluded by correctly telling his name. He was my friend, the doctor, with whom I served in the army.

Baffled by Slate-Writing.

"Next she reached for her slate and asked me to hold it. It was an ordinary folding slate such as one sees in the school room. I opened it and examined it closely to find that it was perfectly blank, then closed it. As I grasped it I heard the scratching of a slate pencil and distinctly felt the vibrations within. I passed my hand over, under and around the slate and clutched it the more tightly to make sure that no extraneous force was doing that writing. At last Mrs. Kiser told me to open the slate and therein found a two-page letter from my political friend. There were peculiarities of expression and reference to circumstances which showed beyond doubt that he must have had something to do with it. Following this I had a communication from my mother.

She Doesn't Know How She Does It.

"'How do you do this?' I asked of Mrs. Kiser. 'I don't know,' she replied. 'I simply do it and I don't know how nor why.' And, do you know, I don't believe she does.

"No, I'm not a Spiritualist and no member of my family is, and none ever was that I know of. I simply grant that there is something that science hasn't yet fathomed which enables some people to make such wonderful manifestations. I'm not a scoffer nor a believer. I'm simply open to conviction.

George Wood Regrets Suicide.

"It is very strange to hear Mrs. Kiser tell of communications she has had with the spirit world. She details conversations that she claims to have had with numerous personages and it is extremely interesting to me. Take the case of George D. Wood, the banker, who committed suicide two months ago. I esteemed him most highly as a friend and neighbor. He was an extraordinarily fine fellow and I was intensely grieved to learn of his sad death. I knew in reason he must have been out of his mind or he would never have taken his own life when he apparently had so much to live for.

"One day I remarked to Mrs. Kiser that I thought it strange that Wood committed suicide. 'Yes, and he says he's sorry,' she promptly rejoined. 'I was talking to him only this morning, and he said that he believed it the most foolish thing he ever did.' She then went on to recite at considerable length her conversation with Wood and it was remarkable for its resemblance to what I instinctively felt he might have said."

A Golden Dream.

In a matter concerning dreams I will add more evidence of a true and genuine spiritual dream.

In 1893 there was a little placer gold boom started on Johnson Creek, heading in the Blue Mountains, San Juan county, Utah. I had never been a prospector before, but I got a presentiment to prospect for the source of the Johnson Creek placer gold. I got an old-time prospector to go with me. We established our camp near the head of one of the Johnson Creek forks, and prospected a couple of weeks, but had no success in finding anything very good, so we decided one Thursday evening to move camp the next morning three or four miles further north, on the other side of the mountains, and on that night I had a very vivid dream—in fact it seemed too real to be called a dream. It seemed that I was on a hillside, sloping to the west, prospecting leisurely along, and I heard a voice ahead of me as I was going toward camp. I looked, and saw a stranger coming toward me in great haste, and he seemed to be greatly excited. He put his hand on my shoulder and said: "You stay here a little while. I will come back. I want to see a fellow over the hill here. I have found something awfully good down here, and I want you to go with me, and you shall have a finger in the pie." He rushed out of sight in a few minutes.

I stood there a few moments thinking what to do, but concluded to walk out in the direction he came from, and stayed out in a little opening, clear of brush and timber, and there I saw that the ground was actually covered with a yellowish and red oxydized iron ore; it seemed that the ore was rich and a great deal of it, so my dream ended.

The next morning at the breakfast table I was relating my dream or vision to my partner, and he said, "I think you will strike it to-day." I had first finished relating my dream when our horses came running by the camp terribly frightened, and as the country was new to them we were afraid that they would quit the hills, so we took after them, and overtook them in about a mile. One of my horses was badly hurt, so I proposed to take an easier route back to camp, and as I got within about 500 feet of it I came out into a little opening that seemed very familiar to me. I stopped and looked around for a moment, and my dream came to me, and here I was on the identical spot I saw in my dream, and the ground was literally covered with float from a 120-foot vein. I filled my pockets with samples and went to camp. My partner and I panned the ore, and it panned well, so we did not move camp, but located the ground, and called the claim "The Golden Dream." Since then there has been some very rich assays made from the ore.

CHURCH HISTORY.

Pope Joan a Myth—St. Peter Another.

The existence of a female pope was scarcely doubted prior to the Protestant Reformation, but since then ample proof has been adduced that the story is a fiction. A full acount of the case appears in Bower's History of the Popes. The author was a Scotchman, born 1685, died 1766, educated at Douay in France, went to Rome, became a Jesuit, began to doubt the apostolic succession, fled to England in 1726, there embraced the Protestant faith, and from his very ample materials and resources made the History of the Popes the crowning work of his life. In Vol. II, pages 221-7, he writes about Pope Joan, but does not number her in her papal succession. I quote;

"That no woman ever did sit in that See, and consequently that Pope Joan is a mere chimera or phantom, has been made so evidently appears by several Protestant as well as Roman Catholic writers, that I can scarce help charging those with want of candor who still maintain so stale and groundless a fable.

"The female pope owes her existence and her promotion to the Roman Catholics themselves; for by them that fable was invented, was published to the world by their priests and monks before the Reformation, and not discredited, upon their authority, even by those who were most zealously attached to the Holy See, and among the rest by St. Antonius, Archbishop of Florence; nor did they begin to confute it until Protestantism reproached them with it, as as reflecting great dishonor on the See of St. Peter."

The author adduces proof that on the death of Leo IV A. D., 855, the clergy and nobility of Rome met immediately and unanimously elected Benedict as his successor; then they waited upon him in a body at the church of St. Callistus, where they found him at his prayers, and forthwith carried him to the Lateran and placed him on the pontifical throne.

In conclusion the author says that the story of a female pope is "universally rejected by men of learning, whether Protestants or Papists, as an event first mentioned by writers who flourished 200 years at least after the fact in question, and absolutely irreconcilable with indisputable facts related by contemporaneous historians."

Among the many scandalous additions to the story it was said that her holiness having presumed to exorcise a demon, and commanded the devil to tell her when he was to quit her body, he answered:

Papa pater partum, Papisse pandito partum,
Et tibi tunc eadem in corpore quando recedam.

Which alleged spirit communication I freely translate as follows:

O father of holy men! Female papa!
O pontiff rotund in Episcopal See!
If you can tell when you're to be a mamma,
Then I'll let you know when the demon shall flee.

The Rev. S. Baring-Gould, who disproves the existence of Pope Joan, admits that a "marble monument representing the popess and her baby was erected on the spot." And its existence in 1413 is attested by Theodric of Niem, a papal secretary, who believed it to represent a female pope, though it might have been an ancient pagan statue. It was placed in the cathedral of Siens, among the popes between Leo IV and Benedict III, and inscribed "Joan VIII, an English woman." But Joan VIII reigned from 872 to 882, while the female Joan is said to have reigned from 854 to 856; and it is certain that Leo IV, her alleged predecessor, died July 17, 885, and his successor, Benedict III, was consecrated in September following. The statue of the female pope was subsequently metamorphosed into that of Pope Zachary, who reigned from 741 to 752. Finally in 1677, it was destroyed. Doubtless it was an ancient pagan statue like many others that have been transformed into Christian saints. Even the ancient chair of St. Peter has engraved on its back the twelve labors of Hercules, as Bower proves in his history of the first pope, Peter, who like Pope Joan, is a myth. See article in The Progressive Thinker of March 8, 1902 on "The Chair of St. Peter."

But it does not follow that all the early bishops of Rome were myths. The Roman Empire always had bishops, priests, monks and nuns. Under the first emperor and long thereafter these were votaries of Augustus. At the beginning of the eighth century the idolatry had changed to the worship of IES CHRESTUS, "Good Bacchus." His idol was carried from Pontus, on the Black Sea, to Alexandria, where Bacchus and Osiris became one. The Greek inscription on the statue was I H S, the H being equivalent to the Roman E. The Greek letters were in later times interpreted by the Catholic cult to stand for Iesus Salvator Hominem.

"What we do not know and are very doubtful about," says "Nummus," the coin expert, "is, what was the religion of the Roman Empire between the fourth and eighth centuries. It was certainly not Christianity; the coins prove that much without a doubt. Was it Manechaism, or Mithraism, or Bacchism, or the worship of Hesus, all four combined? The coins, tombstones, and other monuments of that period belong to all of these religions, some to that of Serapis, some to a worship of the sun distinct from Mithraism, and a few to Isis. In the midst of this religious confusion the worship of Hesus, as practiced in Gaul, was not without its votaries in Rome, whose political union with Gaul must have largely augmented their numbers. Lucan and other Roman authors refer to this cult; there are many monuments of it still in existence, yet it is seldom mentioned in modern works." (Truth Seeker.)

We know but little of the prevailing religions of Rome after the worship of Augustus was superseded by that of imaginary deities. The Rev. Theodore Parker, who died in 1859, declared that there was more writing done in Boston in thirteen days than in all Europe in the first thirteen centuries.

WM. HENRY BURR.

PEACE AND WAR.

The Triumphs of Peace Superior to Those of War.

In these times when we see the nations of the world making strenuous efforts to become more efficient in the destructive work of its armies and navies, it is a pleasant and profitable employment to review the triumphs of peace in the industrial world. If we are not careful we will get into a pessimistic train of thought, being more or less oppressed by the aggressive war spirit which is made manifest by the different nations in their dealings with each other; and think we see in that an ominous sign of human degeneracy. But when we view the subject with the care and intelligence that is necessary, we see that it is only the spasmodic efforts of the old order of life with its violence, trying to retain its supremacy in the face of the triumphal march of the principles of Peace.

To illustrate what has been done on the line of peaceful triumphs, we would point to what England, that most aggressive of nations, has accomplished in Egypt in the construction of the great Nile dam at Assouan. It is a work that has been done directly in the interests of peace and a higher civilization. In the planning and construction of that gigantic undertaking militarism has had nothing to do. By retaining the surplus waters of the Nile to be used for irrigating purposes it will literally make the desert blossom as the rose. Over one million acres of what was formerly desert will be made fruitful by irrigation, and the cost of construction will, it is estimated be defrayed in less than three years by the increased wealth of the land that has been brought under cultivation.

Another great enterprise to help the advancement of the peaceful conquest of the world is the one inaugurated by the reclamation of the arid lands of our western states and territories, by building storage dams at the head of the rivers, retaining in flood times their surplus which would without that restraint cause great destruction to life and property. Irrigating canals will make fruitful millions of acres which at present is worthless land as far as any practical benefit is concerned.

Another great project in the interest of peace is the inter-oceanic ship canal across the isthmus of Panama, which the United States has virtually pledged to see completed. It has been talked about for over three hundred years, and its construction will be one more bond to bind the nations of the world together, making it more impossible to inaugurate war. It will be one of the great triumphs of peace, showing to the world that nations do not need war as a means by which they may expend their surplus energy.

These and others that will follow are the triumphs of the civilized human over its inherited brutal instincts which through the ages that have passed have to a great extent dominated human life, but which will be superseded by the more beneficent forces. The angel of peace is not a weakling, a mere negation in the great struggle of life to attain to higher conditions; but it is a vigorous potent being, determined to show to mankind some practical results of the superiority of peaceful pursuits over those of war. In projecting and successfully accomplishing those peaceful measures there is plenty of opportunity for the individual or nation to bring to the front and utilize that latent energy which the advocates of war claim can only be done through exploiting the military instincts.

Before our good old mother earth has had all of its waste places made to blossom as the rose and become fruitful gardens, there will have to be a tremendous amount of energy intelligently expended by its inhabitants. That in time those forces will be more fully utilized in peaceful pursuits we firmly believe. The inspiring words of Gerald Massey will illustrate this glorious advent:

"'Tis coming up the steeps of time,
And this old world is growing brighter,
We may not see its dawn sublime.
But high hopes make our hearts throb lighter.
We may be sleeping in the ground
When it shall wake this world in wonder,
But we have felt it gathering round
And heard its voice in living thunder;
'Tis coming, yes, 'tis coming.

"'Tis coming now, the glorious time
Foretold by seers and sung in story,
For which when thinking was a crime
Souls leaped to heaven from scaffolds gory.
They paused nor saw the work they wrought,
Now the crowned hopes of centuries blossom,
But the live lightning of their thought
And daring deeds doth pulse earth's bosom.
'Tis coming, yes, 'tis coming.

"Aye, it must come, the tyrant's throne
Is crumbling with our hot tears rusted.
The sword earth's mighty have leaned on,
Is cankered, with our hearts' blood crusted.
Room for the men of mind, make way,
Ye robber rulers, pause no longer,
Ye cannot stay the opening day
The world moves on, the light grows stronger,
The people's advent's coming."

HAMILTON DE GRAW.

Hurrah!" for "Our God."

The ancient Israelite declared: "Their God is not as our God, our enemies themselves being judges."

Why? Because "our God" gave us victory in our warfare against our enemies. We gained the victory because "our God" helped us to overcome and slaughter our enemies.

In view of the conquering Israelites, they felt justified in exultingly declaring: "The Lord ("our God") is a man of war," a veritable slaughterer of the enemies of his people.

The same military spirit is rife to-day among the Christian nations of the world. Each combatant people appeals to its own "our God" for protection and defense, and for victory over "our enemies."

An instance of this sort of pious militarism is afforded by a recent order of the day, issued by the Russian commander Alexieff to the Russian troops. He says: "Our God, who has always upheld," etc. And he closes with this peculiar utterance: "God be with us. Hurrah!"

This pious military ejaculation reminds of the sinner at the mourner's bench, who after long wrestling to find salvation, surprised the audience by suddenly leaping high and crying out: "Hurrah for God!"

If the war should finally go against the Russians, would they continue to "hurrah"? Or would they come to the conclusion that the Japs' God was stronger than "our God?" There is a lesson in these things, for the study of the thoughtful.

TARES.

PLAIN TALK WITH REFERENCE TO VEXATIOUS WEEDS.

Given in Language That All Can Understand.

"Nay, lest while ye gather up the tares ye root out the wheat with them."

Shall we longer be governed by that command?

Look about you to-day, and need you wonder why so many excellent men and women refuse to identify themselves with the various Spiritualistic societies, although they are firm believers in the continuity of life and spirit return.

It it because Spiritualism is an unpopular truth?

No!

They know that as members of an association they would come in touch with so much that would grate upon their spiritual and moral sensibilities. They are fully satisfied that certain societies have condoned, and even endorsed by continuous employment, mediums that have been caught in deceptive tricks time and time again; and these exposures have not been brought about by unprejudiced unbelievers, but by life-long, upright, honest Spiritualists.

Can you blame people for keeping aloof when their presence in societies of the kind mentioned, would give countenance to fakerism and fraud? Now, let us examine the two classes with which we have to deal. First, we have the out and out faker who cannot give a genuine manifestation. They do us but little harm, and are soon relegated to oblivion in spite of the protests of a few gullibles that are willing and anxious to swallow anything, claiming to be a spiritual manifestation.

The second class that we have to deal with is composed of parties that should be dealt with most severely. They are the ones who possess mediumistic gifts, but when in their normal condition are of the earth earthy.

On certain occasions when conditions were favorable, and the circle harmonious, the best of results were obtained. The messages and manifestations were genuine. They were what they purported to be—true messages from spirit friends; but knowing from experience that a failure is likely to occur, and no show no pay, they are prepared for all such emergencies, and with paraphernalia and tricks they perpetrate a fraud, and sooner or later are caught and exposed through the Spiritualistic press. Then we are confronted with a strong and positive declaration, backed up with sworn affidavits of old Spiritualists that they are all right, for they have thoroughly tested them.

Now what are we going to do to get rid of these barnacles that are weighting down our glorious cause? Well, I propose this as a first step. After a medium has been caught tricking, never permit his or her name to appear in the columns of the Spiritualist papers, no matter how well backed by testimonials. Never allow them to appear in any of our societies. Never allow them to appear on our camp grounds, even as spectators.

Root them out!

Never mind the destruction of a little pure wheat, it is better thus than to have the whole field of growing grain choked to death.

It is to be regretted that under this plan, some innocent parties at times might suffer. Better so than that thousands of innocent people, with mourning hearts, should be robbed of their hard-earned dollars, and driven from our ranks with disgust and aching hearts.

Root out these triflers with the heart's most holy and sacred ties. These warts that have checked our growth, and been a bar to progress. With these moral "degenerates" eliminated from our ranks, our honest mediums would no longer suffer from the cruel suspicions of the unbelieving multitude.

Spiritualism offers the only rational explanation for the phenomena of life, here and hereafter. Within its philosophy there can be found a reason for the existence of all other systems of thought, and upon the acceptance of its truths, depends the salvation of the people from ignorance and sin, and when its light is no longer impeded the nations will learn war no more, and the long night of darkness and superstition will have passed away.

Is Spiritualism Progressing Backward?

In support of an assertion in an article published in The Progressive Thinker of Dec. 12, under caption of The Paucity and Injustice of Traditionary Evidence, Etc., which is as follows: "The reversion of religious customs and ceremonies seems to be unique in the Spiritualistic ranks; for while most of the old-line churches have been creeping mollusk-like in the direction and pace of a snail, yet their new infant is undoubtedly creeping crustacean-like in the pace and direction of a craw-fish." I wish to have republished a few excerpts from a sermon by the Rev. Ford Fisher, of Franklin Avenue Congregational Church, Cleveland, Ohio, and delivered Sunday, Feb. 14, on "The Religion of the Future," which follow:

"Our intent and purpose, however, is not to become analytical and pedantic, but prophetic and practical. What, then is the outlook for Christianity? Is the cry to be, 'back to the old paths!' or 'forward to the tree of knowledge?' * * * The simple truth will mark the religion of the future. All robes and miters, and crosses and crucifixes, and gorgeous altars, and pomp and splendid ceremonials shall be as filth underneath the feet."

"Don't you suppose that the God of the late lamented Herbert Spencer, and Darwin and Huxley was far more intelligent than the God of those who believe in a divinity with a personality like a man, way off in some remote corner of his vast universe, watching the machinery, and judging right and wrong in human actions?"

"The church of to-day must either be reformed from within or destroyed from without. Reformed in spirit, not the patching up of creeds but deeds." "The ministry must be ordained of God (naturally) not of men (artificially)."

"They must have the primal endowment of a resistless personality."

I present, and ask the publication of the above for the especial consideration of the creedalites in the Spiritualistic ranks, hoping that they may thereby be helped to see that their course has a defensive as well as an offensive side; and also to suggest that "A decent respect for the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the cause that led to the separation.

The Signs of Promise.

A Lecture Delivered by Mrs. H. P. Russegue, at Springfield, Mass.

I have selected for my subject this evening, "Watchman on the Heights, What Are the Signs of Promise?"

When the Druid built his altars, they were based upon foundations he considered immovable. He prepared the soil with exquisite care, upon which he placed the basic stone with mathematical precision, believing that the signs of promise would be revealed to him by the wonderful light of it. When the man of the Southern spheres sought the signs of promise, he pointed to the Southern skies, and asked in which direction the light of the central star was beaming, believing that from that source came to him the answer to his prayers, and the supply to his necessities. When the shepherds were asking for the signs of promise, and the world was clamoring for a new light to shine upon their pathway, behold the Star of Bethlehem revealed the resting place of the Jesus Child. The world has looked backward to that sign of the olden times, and upon the promise it gave they have builded religious beliefs; they have formulated faiths, they have prophesied the future, they have outlined the hereafter, they have created heaven, they have established a hell, they have marked the line between good and evil, they have made castes of humanity, and to-day, the world is asking what is the sign of promise?

The different conditions of human life, as they are presented to the thoughtful mind, awaken within that mind the inquiry, what are the ultimates of these conditions? They are not confined to the religious world alone; they are not limited to the present year, for there are causes imminent whose ultimates reach out into the future, and out of which the great promise must be made, not with sin, or injustice, but it must be made with the rights of man. Man stands a dominating individual upon the threshold of every necessity, he stands before the world a light to shine in every direction, that all there is in him, there is of him, or there is for him, must go out unto the human family, that there may come back to him that for which he craves, that for which he is recognizing a need. These rights do not pertain alone to the conditions of belief, but they are practical in their issues, practical in their applications. They are real in their relative conditions between man and man.

Capital and labor have presented their conditions to the world within the last few years, and the world has come to discover that through the test contest there is shining a great need, and the need pertains to both classes: Wrong is upon either hand, right is upon either hand, and the discriminating intellect of man must gather out of this great confusion, and the great conflict, that which is best, most just, and righteous, for humanity. This, friends, is one of the most important suggestions for your contemplation; it is one of the most important things for discussion; it is one of the most portentous signs for the future; it is one of the brightest lights, if it is received in the right spirit, that can shine into your lives, and that shall equalize the rights of men, and bring you into righteous relationships.

Labor is as independent in its condition, as is capital in its. There is a mutual dependence one upon the other. Rome fell because of her luxurious extravagance. Ancient Carthage tottered upon its walls; Nineveh and Babylon were razed to the earth, because of their injustice that prevailed from man to man. To-day, the signs are pointing to similar issues, only that there is a higher civilization, and a more just and equal consideration of human rights. The facts of the past stand out boldly upon the ancient skies, and he who runs may read the signs of the times. It is not simply I am that I am, or I shall be, it is not simply that there is a future for one or for all, but what are the conditions of the present? What shall be the conditions of the future, that shall make the best, and shall bring the best results, for the benefit of humanity? In your knowledge of the conditions upon this planet, you will recognize that this conflict has been going on for many years.

There will never be a true religion upon the face of the earth, until the rights of man stand out, and are recognized. John Wright, the defender of human rights, proclaimed that there is no such thing as righteousness for the human soul, until men are dealt with righteously, and justice is measured out to all. Garrison, and Phillips, and your own defenders of human rights, those who battled bravely for the rights of man, regardless of color or nation, those who stood firmly upon a foundation against all the persecution that could be heaped upon them, proclaimed this one principle, and it is that which fires every earnest, honest soul to-day; it is that which awakens in every human heart the obligations we owe to our fellow-men. They proclaim the right of liberty to every human soul. To-day, all that is required is the rights of human liberty. No license is demanded, or asked for, but liberty in its highest and holiest meaning is asked for for the race, and the race does not mean man in general, any more than it means man individually. What is right for the nation is right for the man, for man is a part of society, society is a part of the state, the state is a part of the nation, and a constitution for a nation should become, and is, the constitution for the man. The rights of man belong to him in his position as painter, as worker, as inventor, as daily laborer, as professor of learning, as a promulgator of law, as a preacher, as a philosopher, as a teacher, and man in his own position, is as justly entitled to the highest right, to think, and to demand that which is just and equitable to him, as is the man who administers large estates, and governs millions of dollars. Thus, this recognition, living in the hearts of men, has followed the great conflict that is going on. It is not confined to a miracle. Its fires are burning upon the altars. Every nation is feeling its influence. The great heart-throbbing of human life is pulsating toward the great good for human life, and it is time that we have religion, for religious life, to illumine our souls, that we begin to investigate the causes that have induced these conditions.

First of all, however, I wish distinctly to preface the next remark with this explanation. I believe that every formulated faith has had its usefulness, its place, and its influence, therefore, whatever I may say concerning any one of those faiths, is not to condemn its usefulness, only its misapplication. The great injustice that has grown out of the religion that has made one life, or one man, the recipient of all the burdens of the world, has founded an injustice whose influence is felt over the earth's surface.

Vicarious atonement is one of the corner-stones upon which the temple of eternal injustice rests, and only the atonement of every soul, for every wrong that applies to that soul, is the only light that can lead the world up on the heights of equality, and it is needless to say that the world is equal, it is not. There are men of great intellects, as there are men of great wealth; but they are not always possessors of the same; there are men of power, and men of weakness; there are men who are ignorant, and men who are wise; but there is not a life so round, and so complete, that it embraces the whole. The scientist is not usually the most practical man in the world; the philosopher is not always the most useful man in the world; the inventor is not always the best mechanic in the world; the teacher is not always the best man to practice what he teaches, and so on, through every department of life, yet it requires the whole universe of mind to constitute the one great unit of divinity.

Hence it is time that we begin to think what it means to be just to one another. It is time to look to the eastern sky to behold what the signs of promise are. The revelator said, that he who looks to the west, and beholds a cloud as large as a man's hand, to foretell the storm, is a liar and deceiver; but he who looks into the mental skies, into the world of mind, and beholds the clouds that are athwart the heavens, finds there the signs that are shaping the lives of men, and beholds the justice that is being measured out to the world. The rights of every individual should be recognized. If a man labors for you, performing the amount of work specified by you, he should receive in exchange the capital made by you, and with this just and equitable response, there is no such thing as injustice.

If a man goes down into the bowels of the earth, and delves for a living so many hours out of the twenty-four, he should receive that which is his due, and there should be a just compensation measured out to him. Why? He is not able, perhaps capable of performing a higher class of work; he is not able to adjudicate the rights of his fellow-men; he is not competent to execute the laws of the land; he is not able, by any means, to formulate laws; he cannot think of the best means by which the people may be ruled, but he is expending so much muscular force, and he has guided that muscular force with the best ability, and he should be compensated therefor.

A man goes out on the sea, looking after national interests, and should be compensated according to his labors. His rights should be respected, respected as a man, not as a beast. He should be looked upon not as an animal, but as an impress of God upon every fiber of his being. The man who is before you every day of his life to execute the laws of your land, is recognized only as superiority is recognized by inferiority. You are merely intrusting to his care the interests and rights of your people. You believe that in that man's possession they are safe, and that he possesses the means of knowledge by which he is able to adjust the rights, and he is to be compensated according to his ability.

Thus you are equalizing the rights of men; you are adjusting their relationships, and you are giving to each one that which his merit deserves. This is true, it is not alone that you are to believe that the rights of man should dominate your conduct, but it is that you should prove it by and through that conduct. It is not sufficient either that you look out upon the world, and deplore the conditions of human society. There is to-day a spiritual light shining upon the world, that must and will bring to a successful ultimate these conditions of human rights, that are in such warfare at the present time.

Men will not and cannot be held in bondage, and why? The Roman slave could not be held within the confines of his owner to-day; the African could not be held within the bonds of his fetters in this age, and why? Nor will there fifty years hence be the conditions between labor and capital that hold men apart, that to-day exist, and the wrongs of man must come to a better condition, and how is it to come? By a spiritual perception that is pervading the world, by a higher spirituality, a higher humanity, a higher religious life, a higher intellectual development, that belongs to the race.

To-day, what is it that is causing the multiplicity of suicides? It is not the price of corn, but a more profound answer is given, that the number of suicides and the number of crimes that are being committed can be traced directly to the inequality in the rights of men. That is where the wrong rests. The rights of individuals to think, to feel, to live, to grow, to uprise in the midst of the world, and do their work, and a better work than ever before should be given to every human being.

Spiritualism is a religion that recognizes the spiritual equality of every human soul. It teaches that all human beings, whether they are the vilest or lowest of the earth, all are children of God, all are brothers, all are growing to the same life, all are walking over the same pathway, all are rising, or developing, to the same ultimates, over different roads it may be, but will ultimately enter into the same path of spiritual intuition. Thus if you believe this, if you are Spiritualists, and accept this affirmation of one of the cardinal points of the Spiritualists' belief, then your labors are concentrated upon the best means to bring about those results, as soon as possible. Spiritualism is not a religion that shall formulate a faith to be protected by creed, but it is a sign of the times, that the walls of religion must be for the best uses of humanity. The world is advancing, it may be retrograding in some directions, the same as nature does in her developments, she is retrograding, but she is also progressing. It seems as if the eras of time, were taking up the debris that has been left, to carry it forward on the higher crest of a more sweeping wave of everlasting life and love, and in the world of spirit this is the same. We are confining ourselves too closely to the conditions in life that suit our tastes. The cultured mind, the cultivated mind, the educated intellect, the man of intellectual parts, is the man who is susceptible to see the most, to feel the most; but the man who is lowest, who needs the most, is the man who prays the most, for his position is the most potent prayer that can be uttered. Angels hear those prayers, and they dispatch minds that come back to earth, to help the fallen to rise; to guide the erring to heights of strength, and trust, and hope; to leave out the great wrongs, and seek the rights that belong to the human soul, and bring them forward to man's redemption.

Angels of light are coming back as saviors, as helpers, down the way, and Spiritualism is one of the instrumentalities through which they are working, in this vineyard of life.

You are asking, why there are so many down in the slums, why there are so many media who are always looking down, and not looking up, and the thought arises, can they, in their depression, bring a high and exalted message from the realm of spirit? We are not to ask what the material is made of that constitutes the instrument for their transmission. When you go to the postoffice, to receive a letter from your friend, do you ask the postmaster, from whose hand you take the letter, Are you a good man, are you a Christian? When you call the physician, to whose care you commit yourself in sickness, do you ask, Are you pure-minded? Do you ask the telegraph operator, through whom you desire to send a message to your friend, Are you truthful, are you moral, are you worthy?

Angels in heaven may select their own instruments for the transmission of a message, and if we make the conditions good for them, though they are imperfect, we may make them better, better attuned to the voice of the message that is given through them. The signs of promise, they are here, they are among us. The warfares that have been raging in foreign lands, between civilization and uncivilized countries, the war between capital and labor in your own land, the war between the laborer and the capitalist in France and Germany, in England, everywhere the same spirit prevails. It is a sign shining in the heavenly sky, that the rights must ultimately live, must ultimately command respect, that a higher justice must abide, that a nobler brotherhood must express itself, that a sweeter humanity must be a dominating spirit, and a holy religion must be the halo that shines over human life. These are the signs of the times, these are the monitions for the future, these are the prophecies that are telling to the world what the spiritual outcome must be for the race of human thinkers.

Spiritualists, you have a work to do. You have something at once that is bringing to you a higher duty to perform. Spiritualists, you have a responsibility that confronts you, every one of you. Leave nothing undone to utilize the gifts that have been vouchsafed to you from the angel world, for the betterment of humanity. The Spiritualist who will turn his back to the angel world, that has brought to him the comfort of an individualized religion, which has brought him to a state ready for improvement and development—that Spiritualist who will turn his back upon this knowledge, and sustain that which he does not believe, a truth he cannot cherish, an affirmation he cannot deny in the privacy of his home, that man is not the man to recognize or support the rights of human individuals.

Spiritualists, are you true to your religion, are you honest to your convictions, are you earnest in your duties, are you truthful in your relationships to your fellow men, for humanity's sake, and the Diviner Brotherhood? Are you helping the weak, are you encouraging the faltering, are you shielding those who are afflicted, are you supporting the fainting ones, are you giving strength to those who are grovelling in darkness, or, are you passing by, like the Pharisee, on the other side? Let me tell you, that this is the old religion that is clinging to you like a barnacle, that you may be saved by the efforts that somebody else has performed. Live righteously, do your duty manfully and justly, live so righteously that the world is made more righteous for your living, and you need not hesitate for one moment, fearing that you will not be respected and honored by your fellows. We desire the honest believer, the man who fearlessly utters what he thinks, and feels; the true worker, the upright thinker; and also the man who believes in a universal brotherhood, in a Divine Fatherhood, in a righteous living religion, in a universal helpfulness.

RESTORES EYESIGHT.

Spectacles a Thing of the Past.

"Actina," a Marvelous Discovery That Cures All Afflictions of the Eye and Ear Without Cutting or Drugging.

A marvelous discovery has been made by the Scientist and Inventive Genius, Prof. W. O. Wilson. He has invented a restorer known as "Actina," through which all affections of the eyes and ear, such as blindness, granulated lids, cataracts, sore eyes, deafness, etc., are cured without cutting or drugging. It is a simple contrivance, known as the Actina Pocket Battery, and through it the patients cure themselves in the privacy of their own homes. It not only abolishes the butcheries and torturous methods practiced by oculists, and aurists, but at the same time perfects a positive and lasting cure.

Rev. W. C. Goodwin, Moline, Kansas, writes: "My honest opinion of "Actina" is that it is one of the most marvelous discoveries of the age. It saved my eyes from an operation."

Mr. F. W. Harwood, Springfield, Mass., says that "Actina" cured him of deafness of nine years' standing.

Mr. A. L. Howe, Tully, N. Y., writes: "Actina" has removed cataracts from both my eyes. I can read well without my glasses; am sixty-five years old.

Robert Baker, Ocean Park, Cal., writes: "I should have been blind had I Not used "Actina."

A party of prominent citizens have organized a company known as the New York and London Electric Association, and they have given this method so thorough a test on hundreds of cases pronounced incurable and hopeless that they now positively assure a cure. "Actina" is sent on trial postpaid. If you will call or send your name and address to the New York and London Electric Association, Dept. T.B., 929 Walnut St., Kansas City, Mo., you will receive, absolutely free, a valuable book—Prof. Wilson's "Treatise on the Eye and on Diseases in General," and you can rest assured that your eyesight and hearing will be restored, no matter how many doctors have failed.

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH,

Or the Future Life According to Science. By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French by S. R. Crockee. A very fascinating work. This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author says: "There is a true and respectable idea in Spiritualism," and regards as proved "the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of earth." Price, $1.50.

A NEW CATECHISM,

BY M. M. MANGASARIAN.

This is a new "Catechism" in the full sense of the word. There has as yet appeared in the world of liberal literature nothing like this most wonderful little book or reason. E. P. Powell, the well-known author, the reviewer and critic, says: "The remarkable thing about this 'Catechism' is that it tells the truth." It deals with the questions of God, Immortality—the Creeds, the Clergy, the Church, Prayer and Salvation, Jesus and his Teaching, the Growth of the Christian Scriptures, and many other philosophical, scientific and ethical questions with the utmost candor, courage and clearness. 188 pages. COLORS AS APPLIED TO NUMBERS AND TO HUMAN FATE.

In previous articles on divination published in the Sunday Inter Ocean the effect of numbers, color, and tonal qualities upon human fate has been lucidly discussed. The widespread interest in the several divisions of the system and the resultant inquiries led the discoverer to a more detailed exposition of the determination of the values of colors, of their direct bearing upon human action, and their significance in the prediction of human failure or success.

In the general plan of determining a person's numerical concord lies the scheme for determining a person's individual colors. But before proceeding with a discussion of the values of particular colors the discoverer of the system always advises that persons know something of the general value of tints. She declares that every planet has its color, as it has its number. Reasoning from this—through the influence which the planets have upon human beings—she asserts that every human has his number and his color, as well as his musical note. The color which belongs to any particular leading number belongs to the person existing under that number, and inasmuch as every number has its relative colors, so does each person have his individual colors. It is as disastrous to be out of harmony with a color scheme as it is to be out of harmony with the individual musical note or the individual number.

INFLUENCE FOR GOOD OR ILL.

It has been known for many centuries that certain colors, when affected by certain individuals, have had a great influence upon them, either for good or ill. There are hundreds of persons, who more or less vaguely understand this influence, who choose what they call their favorite color for their color scheme. It has always been generally supposed that a person's favorite color is the color which belongs to him, but individual taste is a poor criterion to be guided by in this instance, for even the ill influence of a wrongly chosen color would not expose that color to an inharmonious one, so long as it remains the color that captures the eye.

The discoverer of the system has a friend who always pooh-poohed the idea that colors have any effect upon human action. The favorite color of the particular person was green. She wore green garments and used green decorations in her home. Her furniture was upholstered in green. Her carpet had a foundation of green. She even insisted upon having a number of palms and ferns in her home, so greatly did this color fascinate her.

CHANGED THE COLOR.

But the discoverer of the system, by figuring out the concord and determining the leading number of this woman, discovered that the woman's color was not green, but was, instead, light blue. She told the admirer of green that light blue should be used in every reasonable manner, and that green should be partly discarded. Her advice won her the ridicule of the lover of green.

At any rate the woman who affected green colors investigated the subject more thoroughly and learned that what the discoverer of the system had said was true—that her color should be blue and not green. She had her rooms decorated with light blue. She exchanged her green dresses for blue dresses. If she wore other colors there was always a touch of blue in the trimming.

The change worked marvels, according to the testimony of the discoverer, and the early failures of the former wearer of green now turned into successes.

It would be folly to claim that this would prove infallible in all cases, for there are always other influences at work to militate against any of these things which have a bearing upon human action. For instance, one may choose his relative color and his relative numbers and yet be inharmonic, but where the musical tone, the leading numbers—or the concord—and the color all agree there will be no discord.

DETERMINING THE COLORS.

It is useless to repeat the methods of discovering the leading numbers which belong to persons, but it must be borne in mind that it is only through the leading numbers that belong to each individual that his relative colors may be determined. Once the leading number is obtained according to the method of discovering the number-definition of the leading letter, it is no longer difficult to determine the color which belongs to that person.

It is necessary to give here the table of the alphabet with the definition of the several letters in order to determine the individual colors. The table follows:

FIRST DEGREE.

B, 2. The Mother; the Molder. Colors, yellow and green.

C, 3. The Son; the Christ. Color, light blue.

D, 4. Matter. Colors, blue and gold.

E, 5. The Covenant; the duality of man. Color, blue.

F, 6. The pattern of all building; the Word made flesh. Color, very light blue.

G, 7. Completed material temple. Color, very light green.

H, 8. Power; manifestation; the highest name. Color, orange.

I, 9. Justice, judgment, revelation. Color, red.

SECOND DEGREE.

J, 1. Christ cycle. Color, white.

K, 2. The identity of the Christ. Colors, purple and heliotrope.

N, 5. Black magic. Color, black.

O, 6. The Word made physical. Color, orange.

P, 7. The physical completed. Color, blue.

Q, 8. The double manifestation of spirit and matter. Color, canary.

R, 9. The completion of justice, judgment, and revelation. Color, red.

THIRD DEGREE.

S, 1. Crucifixion. Color of flame.

U, 3. Manifestation. Colors, blue and green.

Z, 8. Invested with power. Color, orange.

To simplify the foregoing table the letters and their numerical value may be placed in this manner:

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9
J	K	L	M	N	O	P	Q	R
S	T	U	V	W	X	Y	Z

To take the example offered by the discoverer of the system:

"In explaining the color scheme I will use the name James William Jones," she said, as she began figuring out the concord. "James represents the numbers 1, 1, 4, 5, 1. The sum of these numbers is 12. Twelve reduced to a digit equals 3.

"William is represented by the numbers 5, 9, 3, 3, 1, 4. These added give 25, which reduced to a digit gives us 7.

"Jones is represented by the numerals 1, 6, 5, 5, 1, which, reduced, first give 18. The digit of 18 is 9.

"We now have from the name James William Jones the figures 3, 7, and 9. Now we will suppose that James William Jones was born Dec. 14, 1865. December is the twelfth month, and the figures 1 and 2 added give us 3. The figures in 14 added give us 5, and the digit of the number 1865 is 2. We now have the concord, 3, 7, 9, 3, 5, 2. These are the dominant numbers. By referring to the table of degrees it is seen that these numbers fall largely under the second classification, or degree. Taking the numbers of the concord we find easily enough the characterizing definition of this person and his relative color. It is seen that we get for the colors royal purple and violet, blue, red, black green, purple, and heliotrope.

A REMARKABLE COLOR SCHEME.

"This name gives us a remarkable color scheme, there being but one inharmonic one. That one comes under No. 5 of the second degree and is black, which has a character definition of black magic. According to this concord this person would be a man of distinctly religious trend of mind, except for the threat offered by the black. A person with that color in their scheme is prone to become too greatly interested in occult studies and to take the "left-handed" tack in his studies. In this particular case, however, this is doubtful, for James William Jones has so much on the other side to counterbalance the evil influence of black that he is apt not to be controlled by that color.

"It is well to know that colors cannot be considered separately. I have often been asked to denote the one color a person should consider himself existing under. I always say, and must say now, that all the colors of the scheme must be blended, like the colors on a palette, to make the color scheme complete. The color that should be regarded as the leading one by any person is that one which most frequently appears in the concord. For instance, James William Jones will find purple twice in his scheme. According to artists, the proper blending of the entire list of colors would give a purplish color. This color would prove quite within keeping with the character of James William Jones.

CHOICE OF COLORS.

"The choice of colors for clothing or decoration will not soon be made generally in this scientific manner, and when people ask me if they really should use the color of the blend of their entire color scheme I tell them there is little reason why they should. Any color that forms the chief part of that blend is the one that should be used, but no dire effect can come when any one of the good colors of the concord are used. If a woman is shown to have the digit 5 of the second degree in her concord she should not wear black too much, for black would then tend to have sinister influence over her and to accentuate her proneness toward dabbling in occult things. But suppose a person should find that his concord included green, red, purple, and blue. No one of these colors will militate against his success or his comfort and he will be able to use any of them to enhance his appearance. But he may not use any color to best advantage that is not found in the concord.

"By reference to the table of degrees it is seen that blue often appears. The tastes of people, while not infallible, as stated before, often direct persons to a correct selection of colors. This results often because blue looks well upon the majority of persons, and that is because blue enters into the concord of the majority of people. Red and green are colors that are not often met with. That is because red and green appear less frequently in the color concords. I have often strolled up and down crowded streets noting which color predominates in the garments worn by people. If you will do this you will learn that the majority—by far the large majority—of women use at least a touch of blue about their clothes. Sometimes it may be a simple ribbon at the neck, another time it may be a bunch of violets on a hat, another time it may be a skirt or a waist. At any rate, blue is seen more often on the street than any other color. It appears more often in concords than any other color. Any person can determine this to his own satisfaction.

"I have now explained, in successive interviews, the number concord, the musical concord, and the color concord. When you get beyond these things you get into true astrology, for you must extend your investigations to the universe. For ages the importance of a knowledge of geocentric astrology has been appreciated, but we do, in our matter-of-fact day, ridicule the persons who advance astrological theories. But as sure as numbers and musical tones and colors have an influence upon human beings, so do the planets and stars. Each star has its color and its musical tone. The whole universe runs in concord, and the person who wittingly puts himself in discord with the universe must pay the penalty. The question of the influence of the planets upon human fate can be better explained by giving especial attention to it at some future time."—Chicago Inter Ocean.

"REX," THE KNOWING SPANIEL, PRAYS.

Now, oh Nature! in thy wisdom thou hast made us as we are;
Thou hast made this earth and sunlight and the moon and little star;
So, at least man tells us, and in mind he ought to know,
For he lays claim to all the earth and knowledge here below.

Hast thou not, oh, Holy Master, near thy throne a kennel bright
Where we poor dogs can gather near thy left hand or thy right,
Just to watch and love our masters and be faithful, kind and true,
And please pardon and receive them, for they know not what they do.

When they beat us they were angry, and their savagery arose;
Please forgive them and have mercy; kindly lighten all their woes,
They will sometime, when arisen to the height where they can see,
Know that wisdom, love and kindness overcome all cruelty.

I was brought up on a bottle by a lady good and kind,
And if she should go to heaven and leave me, her pet, behind,
I do not think that heaven would a place of pleasure be,
For my human mother darling, and no room up there for me.

Oft she pats me and she pets me, and she calls me her "good boy,"
And she fills my great big dog soul so completely full of joy,
That I can but wish to follow her wherever she may roam,
And I pray you, Holy Master, let me linger near her home.

Let my gentle foster mother, and good master take me too,
When they cross the shining river, or I'll swim and then pursue;
For they love me in the spirit and I love them in my heart,
And it surely would be cruel to compel us e'er to part.

If it please Thee, blessed Master, I should like to have my place
In a kennel near their mansion, where I oft may see each face.
Let me romp and play and slumber in the sunlight of their souls
While the universe revolving and evolving onward rolls.

Let me lick the hand that strokes me with a fond and loving touch;
Let me be with them forever if I do not ask too much,
And I'll strive to grow up higher than the rest of my own kind;
Try to store the gems of knowledge in my active little mind.

I will promise to be faithful and as moral as I can;
I will drink no liquid poison and be soberer than man;
I will do no "profane swearing;" I will neither smoke nor chew,
If Thou wilt, O God, permit me with my master to go through.

He will vouch for me in heaven, and no trouble will I be;
Be no bother to the angels and no bother unto Thee.
I'll be true, and good, and honest, and what Christian could be more?
I will be for dear St. Peter a good watch-dog at the door.

Yes, I know that he will need me, for he must be growing old,
And he'll want my scenting power to keep wolves without the fold.
I can growl at every liar, every greedy, selfish hog,
And be of use to Peter when he needs a faithful dog.

I am glad I can be useful in this world of hum and whirr,
For I feel that I'm progressing from the level of the cur.
And I want to be recorded as a Spaniel, full and high,
Right beside my foster mother and my master when I die.

Blessed Master, take my spirit when my time comes to depart,
Though I am an humble Spaniel I am good within my heart;
Just a dog in looks and species, and in my spirit dog, but then,
I want my foster mother and my master, too. Amen!

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

To the Spiritualists of Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa and Missouri.

We expect to turn our faces westward March 1. We desire to hear from societies and individuals who would like our services.

Please write us at once if you would like our services, or we may have passed you by before we hear from you. Address us until March 10, Rochester, Ind. Home address 618 Newland avenue, Jamestown, N. Y.

INDIANA STATE SPIRITUALIST CONVENTION.

The arrangements are all completed for the Indiana State Convention. It will be held in the Madison avenue Spiritualist Temple, at Anderson, Ind., Feb. 26, 27 and 28, 1904.

The local societies of the state will be represented by delegates and a State Association composed of all of the local societies of the state will be organized.

The best of talent has been secured for the occasion. Harrison D. Barrett, president of the N. S. A., will have charge of the meeting. Everyone who is interested in the movement, or who wishes to attend a good meeting, should avail themselves of this opportunity and attend all of these meetings.

PSYCHOPATHY, OR SPIRIT HEALING.—A class in Psychopathy, or Spirit Healing, under the instruction of the spirit of Dr. Benj. Rush, through Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, is about to be formed. For further information inquire of Mr. Wm. Richmond, 3802 Ridge avenue, Rogers Park, Chicago, Illinois.

Arthur F. Milton writes: "Of all the definitions given of soul, love, life, God or law (and many engrossed in dissertations rather too lengthy to follow logically) I find but one synonym that fits them all, and that is sensation. Without sensation we would experience no life, nor love, so-called. But if pure love is God or first cause, it is not yet exemplified or felt as a universal principle among human kind. But as all our forces have a tendency towards spiritualization, perhaps sensation spiritualized is the love we are all aiming for, so-called happiness."

J. L. Cameron writes from Salt Lake City, Utah: "I notice from the tag on the ever welcome Progressive Thinker that I shall have to renew my subscription if I want in the future as in the past, to feast my soul on the good things that are continually appearing in its pages. I have been reading that valuable book, Rending the Vail. Oh, that the whole world might know its precious contents."

Otto W. Westermark writes: "I can not get along very well without the paper, and the books I would not sell for any price, if I could not get them again."

C. A. Prentice writes from Louisville, Ky.: "Our pastor, Mrs. A. Throndson, gave us a fine address Sunday night on 'No One Escaping the Sins of Transgression.' The subject was well handled. She dwelt long and earnestly on the misconception and misunderstanding of non-believers in regard to Spiritualism giving us proof conclusive of the great truth in Bible texts. We have quite a large attendance and have twenty-five dollars toward a building fund. We hope soon to have a church of our own established here."

Mrs. A. Sexsmith, secretary, writes: "The Rising Sun Spiritualists Mission, which holds services at Star Lodge Hall, 378 So. Western avenue, is progressing nicely. Our membership still continues to grow from week to week. The meetings on Sunday, Feb. 14, both afternoon and evening, were well attended, especially in the evening, with Bro. Warner as speaker. Our hall was crowded to its fullest extent, and every one seemed to enjoy the discourse as he was most heartily applauded. As he is just starting out in the field as an inspirational speaker, we think he has a very bright future before him, and should be greatly encouraged. We are in need of more such earnest workers as Brother Warner. We have our good brother, Doctor Randall, with us Sunday, Feb. 21."

J. Iliff Mettler writes: "I have never seen in The Progressive Thinker that any agreement has been arranged whereby Hale & Co., of California, will be compelled to admit that a form coming out of the cabinet is a materialized spirit, but could say, 'Yes, I see something, but don't know it to be a spirit.' Then what could the medium do to convince them to the contrary? Why, nothing. It is desirable that arrangements acceptable to both sides should be adjusted so this offer will not be rejected, and if it is we can have our own opinion why."

Take due notice that items for this page in order to insure insertion must contain the full name and address of the writer. Otherwise they may be cast into the waste basket.

J. H. Mendenhall writes: "The Muncie (Ind.) Spiritual Association is enjoying a feast of reason and a flow of soul. Dr. J. O. M. Hewitt, of Chicago, Ill., is serving the society this month. Having personally attended his meetings, I am prepared to say that he is the right man in the right place. Indeed, Brother Hewitt is more than a speaker; he is a teacher. While he is earnest in tone, chaste and fluent in language, he possesses the peculiar tact for presenting the great question of life—Spiritualism—in the simplicity of truth, its real nature, making his every utterance easy of understanding and received with the highest appreciation. Brother Hewitt should be kept at work in the cause of Spiritualism."

A. Richards has something to say of Bible Spiritualism in the Chicago Record-Herald: "All students of the Bible and searchers for the truth contained therein know that the numerous references to 'familiar' spirits, both in the Old and New Testaments, are accompanied by strong condemnation of the practice of consulting 'familiar spirits.' In Deuteronomy xviii:11 it is written, 'There shall not be found among you * * * * a consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer. 12, For all these things are an abomination unto the Lord.' The story of Saul and the 'Witch of Endor' is a sad tale of his downfall, and in I. Chronicles x:13 we read, 'So Saul died for his transgression which he committed against the Lord, even against the word of God, which he kept not, and also for asking counsel of one that had a familiar spirit.' How could that which all through the Bible is taught as 'an abomination unto the the Lord' bring the comforting proof of immortality? Every Christian who has in his heart the assurance of a God knows that his relation to God could not be severed by passing through what is called death. There are over 100 verses in the Bible which relate to the phenomena of the carnal mind, known as Spiritualism, clairvoyance, etc. Jesus' resurrection, which is a historical fact as well as an orthodox belief, satisfies the questioner as to the eternity of life. We need not to sit in a darkened room and behold a seance to know that our beloved ones, who have gone to another part of God's universe, are safe in His keeping. We need, however, to know more of God, to long to be more spiritually-minded, to understand the Bible better. In it we read words of life."

After being on trial before a jury in the Chester county (Pennsylvania) court William T. Reynolds was acquitted of the charge of murdering James Johnson, just over the Maryland state line, in August last. Reynolds said he believed in dreams, and had absolutely no fear as to the result. After the verdict was rendered Reynolds said about a month ago he had a dream in which he found himself wading in deep black water. Said he: "I was exhausted, and just about to give up, when suddenly I stepped out upon a beautiful green field, and was saved. Since then I have had no fear of the trial. I shot Johnson in self-defense, told a plain, truthful story, and the jury believed me. I will go home to Cecil county now, and keep bad people from trespassing upon my farm."

The executive board of the Indiana Spiritualists Association, in session at Chesterfield, Ind., decided to demand of the Indiana Union Traction Company that the fare to the camp grounds from Anderson be reduced to 5 cents, the former price. The company in arranging the new schedule recently increased the price to 10 cents. The association was instrumental in having the late Carroll Bronnenberg give a right-of-way through his farm to the company. The only purpose of Mr. Bronnenberg and the association was to get a way to and from the association grounds. It was stipulated in the contract that the fare should never be more than 5 cents. The executive board is making arrangements to bring a suit against the company.

Dr. Beverly writes: "The Masquerade Ball at Lakeside Hall will beat them all. Come one, come all, next Saturday evening, Feb. 27. Entertainment for all. Not required to mask. Come and have a good time. Fine music, lively program and fifty prizes for the different characters. Mask as you like. You will be almost sure to draw a prize. Booths for mediums and palmists who will give short readings. Check room and lunch. No bar, but a social time for all who come. Tickets 25 cents. This society gives an entertainment every month and will make this the greatest of all. Our Sunday meetings are largely attended. Every one attending in the afternoon is promised a test or message by one of the many mediums present."

M. B. Little, prominent as a Spiritualist, lecturer and author, writes from Glens Falls, N. Y.: "Spiritualism is constantly gaining ground here. The people are becoming more interested, and those who have accepted the phenomena are now becoming earnest students of the spiritual philosophy."

Although the Rev. Father Dagnault, pastor of St. Mary's Catholic church in Peshtigo, Wis., admits curing many people of various ills, he distinctly states that it is not due to any exercise of divine power through him, and he abhors the idea of being designated a healer. He claims that his treatment is by electro therapeutics, and is due to the odic force in the human body. A large number of Marinette people have taken treatment there, and many miraculous cures are reported. Nicholas Konine was carried into the priest's house crippled with rheumatism. The priest rubbed his hands over the afflicted parts, and in a short time Konine was able to walk home, and has since chopped up his crutches. Mrs. Rochon of Niagara, Wis., had a tumor or swelling of some kind in her face for years. It disappeared in one night after Father Dagnault had treated her.

Elizabeth R. Fielding writes from Washington, D. C.: "The First Association meets at Rauscher's Hall, 1032 Conn. avenue, Mrs. Milan Edson as speaker. Services at 11 a. m. and 7:30 p. m. A half-hour is given for spirit messages at each service. Sunday-school at 10 a. m. The Educational Spiritualist Church meets at Smith's hall, 519, 9th street N. W. Mrs. M. T. Longley lectured for this society, Sunday, Feb. 7. At Wonn's Hall, 721 Sixth streetN. W., Mrs. Walter Williams will give a short address, followed by messages. The German Spiritualist Association holds services at Wonn's Hall, Sunday at 3 p. m. Lecture by Mrs. M. T. Longley, secretary N. S. A. Spirit communications by Mrs. A. M. Zoller. Services in English."

TAKE NOTICE.

All books advertised in the columns of The Progressive Thinker are for sale at this office. Bear this in mind.

We go to press early Monday morning, hence communications intended for that current issue should reach this office not later than the previous Saturday morning. Bear this in mind.

The Chicago Chronicle says: "Visions of her murdered husband attempting to shoot her and attacking her with red fire are what made Mrs. Annie Olsen confess to the crime. After being held to the grand jury in the coroner's inquest yesterday morning the woman told why she had waited three days before confessing that she killed her husband, August Olsen. She declared in a dramatic manner that for three days and three nights she sat without sleep, gazing at the visions of her murdered husband. Finally she became so frightened that she went to the police station and told her story. After that, she said, the visions were discontinued, and she was able to sleep. August Olsen's body was found in his bed several days ago with two bullet holes in the head. An inquest was held and a verdict of suicide returned. Later Mrs. Olsen made her sensational confession and the case was re-opened. Coroner's Physician Lewke Tuesday held a post-mortem examination and it developed that two bullets were imbedded in Olsen's brain Following this discovery the inquest was re-opened. At the inquest the confession of the woman was introduced, in which she told how she had crept to her husband's bedside and shot him twice in the head while he slept. Little more evidence was introduced and the verdict holding the woman was quickly rendered. 'For three days and nights I sat in my dining-room with a lamp lighted,' she said. 'I feared the dark because when no light was near streaks of red fire seemed to dart at me from every nook and corner. I looked out of the window one night and there I saw my husband with blood on his face standing in the snow pointing a revolver at me.'"

Lottie Leavitt writes from Clinton, Iowa: "The Philosophical Society of Spiritualists has had Mrs. Alice C. Barry, of Philadelphia, lecturing here. She is very popular with our people, this being the fifth Sunday she has lectured for our Society. After a selection by the choir, Mrs. Barry took her subjects from the audience. All were answered in an able manner. Mrs. Lusted, the violinist, rendered selections on the violin that were highly appreciated. After the lecture, Mrs. Barry gave tests that were satisfactory, and cheerfully accepted. Our audiences have increased since her engagement. The society holds services every Sunday evening in K. of P. Hall, at 7:30. All visitors to Clinton are cordially welcomed."

D. A. Herrick is serving the First Society of Indianapolis for February. He goes to Toledo, Ohio, for March; Ashtabula and Akron, Ohio, for April, and Conneaut, Ohio, for May. He has July and the first two Sundays in August yet unengaged for camp work.

Mrs. Nora E. Hill writes from 750 W. Lake street: "About fifty friends met at my home, Feb. 13, at my monthly social, and we had a grand evening's enjoyment, with something good in spiritual food as well as material food. We had with us on that date, Mrs. Burland, Mrs. Hemsey and Mr. R. Gilray; they fed the soul while I tried to feed the body. I think the social was a success—it seemed so when the greeting and the leave-taking came. This grand good time will be repeated Saturday evening, March 12. I would like to correspond with societies for engagements for the coming season."

Scribe writes from Detroit: "The Spiritual Workers are being addressed this month by Mrs. Jenkins, of Windsor. She spoke under inspiration on the 'Kosmon Era' last Sunday, showing that the old was passing away, and the new light and new revelation was to be taken up. Mrs. Jenkins gives developing circles every Monday evening at her home in Windsor, free. It is now being rumored that she is to speak for the Methodist church, regularly, in this Canadian town, at an early date."

H. F. Coates writes: "The subject 'Angels' was taken by Mr. T. W. Sherk for his lecture at Kenwood Hall, 4308 Cottage Grove avenue, Sunday evening, Feb. 14, and while, perhaps, the subject did not appeal to many at first, I cannot help but feel all were interested and felt it was well to be there before he was through. Mr. Sherk will lecture for us again Sunday evening, Feb. 28. Subject, 'Science and Spiritualism.' Dr. Freedman and wife have consented to be present on that occasion to sing some of their beautiful songs. At the close of the meeting the doctor will give demonstration of magnetic healing, free. So bring your sick to the hall that night. Messages are always given by myself and others. Our afternoon meeting is at 3 o'clock. Come and help us."

J. W. McAllister writes: "'Drugs useless as cure for pneumonia,' declared Dr. A. D. Bevan before the Chicago Medical Society. Now isn't that strange? Any sane person should know that, although Dr. W. K. Jaques stated, 'while many cases are fatal from the start, in other instances, the physicians can influence the patient to recovery; fresh air, a good nurse, nourishment and stimulants assist the resisting power of a patient.' I say drugs have no curative power over it; then why do you doctors compel your patients to eat while in the acute stage of typhoid and other fevers when even a fool who has studied the effect of fasting, that enforced feeding prolongs the duration of the disease from two to four times. I ask, why do you feed your patients? You will reply, because your so-called science teaches this method, and I will answer this by daring you to test in any one case of pneumonia, typhoid, typhus or yellow fever, if you give this method a fair trial; absolutely refuse all food until an intense appetite exists, furnishing your patient with all the water he will drink. The disease will not be nearly so severe, even during its existence and the mortality percentage will be reduced to one-tenth its present ratio. Under no circumstances must patients be fed with either liquid or solid foods until an intense hunger appears. Now dear friends, don't be idiots. Use your brain, and don't depend on the supposed intelligence of others; use your own. Don't think that illness is sent by the Divine Power, that it comes on you like a thief in the night; it comes because you yourself have broken the law of health. I hope this may be the means of saving some poor soul. If you will print this, you will be doing something for humanity."

Mrs. G. Partridge, now in Bridger, Mont., has been invited to serve psychically, a society in Billings, Mont. The Montana Spiritualists propose to make good use of good mediums. They are wide awake and are pushing the cause in the Northwest.

The Jackson (Mich.) Patriot says of the late Spiritualist meeting there: "Taking pictures of spirits will be one of the demonstrations at the mid-winter convention of the State Spiritual Association holding public sessions in this city and concluding this evening. Frank N. Foster, photographer of Grand Rapids, is here and he said yesterday that the arrangements had been made for the test. He exhibited several pictures showing what had been done in the phenomena. The picture showed some one plainly in the center of the card. Back of this person and arranged about the head were several faces less definite than the main face of the picture. When he was asked how he obtained such pictures, he said: 'The camera was first snapped upon the person sitting for a picture. Then before the lens was taken from the camera, we stood about it and placed our hands upon the camera. When the picture was developed these extra faces appeared. Some of the faces of the spirit beings were recognized by those who were friends and acquaintances when they were in the earth life.' Photographer Foster has engaged Photographer Paine of Jackson to furnish the plates and develop the pictures. 'I will have nothing to do with the plates,' said Photograpner Foster. 'They will be handled entirely by someone else—Mr. Paine in this instance.'"

"Spiritualism is not on the decline," said Mrs. Laura L. Crawford of Detroit, at the Jackson, Mich., meeting, "but I feel it is progressing." In speaking of mediums giving full names, she said: "There are many instances when the message given by a dear one is a better test than would be the giving of the full name. If we live true to ourselves, to those about us and true to the whole world, we will come nearer the full delight of our religion."

Dr. A. W. Foreman says that during one of his recent trips to California he and his wife visited a medium and held a seance with her, and although they were unknown to the medium or to anybody in that section of the country, she was soon able to call him by name and announce that an old-time friend of his who had been dead for about two years, was present in spirit and desired to converse with him She gave the full name of his friend.

"The Power of the Soul" was the topic of the address by Mrs. D. A. Morrill of Grand Rapids, at the late meeting at Jackson. She said, "We feel we must impress upon you the sacredness and purity of mediumship. We must prove this to you by our conduct, by right living. We who are endowed with the spirit of the infinite should remember that there is a great responsibility upon us." She was thirty minutes delivering her inspired words. The audience applauded earnestly. It was one of the best speeches of the convention.

Oscar A. Edgerly, the eloquent trance speaker, writes from 313 Columbus street, Elmira, N. Y., correcting a mistake: "I see by this week's Thinker that by some inadvertance, a mistake was made in the notice referring to my engagements, under the head of 'General Survey.' I wrote that I expected to be in New England during April, not 'England' as it was published in the last Thinker. I will be greatly obliged if you will kindly correct the mistake in next week's paper, as I would not like to have the people get the impression that I expect to 'go over the sea.'"

At the Jackson, Mich., meeting the church was nearly filled with people at the afternoon session of the convention. Mrs. Julia M. Walton of Jackson, a medium, gave the invocation. The words were rhyme and the theme was one of religious beauty. She is an estimable lady and an excellent medium.

Mrs. A. Sexsmith writes: "Interest still increases at the Rising Sun Spiritualist Mission, which meets at Star Lodge Hall, 378 So. Western avenue, every Sunday. The reason of that is we have different speakers every Sunday, who are always welcomed by an earnest, intelligent, truth-seeking audience, that fills the hall. On Sunday, Feb. 28, we have as speaker, Dr. F. M. Stoller, and on Sunday, March 6, we will have that indefatigable worker, Mrs. M. A. Burland. Good singing at all our meetings; also good tests; all welcome; seats free."

At the Jackson, Mich., meeting, there was much of interest developed in the symposium held one morning. Dr. B. O'Dell, of Paw Paw, presided. Rev. C. E. Dent, of Vicksburg, was the first speaker, and having had much experience and being one of the old workers in the field of the spirit religion, he was a capable speaker. Another speaker precipitated something warm in the way of a friendly discussion. He asserted as his opinion that Spiritualism was on the decline, and followed with the opinion that one of the reasons was that there were rings in the local societies and in fact in the National Spiritualists Association opposed to phenomena.

W. H. Kiser writes from DesMoines, Iowa: "Mrs. DeWolf Kiser and the writer came here to DesMoines to stay a week to make some converts and to give the Spiritualists a lift. Mrs. DeWolf Kiser spoke to a good audience, together with Mrs. Maud Lord Drake, last Sunday evening. Instead of staying one week, we are staying about two weeks. Many people here are getting proof of continuity of life through independent slate-writing, together with other physical manifestations. Mrs. DeWolf Kiser gives the slate-writings in daylight only."

Dr. W. O. Knowles, of Grand Rapids, at one of the sessions at Jackson, Mich., read a poem, and then Dr. O'Dell introduced him to deliver the address of the afternoon. He said: "There are a great many spiritual people in the world; there are some Spiritualists. The latter are rapidly increasing. The more my spiritual eye can see, the less I know of true Spiritualism. We as Spiritualists have felt a power on the outside of us which touches our souls. You are developing conditions this moment which will affect you in the future, and I hope do you some good. The outer man or woman who meets here this afternoon will never meet face to face; you must help yourself to understand and when you are in doubt go to your soul-closet in secret and commune with God. Develop self. If we want to make Spiritualism a betterment for the soul, be a man, be a woman, be pure and stand up with the masses."

J. A. Bailey, who is doing an excellent work in this state, writes from Kewanee, Ill.: "After delivering a course of lectures at Princeton, Ill., I came here and am working to arouse the Spiritualists of this city to the necessity of cooperative work along Spiritualistic lines, and am happy to say that I am meeting with fair success, notwithstanding they are not organized. I hold myself in readiness, however, to answer calls for funerals or to serve societies on easy terms. Address me at No. 101 South Chestnut street."

Princess Viroqua, of the Mohawk tribe of Canada, will lecture Sunday, Feb. 28, at 3 and 8 p. m., assisted by Madame Josephine, a fine psychic and clairvoyant test medium, at the Second Church of the Soul, Madison street and California avenue. Mr. Schaeffer will assist in answering questions. Come and hear the Princess.

Leolia writes from Concord, N. H.: Thinking you might like to hear from the far East, I will tell you of a new medium who has just come before the public after devoting a few years to her unfoldment spiritually. Miss A. Warren, of Manchester, N. H., conducted the spiritual meeting at First Ward Hall, Sunday, the 14th. A short lecture by Peace, one control, was beautifully voiced. Could and would those who heard her live up to her teachings, they would surely be better men and women. When Peace had finished, Sunshine, the little Indian maiden, gave many tests, every one being recognized and acknowledged as true. She is a marvelous medium. Her predictions are always true. The time will surely come when the people both east and West will wake up to the fact that Miss Warren has no equal."

G. Hamilton Brooks writes: "Dr. J. H. Randall will lecture for the Englewood Spiritual Union at Hopkins' Hall, 528 West 63rd street, Sunday evening, Feb. 28. His subject will be 'The Spiritualism of Walt Whitman.' This should bring out a large following of Whitman's friends, and those that want to know more about him. The Doctor will give a very interesting and educational lecture and we hope to have a large and appreciative audience."

Missionary E. W. Sprague, besides being an excellent mortal man, is an excellent spiritual man. At the Jackson, Mich., meeting, speaking of the charge made against the National Spiritualists Association that there is a ring in the association opposed to phenomena, he defended the National Association, saying he never had heard of it before. He further said: "The National Association is not opposed to phenomena but it is opposed to those mediums who use the livery of God in which to serve the devil. The medium who defrauds the people by pretending to join separated lovers, find lost money and to locate rich treasures, are enemies of the true cause of spirit religion. I know of instances which have come to me in the last few months of good Spiritualists being beaten out of $25, $15, and $10. The man who was doing it was a medium, I admit, but he had become debauched; he bought about 60 cents' worth of whisky each day; such men are frauds. He defrauded two or three people, collecting $25 from each, on the proposition that he would bring them to the development of trumpet mediums. He sat with them a few times, then left town, leaving a large board bill incurred with a poor widow unpaid. I do not advocate that we as Spiritualists should seek to injure any one, but these people are injuring us. We must not put them up as our standard bearers. We cannot stop frauds, but we can refuse to endorse them, and indicate to the world the difference between fortune telling, faking and genuine mediumship."

The Spiritual Unity Society will hold its second grand entertainment and dance, Saturday evening, March 5, at 8 o'clock sharp, at Heuser's hall, 576 Larrabee street, corner of Wisconsin street. Entrance on Wisconsin street. This hall is centrally located and convenient to North Side car lines; Larrabee street electric cars to the door. All cross lines transfer on Larrabee street line. Prof. Ray has arranged a musical programme of the best talent obtainable. There will also be a number of mediums in attendance to give tests and spirit messages. After the entertainment there will be dancing. Music furnished by Meyer's Orchestra. Come and bring your friends. Lunch served in the hall. No stimulants but coffee. Prof. R. S. Ray, conductor.

ALFRED E. GILES.—On Sunday last Alfred E. Giles passed on to the sunny spheres of the Summerland, there to rejoin the partner of his earthly sojourn, and to enter into the enjoyment of the realities of the beyond which he had fully accepted for so many years. He had lived an honored and useful life in this vicinity and was highly respected by all who knew him. He had exceeded the "allotted span" by some fifteen years, as he was in his 85th year. We learn that the cause of his departure was through an accident connected with a gas heater, for on last Wednesday morning, Feb. 10, he was found lying on a couch unconscious from inhaling gas which had escaped from a small heater in the room. He remained unconscious two days, and finally rallied enough to speak an occasional word. His left hand was burned, and it was evident that it happened in turning off the gas and there were other signs to show that the escape of the gas was purely accidental, and probably unknown to Mr. Giles. Mr. Giles recovered from the effects of the gas, but died from infirmities incident to old age and feeble condition. Our friend was born Nov. 2, 1819, at Beverly, and was a resident of Roxbury a number of years. He was a graduate of Brown University, and practiced law in Boston from 1850 until 1876. Having acquired a competency, he retired from practice and has resided ever since in Hyde Park, Mass., in the house where he died, 265 Fairmount avenue. Our arisen brother was of a literary turn of mind and produced a number of books and pamphlets among which were, "The Sabbath Question Considered by a Layman," "A Letter to Massachusetts Members of Congress on Plural Marriages and the Mormon Problem," and "The Iniquity of Compulsory Vaccination." Mr. Giles had very strong views on the question, believing it to be wrong to the individual to be obliged to be vaccinated himself or to have his dear ones vaccinated, when it was against the wishes of their parents or guardians.—Banner of Light.

The Tribune, published at Princeton, Ill., has the following in reference to the good work done by J. A. Bailey: "A series of meetings were held in Union Hall—three in number, beginning last Friday night and ending Sunday night, which were conducted by J. A. Bailey, a prominent merchant of Clinton, Iowa. Mr. Bailey's theme Friday evening was Pride and Prejudice, or the Opposition of Mankind to Anything Like Innovation. This gentleman, who is a cultured and conservative speaker, spoke along the lines of the need of more abundant proof of the immortality of the soul, and said that where we were commanded to have faith, we were also enjoined to add to the faith knowledge, and said in proof of this statement that modern investigations had proved conclusively to any reasonable person, who had a receptive mind, that not only do we live beyond the grave, but that our departed friends can communicate with us under certain conditions on the earth plane. The lectures on Saturday and Sunday evenings were well attended and the interest manifested was apparent. The Saturday evening subject was Internal and External Evidence of Immortality, and the speaker declared it was possible to receive proofs to our physical sense of the continuity of life. The person seeking such light must put forth an effort, 'Knock and it shall be opened unto you, seek and ye shall find.' Any person can receive such light, by sitting in silent meditation alone at certain times, at stated periods, something like the Quakers when they wait on the spirit to move them. At the conclusion of each lecture tests in psychometry or mind-reading measurement was given at random to anyone in the audience, by taking some article belonging to the person, such as a watch or handkerchief, and reading their character and some incidents. Some of these tests were surprisingly true."

Dr. H. E. Ballard writes: "The Church of Higher Forces (formerly Universal Occult Church) holds regular meetings afternoons at 3; evenings at 8, in Douglass Hall, Indiana avenue and 35th street. The children's progressive lyceum meets at 2. Last Sunday Dr. Walter DeVoe spoke for us and is to speak for us this coming Sunday. The Doctor will take up the subject of Higher Thought, where he left off last Sunday. The Doctor was so well received by his listeners, that we feel encouraged to extend him another invitation when he has time for us. Although a comparatively young worker along the lines of spiritual unfoldment, he is destined to become a shining light in developing the truth to make it visible to the investigator. The beautiful thoughts from the doctor were embellished by vocal and instrumental music, recitations and psychometric readings by the gifted psychic, Mrs. Grace Aitken, and others. Saturday, the 27th inst., the eleventh social of this church will be held at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Aitken. These socials having passed our most sanguine expectations, we naturally look for a very enjoyable time."

Mrs. L. Robinson writes from Baltimore, Md.: "On Sunday, Feb. 14, in the Second Spiritual Church of Baltimore, Md., was held memorial exercises for our late brother, Simeon White, who entreed the higher life one month ago. Brother White was an earnest and sincere Spiritualist of twenty-five years' standing. His doors were always open for all who were desirous of investigating the many phases of Spiritualism. He was a champion of the truth and always sought for the highest and the best. Being also a veteran of the Civil War, the members of Dushane Post, No. 3, took part in the exercises, making them very impressive with their beautiful ceremonies. Brother White leaves a wife who is one of Baltimore's earnest workers in the cause of truth, and a reliable medium."

W. H. Kiser lives at Colfax, Iowa. His wife is a most estimable lady and an excellent medium, well known at one time in Chicago as Mrs. De Wolf. They were in Des Moines, Iowa, from the 8th to the 16th of this month. Mr. Kiser writes: "We have almost felt ourselves imprisoned ever since a short time after seeing you in your office while in Chicago last November, on account of the cold winter, accompanied with ice all over this country about 2 inches deep. We are anxious to spread the light by independent slate-writing, together with other phases of mediumship, and our friends in spirit are still more anxious to open the eyes of the blind by furnishing manifestations in daylight, thus proving the continuity of life; yet few there are in Colfax who would give a genuine medium a hearing, hence are in ignorance of the demonstrative proof of immortality so near their own homes. We look forward each week for our visitor, The Progressive Thinker, for in that we can see the pros and cons of many things. It seems to the writer that if he can believe that such and such a one is doing as well as he or she knows, then in this case we should remember that this is about all that any one can do, hence the great necessity for self-improvement by each and every one, exercising charity, patience, sympathy and love to all who may differ in religious as well as other matters."

Sarah Stone Rockhill writes from Alliance, Ohio: "I could not think of doing without The Progressive Thinker, which I have taken from the first. I think it has improved all the time, especially for the last few months. You keep it strictly up-to-date. I am pleased and charmed by the display of ability the symposium called out in different persons, and am glad they do not forget 'they are our brothers yet,' though viewing truth from different standpoints. How ably Sister Huntley conducted her part of the discussion. Sorry she cannot continue, though to my mind it is not a crime to be a medium. I have never come in contact with the dark or obsessing side, and have perfect faith in the God of nature through the law of evolution. I think the unfoldment of our psychic powers or spiritual senses is the blossom of our earth life purpose. I want to speak a good word for Sister Cora B. Morrill of Grand Rapids, Mich. It seems that place is a center for developing mediums. This sister is wonderfully gifted. She is a trumpet medium. One evening through the trumpet a spirit told her what was in store for her in the immediate future; that she was to be used on the platform as a teacher of truth, giving directions how and when she should sit for development. Since that night she sees and hears her guide, and does not need the trumpet. From the month she gave to our society it is easy to see she will be one of our brightest lights, Her guides will train her on the pronunciation of words, etc., so in her case there will be no need of a Morris Pratt Institute."

A. C. Doane writes from Summerland, Cal.: "Thanks to Mrs. Florence Huntley, and Salvarona, and Prof. H. D. Garrison for their contributions. I for one feel like thanking Mrs. Huntley for her able articles in The Progressive Thinker, for it is just such writers as the above named who keep The Progressive Thinker the leading paper in Spiritualism, for the science of spirit is the science of life, and thus saith the spirits or thus saith the Lord must both come under the search light of the all-seeing eye of spiritual science, and that all-seeing eye is in humanity, not outside of the human organization, as orthodox Christianity has been teaching for the past 1904 years—a false date, established on a false foundation, which founded a mode of idolatry to enslave human beings under the hypnotic power of priestcraft, therefore who ever comes to the rescue to liberate the human mind from the controlling power of another mind, be that controlling power in a physical body or a spiritual body, is an Angel of Mercy—to be admired by all liberty-loving souls. That is the mission of true Spiritualism, and it is doing its work in many ways and under many names. Don't be so selfish, brothers and sisters, as to want other people to look through our eyes as we see things. Remember the broad mind of Thomas Paine took for his motto, 'The world is my country, and to do good is my religion.' He left no room on earth to build creeds. By our actions we are known; not by creeds."

Thos. S. Murray, of Arkansas City, Kansas, writes: "As a teacher and superintendent in the public school work for over forty years, and an investigator of Spiritualism since the Rochester rappings first attracted attention, I want to thank Hudson Tuttle for his frank statement on obsession, brought out by the question of G. W. Woodman, in a late issue of The Progressive Thinker. Character development is one of the things that every wise teacher puts great stress upon. If a correct chart of the strong and the weak points of the ancestors of the child for three or more generations could be furnished, it would greatly aid both parents and teachers to diagnose the probable traits of character most likely to show signs of development. From the intelligent, well-trained mother, having knowledge of the ancestry of her child, and of its ante-natal environments, I have received great assistance in helping it to repress undesirable traits, and to strengthen desirable faculties co-ordinate. The harmonious development of the physical, intellectual, moral and spiritual faculties of each and every child, so as to develop both knowledge and wisdom, is, perhaps, the highest attainment desired by the state. The principle laid down in the constitution, and embodied in the laws of the state of Kansas, viz.: 'That the property of the state shall educate the children of the state,' rests upon the facts of experience, 'that it is cheaper and much better for the state to preserve order through the lift up of education, than to punish for crimes committed through ignorance.' The facts are that the state and the nation holds each sane person of age of discretion responsible for his or her acts, and the plea of the man, the woman and the snake in the garden, nor obsession will exonerate him."

Annie D. Colford writes from Punta Gorda, Fla.: "I hope any brother or sister interested in Spiritualism will not fail to attend some of the meetings held by Mrs. Amy Buchanan, at her home, 112 East 8th street, Jacksonville, Fla. Her trumpet meetings on Friday evenings, and inspirational speaking on Sunday evenings, are well worth going to, for you hear good, wholesome truths and also receive genuine messages from the loved ones, besides talking with genial George Christie, the control of the trumpet circle."

AND
Other Offerings.
BY
EMMA ROOD TUTTLE.

This volume contains a selection of the best poems of this gifted author and storiettes contributed by Clair Tuttle in her charming style. There are 285 pages, with six full-page illustrations, including photogravures of the author and Clair Tuttle. It is bound in blue with aluminum embossing. Many of the poems are especially adapted for recitations.

The Author needs no introduction to the spiritual public. Her songs are among the best in spiritual literature. Epes Sargent said of one of her poems that it was the equal of anything in the language, and that she was the poet of the New Dispensation.

The Mecca says: "Psychic Poems."

That erudite critic, Wm. Emmette Coleman: "To all lovers of good poetry this book is confidently recommended."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. Jas. Illingsworth: Q. Why do Spiritualists furnish ammunition for their enemies, as instance the author of The Great Psychological Crime?

A. Spiritualists do not furnish such "ammunition." No one but an enemy of Spiritualism would do so. Those who have studied the subject most closely, well know that the objections urged are false in their premises, and altogether misleading. But those who have not thus studied, and those who seek for damaging arguments, eagerly seize the weapons thus manufactured ready for their use.

If a book should be written, containing all the rascality, frauds and liaisons of gospel ministers, the crimes of persecutions in the name of the church, as proving the theory that the office of ministration of the gospel was the greatest crime in the calendar, where among all the religious publishing houses would it be able to find one, so recreant to principle, to give it publication? The churches are too wise, to give a "free platform" to their enemies.

Spiritualism is so strong on its foundation of truth that it can not only afford to invite the onslaught of its enemies, but gathers strength by their attack. It is not afraid of the truth, and can defend itself from falsehood. The atmosphere is cleared by such storms, which seem necessary to destroy the rubbish which accumulates in periods of calm. It needs opposition to call out its host of gallant defenders, as the rerecent discussion of the "great crime," fully sustains. The process has been "strenuous," and many have expressed anxiety, but thus far the chaff only has been blown away.

Yet let us not forget, nor be bullied by our optimism into negligence of watchfulness that, the whitest and most perfect statue ever carved from Parian marble, may be covered with mud and its beauty effaced by hoodlums slinging garbage scooped from the gutter!

W. H. Moore: Q. We are said to have five senses, or processes by which we obtain our knowledge of objective realities. But all these senses come under one head—and that is known as feeling. If that is so, why do I not experience some sensation when using my eyes, or when sound strikes my ear?

A. There is only one sense that properly comes under the head of feeling, and that is the sensation by that name. It is produced by direct contact with the sensatory nerves. The sensation of heat and cold and of touch are examples. Taste is a blending of touch, chemical and electrical action, all of which are transformed in the brain to the sensation by that name.

Hearing is not produced by touch. It is a recognition of waves in the air. A sounding body is one which throws off such waves and when these strike the tympanum of the ear, by a wonderful mechanism they are intensified and received on the auditory nerves, and there transformed into the sensation of hearing.

The eye is formed to receive the waves created by a luminous body. These waves are concentrated on the ends of the fibers which terminate the optic nerve, and produce in the brain the sensation of light. Unless congested as in inflammation there is little sensation in the auditory nerves, or olfactory nerves. They are for receiving vibrations, and sensations of contact would diminish or destroy their functions. When congested, and the sensation of feeling thus made prominent, the waves of light, striking the retina, are felt and most painfully. Waves of sound strike the auditory nerves as tangible blows, and are transformed into "feeling."

Invalid: Q. Is the open air cure as now practiced in many places, as in the sanitarium in the Adirondacks, beneficial?

A. This correspondent refers to the cold and fresh air cure which has become the latest fad, encouraged by the owners of sanitariums in the mountain regions. At these health resorts the temperature has been as low this winter as 30 degrees below zero, yet frail women debilitated by consumption, and men who have been given over to die, have remained most of the day out of doors and slept at night in beds on the porches. These porches are inclosed with glass and when all have retired are thrown wide open, so practically the patient sleeps out of doors. Tents are scattered in the forest of Saranac Lake in which consumptives spend the winter, the tents at times being covered with snow. At the sanitarium they go out into the driving snow storm for hours and never think of taking cold. There are reports of wonderful cures after all hope had vanished, as there are whatever system is practiced. It is said that consumptives have gone there in the last stages of that disease and in six months returned hale and well. It is heroic treatment, and the failures are not recorded. It must be remembered that these people wear the warmest clothing, furs, hoods, and wraps and their beds are the warmest, so that really they are in a casing the temperature of which is little lower than their bodies. The air they breathe is partially warmed in the air passages before it reaches the lungs. Modified thus as it is, this extreme cold cannot be well for those who have not the strength for reaction. When one passes into extremely cold air the blood leaves the surface and is congested in the vital organs. After a time there comes reaction and the blood rushes back to the surface and there is a sense of warmth. In weak persons this may not result and serious congestion takes place. Lung troubles might thus be brought to a sudden and fatal crisis.

Cold, pure air and sunlight are the remedies nature gives all her children of the wood and field. These are her healing agencies, more potent than all others and a great benefit will come of this cold air fad. People will not be afraid of air as many have been, and will allow their windows to remain open. If they give this attention, they will not have to go tramping for health.

The conditions which will restore health will preserve it. Throw open to the sunlight and air every room in the house. Have no dark corners where dampness will breed disease germs. Have the air in your sleeping apartments as fresh as the wind out doors. Have warm covering and let the temperature go down; it will do no harm as long as you are comfortably warm.

Ignorance: Q. Can a little child return and communicate through the planchette?

What consolation can a mother have if her little one has gone where there are so many evil spirits?

A. When children thus return, some spirit friend constantly with them, communicates for them.

A mother requires no consolation while her little one is here, although there are evil persons in this life, even to the same ratio there is in the next. A child is received into the guardian care of those willing and anxious to care for it, and knows less of evil influences than it would in mortal life.

A mother can have the consolation that her little one is more tenderly cared for than she could care for it herself.

THOMPSON, THE MATERIALIZING MEDIUM.

Mr. Thompson, a materializing medium of Kingston, N. Y., had his methods exposed by Mr. Rasmussen of No. 1110 Bedford avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y. His system of materialization is very startling—startling when known how it is done. That Mr. Thomposn's career is rather of the mixed order, is shown by the following from the Daily Standard, of Gloversville, N. Y., bearing the date of Feb. 10, 1896:

"Samuel Thompson, the Spiritualistic Medium, Exposed—Odd Fellows Up to His Game—He was Giving the Grip of that Society and in Doing So Gave Himself Away—Ordered to Leave the City and He Did Not Wait for Morning to Arrive Before Complying With the Order.

"It was the third and last of a series of seances which was begun last Friday evening, and which were apparently very successful and satisfactory; the circle was harmonious (?) and the cabinet manifestations and materializations were as wonderful and mystifying as could be desired by the most ardent Spiritualist.

"Suspicion was aroused, however, in the minds of a few skeptics who only awaited the opportunity for an expose. The opportunity came when a form came before the curtain and said it was the spirit of John Roberts, a prominent Odd Fellow who died at Mayfield last fall. In the dim, uncertain light it was difficult to discern more than the mere face and form, which seemed to be about six feet in height, and around his neck could faintly be seen what purported to be a regalia of the order. Waxing bolder John (?) motioned to several Odd Fellows present to come up and see him and proceeded to give them some of the grips peculiar to that order, and this was where the medium made the greatest mistake of his life, for this link has never been broken by a true Odd Fellow and although the spirit (?) tried to break loose, the links were too strong for him and he was dragged out into the middle of the room, disrobed, a light was brought and there stood — — Thompson, covered with confusion and trembling and quailing before his friends whom he had attempted to deceive The regalia which had been on his neck was a piece of cheesecloth twisted into form as near like the real article as possible, and apparently the same cloth which had done service the night before as a masonic apron and also a dress for the spirit of little "Blue Bell."

"Explanations were in order, but none could be made and none were attempted, Thompson simply groveling before his accusers, begging for mercy and offering to make any reparation in his power, but he was simply told that he must not be seen in Gloversville this morning or in the future, and wisely taking this advice he was well on his way to Kingston before daylight. It is to the credit of the Odd Fellows to know that this man who has been getting money out of the people of this city for some time past, is at last exposed and that probably he will steer clear of Gloversville in the future."

The above from the Standard speaks for itself. Of course he will continue to be patronized by the gullibles and semi-idiots. There are enough of that breed of humans in this country to support a good many such mediums.

FREEDOM.

Yet, Freedom! yet thy banner, torn, but flying,
Streams like the thunderstorm against the wind;
Thy trumpet-voice, though broken now and dying,
The loudest still the tempest leaves behind;
Thy tree hath lost its blossoms, and the rind,
Chopped by the axe, looks rough and little worth,
But the sap lasts—and still the seed we find
Sown deep, even in the bosom of the North;
So shall a better spring less bitter seed bring forth. —Lord Byron.

SURELY A GHOST.

SEES AN AZTEC GHOST—MEXICAN HIDALGO GUIDED TO CITY OF DEAD BY SPIRIT HANDS.—STORY WELL VOUCHED FOR—BONES AND RELICS OF VANISHED RACE OFFERED IN SUPPORT OF WEIRD TALE.

As set forth in a paper named "Modern Mexico," Coatepec de Morelos, near Zitacuro, in the state of Michoacan, has always had a reputation for ghosts and spirits. There is not an inhabitant, man, woman or child, who will not tell you confidently that he has see one or more of the inhabitants of the air, or the streams, or the graves of the many dead that lie buried all about the village, for the place is a very old one.

A short time ago Coatepec had a real, live ghost sensation, and there are dozens in the village who would swear upon the holiest altar in the parish church that they had seen his ghostship himself. One could gather evidence enough in Coatepec in ten minutes to satisfy the most skeptical of juries that ghosts actually do exist, and that, moreover, they take an interest in the affairs of humanity.

If you go to Coatepec and are fortunate enough to have a letter of introduction to some one high enough in the social scale to insure you an entree into the right society, you will probably meet Jose Miranda, and will be assured by a dozen persons before the day has passed that he is a "very intelligent person, very intelligent," with a decided accent upon the word very. Yet Jose Miranda was the man who not only saw the ghost, but secured proofs of its material existence, if a ghost can be said to have any material existence.

Ghosts of Coatepec.

Ghosts have always been more or less fond of Coatepec. In early Aztec times is was a place of great renown, being one of the several holy cities of Mexico. And the titular god of the place was Quetzalcoatl, the winged-serpent god. And the city still bears his name; for Coatepec means the hill of the serpent, referring not to the animal, but the god. Thus the people of Coatepec will gravely tell you that they and their ancestors, away back beyond the memory of history, have been favored with sights of ghosts and spirits and gods.

The people of Coatepec claim to be Christians. But there are those who are uncharitable enough to say that the lower class people have their old Aztec gods hidden away in the caves of the mountains near by, and that they observe the Aztec religious ceremonies.

For more than a year ghosts and spirits have been wandering about the streets of Coatepec, and over the neighboring mountains, like a colony of restless night owls. And they have never been the least bit shy, like ordinary ghosts, for they have been seen by hundreds.

Jose Miranda himself is one of the most intelligent men in the village, a landowner and a councilman. One night, some weeks ago, he was coming home from a neighboring village, when a ghost, all in white, its grave cowl fallen back upon its shoulders, leaving its head exposed to view, met him. It was standing between him and the moon, which was shining brightly through the hollow sockets of the eyes, and a bullet hole in the skull. It stood still and pointed with one bony hand toward the mountains. Miranda was unable to move. But as soon as the horse caught sight of the ghost it took to its heels and made for the village as fast as it could, and it never slackened pace until it reached home.

Caught by the Phantom.

A week later Jose was riding along the same road when the ghost met him in the same place. But this time it anticipated any shy on the part of the horse, for it seized the animal by the bridle with one hand and pointed with the other in the direction of the hills. Jose saw at once that he was in for it, so he decided that he had better humor the ghost. He, therefore, turned his horse's head in the direction indicated and started off rapidly. In about a quarter of an hour they arrived at the foothills, where the ghost stopped and pointed to a huge stone at the foot of a tall tree, after which he immediately disappeared into the earth. Jose sprang from his horse and marked the place with a couple of sticks in the form of a cross, as indicative of his willingness to do the will of the ghost. Then he rode slowly homeward.

Next day he tried to persuade some men to go with him and help him dig up the big stone to see what was beneath it. But the story was enough for the villagers. Everyone decided he was ghost-haunted and that it was unwise to have anything to do with such a man. At the end of two weeks, however, he succeeded in persuading an Indian from a neighboring town and a Protestant missionary from Mexico City, who happened to be in Coatepec at the time, to accompany him.

The three ghost hunters set out one night at midnight, armed with picks, spades and crowbars. When they got to the place they tried to move the big stone, but they could not even move it. At last they dug under the side of it and let it roll down the hill. Then they began to dig into the place where the stone had been. After an hour's steady work they came upon a circle of skulls, or, rather, a part of the circle, the whole of which was unearthed a few days later. They also found a stone axe and other relics of a long-past age. The next day there were hundreds of people ready to go out and help in the digging.

Before the Aztec.

On examination it was found that the big stone had been arrested with the under-side up. It was evidently a monument of some kind, for it had carved upon its surface part of a gigantic hand, somewhat roughly but symmetrically cut in relief. Further excavation disclosed the whole of the great circle of skulls, which was nearly thirty feet in diameter. Near them there was not a single other bone. In this curious grave there were many relics of a past age. Among these were stone whistles, sea-shells, seed jugs, baked pottery, stone grinding and weaving tools, jade heads and many beautifully worked images. These latter showed that this curious Golgotha must have belonged to a people of importance. In the grave were also found some stone slabs with ancient hieroglyphics, which evidently belonged to a people who lived in the country before the coming of the Aztecs.

If any man still doubts there are ghosts in Coatepec he can find most of the above articles, and many more, at the home of Jose Miranda, and there is scarcely an inhabitant who has not at least one relic from this ancient grave.

Investigation made lately shows that near the "Circle of Skulls," as the place is now called, are the remains of a very ancient city, almost buried by landslides from the foothills.

THE LUCK OF JAY BURNER

A Heavenly Sketch Showing That They Do Things Different "Over There."

Something unusual was going on in heaven. Also hell was in an uproar. Archangel Gabriel was blowing with his mighty lungs the highest tones of the trumpet. The understudies and newspaper angels were running up and down from hell to heaven and back, yelling as they ran: "Latest extra; latest! Deported for disbelief."

The fact was that when a late member of the Manhattan Liberal Club and Liberal Art Society, by the name of Jay Burner, was as usual shipped from Evergreen cemetery, C. O. D. to St. Peter, and when Jay Burner on St. Peter's usual question, What are Burner's beliefs? answered that he had no beliefs but disbeliefs, St. Peter refused to give a receipt to the expressman and Burner was put in the ante-room of hell to await the result of a secret session of the immigration commissioners.

And indeed a secret meeting was held to decide what was to be done with a man who did not want to believe in things in which the majority believes. In a special room assigned for that purpose five wise personages were assembled. They were Confucius the Chinese philosopher, Buddha the Indian, Moses the Jew, Jesus the Christian, and Mohammed the Turk. Confucius, as the oldest, was elected chairman of the committee. St. Peter was appointed sergeant-at-arms inside, and Lucifer watchman outside. Jay Burner was brought in and Confucius asked him: "What are you?"

"A man," answered Burner.

"We do not need men here, but I mean of what religious belief are you?"

Burner answered: "I am an Infidel and do not believe in God or in any such dreams and fantasies."

Nearly everybody present fainted. After St. Peter had applied smelling salts to all, Confucius asked Burner again: "What is the object of your coming here?"

Burner answered: "I came to organize and count up the smart people in heaven in order to find out how many fools remain on earth that are willing to stand much longer all the nonsensical laws which are piled upon them day after day in the parliaments and congresses of the world in the name of 'Liberty and Free Speech.'"

"That's enough!" said Confucius, "take him away and put him in a cold room in hell and see that no one talks to him until we finish our session."

Poor Jay Burner, who was so fresh and impertinent that he dared to speak the truth, a thing which is seldom heard on earth nor evidently in heaven, was taken away to a cold room for the purpose, I suppose, of cooling down and thinking over his daring answers, while the committee of five continued the secret session. Presently Buddha asked for the floor, which was granted at once, and he said: "Gentlemen, Comrades: This is a very bad sign. Infidelity and Freethinking are spreading rapidly on earth. The people are beginning to find out the fake side of religion."

"I beg your pardon," interrupted Jesus, "if they find out the fake side of your Buddhistic religion, that does not mean that all other religions are no good."

"Monsieur Jesus," said Buddha, "you yourself took the principal idea of self-abnegation and non-resistance from my sayings and my religion, and from a business standpoint I can sue any time for plagiarism and you will have to pay heavy damages."

"Both of you are dreamers," interrupted Moses. "You, Jesus, made the fatal mistake of proclaiming yourself God and also by adding two more gods, making a trinity, or three in one, which by itself is a great absurdity."

"Is it my fault," said Jesus, "that my disciples and the Catholic priests made out all this? I never dreamed of it."

"What are you talking about, anyhow?" exclaimed Mohammed, "and what are your religions, anyway? What do you give to people who come up here after long suffering on earth? Nothing! My religion gives a paradise full of beautiful girls, tobacco, kish-mich (Turkish candy), etc."

"You make me sick," yelled Buddha, but Confucius used the gavel vigorously, being aroused from sleep by the hot debate. "No tickee, no washee," he said. "If you are not given the floor, you have no right to talk."

"I ask for the floor," said Jesus, and having got it, he continued: "The reason of the evil spreading over earth lies in the woman. She has become emancipated and she tempts the man to commit sin. I will tell you, gentlemen, as a secret, that I know of a priest who has committed sin—yes!"

"And whose fault is it, if not yours, Moses?" interrupted Buddha again, while Confucius once more fell asleep, "it is you, Moses, who invented the story of the apple and the serpent, and now, when the fake is discovered, there is trouble! Why didn't you stick to the clothing business or to the pawnshop? Why did you undertake the religious business, anyhow?"

Confucius woke up again and said: "Well, how did you decide about the Burner affair? What should be done to him who disbelieves in God?"

"One moment," said Jesus, "there comes up a question, where is God? Indeed, I'll tell you the truth, gentlemen, I have been looking for him all the time since I came here and cannot find him."

"And I, and I, and I!" everybody exclaimed. "Where is God, did anyone of you see him even once?"

Nobody seems to answer affirmatively, but the door opened and in danced Lucifer, and said: "Gentlemen, I happen to overhear, as usual, your conversation, and I see that you are now in a difficult position trying to solve two questions, namely, First, where is God? and secondly, What to do to Mr. Jay Burner, who does not believe in God. You are asking, where is God? Do you know, gentlemen, that God is neither in heaven nor in hell? He is on earth! He is in every living being's heart; he is in every flower, he is in the sunshine, in the moonshine, he is the truth; and if humanity needs leaders let them be not dreamers with their phantasms, but energetic people who will tear down the blinds of superstition and darkness and let light and sunshine into the human mind, then there will be the kingdom of God, or Truth, on earth.

"The second question, What to do with that unbeliever Burner? My advice is to take him in straight to heaven and let him teach the inhabitants to see things in a true light and free me and all of you, the pack of dreamers, of your religious superstition and intolerance, and we will become free men with noble feelings and true hearts."

Though Confucius was protesting vigorously: "No tickee, no washee," by a vote of four against one Jay Burner was not deported, but installed in Paradise as God's representative.—Platon Brounoff in Truth Seeker.

PSYCHIC MYSTERIES.

Some Thoughts Along New Inspirational Lines.

After a careful perusal of the great issue, No. 739 of your excellent paper, I am moved to write.

I am greatly interested in all the pros and cons of the entire issue and in fact, in all the others, but will begin with the first article, The Great Mystery of Spirit Forms, by Salvarona. His statements in part are unique. I have been taught for many years by my spirit teachers along these lines of the science of life and the relations of man and things and although this gentleman expresses himself differently, I see points of convergence with my own small stock of knowledge of this kind, and feel that perhaps a few statements may prove helpful to some of your readers, hence this effort.

Many times I have seen clairvoyantly the psychic system in space to which man's psychic or nerve system corresponds and is thereto attached, and therein active. I have also seen that this psychic or nerve system in space is contained in the ether of space and oscillates through it as a silvery mass of wavelets. I have often looked upon it and felt like saying it was an ocean of ether because of these movements, so like a body of water moves in waves when not unduly agitated.

This ether is of different qualities and shades on each successive plane of expression in sentient life, and in accordance with these advancements of life's expressions, the vibratory ratios differ and the thought circles are enlarged. I also have frequently witnessed brain activities separate from and also active in this referred-to system in space and we have long been taught here, that brains are the workshops of the spirit and are receiving and transmitting centers of thought and its exchange, very many lines going to and from them constantly. It has often reminded me of a union telegraph station; also a telephone service explains the process to some extent. It is not the brain alone, however, but the whole ganglionic or nerve system which serves in these processes of bringing in strength and vital supplies, as well as receiving and transmitting thought and ideas to individuals.

I have seen that under different conditions the effects produced upon persons differ. For instance, once while being so instructed, a number of persons were brought to my notice. The brains of these persons were marked as spectrums or key-boards for this special lesson. Streams of light or inspiration were directed upon these brains or minds, or rather flashed upon them by oscillating thought waves and this light divided itself into specific brain cells for the formation and expression of thoughts and ideas. Now these brains under seemingly the same treatment were differently affected. In one or two the mental illumination was very marked, in others scarcely perceptible. Once only I was permitted to see these nerves of man's and nature's brain magnified to my vision by a powerful magnifying instrument held before me by my spiritual instructor. I thus plainly saw that these nerves are hollow and that a substance passes through them; also that a strong desire or aspiration puts forth these fibres or signals, others come from other directions, they meet, connect, there is an induction, it goes to the brain, makes its impact and lo! a thought or idea has birth. But there are different ways; for instance, intelligence is directed upon minds that make no conscious effort for such reception and it is seldom successful even in part in making an impact so that a thought or an idea can be consciously perceived by the individual.

One time while seeing such brain activities as referred to, I was admonished to note well the small electric click that makes the impact on brain cells and lo! I saw, also heard clairaudiently the different brain cells tapped in rhythmic regularity forming words and sentences. It reminded me of forming words and sentences on the typewriter by the manipulator who touches the keys to make the imprint. One's own indwelling spirit is the operator in this thought manipulation, but it needs our own respiration to make the click or impact. It is true in this sense, that the creation, receiving and exchanging of thought and the weaving of each one's web of life in God's loom (the psychic system in space) are all conducted by the breath and pulse of the Creator and of every creature. It was once my privilege and delight to clairaudiently hear creation's rhythm chanted by all things that are. Every thing has a voice of its kind and degree and all these voices blend, the harmony is complete. In the chorus of this wonderful rhythm, countless millions of these electric clicks which make thought impact, joined in a soft rippling melody. It was too much for me, I wept. I could not then nor can I now describe the grandeur of that rhythm, so I pass on though the half is not told.

I wish to say a few words on the subject of The Great Psychological Crime. It is certainly well defended on both sides. The author of the book sees things from a different point of view than myself and expresses himself accordingly, in the main. I cannot agree with him, although I see points of convergence in some things he states and those I have been taught, also experienced for over thirty-five years, therefore it is nothing new to me nor to us here.

I have learned in this inner school of the spirit, that to live is to be a soul; that souls are the original seed-germs or patterns of the form that is to be builded; that each seed or pattern contains all that this soul or life should accomplish as its contribution to the vibratory ratios, as also to the transformation of substances, etc. Upon the vibratory ratios creation's advancement and general progression is dependent.

All species beneath the human are but servant creations in this sense, to thus bring up the vibrating ratios to the fitness for man to appear upon the stage of action in the world's great drama.

Man is provided with an immortal soul and soul attributes as well as with the material or corporeal. These immortal souls are stamped with their heritage of eternal life and cannot nor do not perish; but the men and women who indulge in carnal thought and conduct only, create no vibratory thought lines or currents for the immortal soul to be attached to when released from such ill-favored conditions and corrupt dwelling and as a rule it builds another earth-form through which to gain experience and pursues its endless journey.

There are other processes that have been explained to me often, but I cannot give them now.

THE BEAUTIFUL SOUVENIR VOLUME,
By A. LEAH UNDERHILL,
(Of the Fox Family.)

The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $1.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. "THE UNKNOWN"
—BY—
CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. Price $2.00.

RENDING THE VAIL

A Most Remarkable Book Concerning the Existence of Man, and All Things, and All Being

It Was Written by Materialized Forms at the House of J. H. Pratt, Spring Hill, Kansas, William W. Aber Being the Medium.

"Rending the Vail" is pronounced by Col. R. T. Van Horn, of Kansas City, Mo., as a most remarkable work. That Col. Van Horn is fully competent to judge, we will say that he has been a member of congress for four sessions, an editor of a leading daily, and a profound thinker along scientific lines. He says:

"The principal contributors to the book are four in number: Dr. W. H. Reed, who is called the chemical control of the medium; William Denton, Thomas Paine and Michael Faraday. There are numerous others giving a few incidental and mostly personal messages or dissertations on scientific, philosophic, religious, theologic and occult topics—from world-building, the origin of life, or religions, of scientific discovery, and the laws of cosmos or nature—in fact the entire field of human thought. The limitation seemed to be only that of the spectators to ask questions.

"In addition to this mass of messages, there are in the book about sixty illustrations—44 of them portraits. These were drawn by a form standing out in the room at a desk, the form or personality to be sketched at the doorway of the cabinet and the finished picture handed to one of the circle and filed away by the secretary.

"What will attract the attention of even the non-Spiritualist reader is that the topics treated by Prof. Denton, Thomas Paine and Prof. Faraday, are in kind, in thought and style with those to which their active lives in this world were devoted—in literary character as different here as in their works extant on our book-shelves.

"The Spiritualist press and its contributors are just now discussing a number of questions as to the nature of spirit, of spirit return; the want of agreement between those returning as to conditions in their present world; the limitations—that the organism of the medium imposes upon communication, and various kindred questions. All these are treated, some of them very fully, but all rationally understandable. Also phenomena, inspiration and such, to many, knotty subjects, are freely and fully discussed.

"The work is not written by the medium nor by any one connected with the society or circle. All was delivered by personalities distinct from either, written down by the secretary as spoken, or if in writing, filed away. At the next meeting the minutes in full were read, corrected, or criticised by those present, and by the authors, and when approved by both laid away for the book.

"The work is unique in the history of spirit communication. Swedenborg, Andrew Jackson Davis, and Maria King wrote under inspiration. Newbrough wrote Oahspe automatically by type-writer. "Rending the Vail" was written and spoken by full-form personalities and is printed as given. One remarkable thing about the writing may not be amiss here. As high as 1,200 words a minute were written by actual timing by the watch.

"It is but just to the secretary to say that his work has been admirably done—not only faithfully and efficiently, but with excellent taste. There are no dogmatic parentheses, no interpolations of ipse dixits of the scribe. He simply states that "a form purporting to be So-and-So, "appeared and delivered the following"—stating whether it was oral or in writing.

"In reading the book, and I have read it all, this modest, self-retiring, literary rendering of these extraordinary happenings by the secretary has been a source of constant admiration. It adds character to the book and inspires constant confidence in the integrity that from the first page to the last enhances the respect and interest of the reader."

This remarkable book, "Rending the Vail," is for sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Price $1.75.

A Mine of Valuable Reflections and Suggestions.

This work was automatically transcribed by George A. Fuller, M. D., gentleman who stands high as a lecturer and medium. It is a mine of valuable reflections and suggestions. The paragraphs are short, suggestive and inspiring. Every one of them leads to something higher, grander, nobler. Price $1.00.

VOLNEY'S RUINS
—AND—
THE LAW OF NATURE
TO WHICH IS ADDED
Volney's Answer to Dr. Priestly, a Biographical Notice by Count Dara, and the Zodiacal Signs and Constellations by the Editor;
Also, a Map of the Astrological Heavens of the Ancients.

Printed on heavy paper, from new plates, in large, clear type, with portrait and illustrations. One volume, 8vo, 248 pages; paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

This is undoubtedly one of the best and most useful books ever published. It eloquently advocates the best interests of mankind, and clearly points out the sources of human ignorance and misery. The author is supposed to meet in the ruins of Palmyra an apparition or phantom, which explains the true principles of society, and the causes of both the prosperity and the ruin of ancient states. A general assembly of the nations is at length convened, a legislative body formed, the source and origin of religion, of government, and of laws discussed, and the Law of Nature, founded on justice and equity—is finally proclaimed to an expectant world.

A SPIRITUAL WEDDING.

A Rich Display of Presents—Salient Items and Notes.

After speaking in the Universalist Church in Utica, visiting old-time friends—Mrs. David Jones among them—and some pleasant rehearsals of valuable experiences by Kate Stiles, who is giving a month to Utica investigators, with her fine psychic gifts, I took leave of my hospitable entertainers, Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Swift, and whirled through space at about 60 miles an hour to Buffalo, where I was again welcomed by Mrs. Dr. Matteson and family and remained over night. It may interest many who have been benefited by her rare mediumship and excellent remedies, to know that she is likely to place her specific medicines on the market, in a way to bring them in reach of the millions who know her not, or only by reading of her works.

Her personal examinations and diagnoses will continue so far as they can be available, as long as her physical constitution holds out. But all earthly forms are limited, and all human actors pass the Great Divide, "and their works do follow them." The great Dr. Newton, Paul Castor, Bryant, John Scott, Mrs. Mettler, and many others who served the sick and cured many thousands, have all passed behind the veil, and are seen no more in the busy affairs of this primitive sphere. They have left the sunshine of their deeds as examples, and testimonials to Spiritualism, and their memories are radiant with uses and benedictions. But this world still needs the help of such spiritually ordained healers and philanthropists in physical forms; and it behooves us to encourage and cultivate such spiritual qualities whenever we find them in a well-balanced organism and thus keep up the supply. Mediumship has been a blessing to this world to an extent that is practically incalculable, in a great variety of ways; and to cultivate and improve it is an important duty to the race.

I planned to visit the Temple and meet and hear G. H. Brooks, but the severity of the weather, and a threatening of pneumonia, held me to the house.

Arriving at 170 Liberty street, Fredonia, February 11, I found Mrs. Howe and Nellie enjoying their loneness, but willing to let me in at the risk of doubling their culinary labors.

Saturday, Feb. 13, I took the train on the D. & A. V. R. R., to Youngsville, and thence by carriage to Sugar Grove, Pa., a distance of ten miles on wheels, drawn by two horses, and there I remained over Sunday. At noon Monday I met a company of about fifty invited guests at the pleasant home of Brother and Sister Mix, well known at Lily Dale—(Mr. Mix being a trustee of the City of Light Assehmbly) and there in the presence of the assembled witnesses, Mr. Carl E. Trusdell, of Columbus, Ohio, and Miss Blanche Mix, of Sugar Grove, Pa., were formally united for the journey of life, as husband and wife, the writer officiating.

There were about sixty choice presents, making a fine display as they were distributed on several tables; and it was understood that about an equal number had been sent to Columbus to await the arrival of the happy pair, where they will commence house-keeping in the flush of youthful hopes and joys, and the ardor of mutual love. Among the presents was a large wreath of Orange leaves and blossoms, attached to their native limbs and twigs, fresh and fragrant from the orchards of Florida, sent by Mr. and Mrs. David Sherman, of North Collins, N. Y., now wintering at Lake Helen, Fla. They arrived just in time to adorn and sweeten the tables laden with beauty and usefulness in rich abundance.

During my stay at Sugar Grove I was the guest of Mrs. Harmon and family, where I fared sumptuously, and enjoyed refreshing exchanges of intellectual and social life, and reminiscences of the long ago.

Another ten-mile ride in a buggy back to Youngsville Monday afternoon, and the train landed me at Laona, at 7 p. m. From the station I had a mile to walk, facing a savage northwest wind, in the darkness. I found a place to warm just in time to save me from freezing my hands. Sixty rods further walking in that wind would have frozen my hands solid. As it was, the pain of bringing them to life was equal to an amputation, and I had a half mile to walk after that before I was safe at home. But here I am sound and happy and ready to go again when called in whatever capacity I can serve, either to lecture, attend funerals, or marriages, and always to work in the interest of Spiritualism and its humanitarian reforms.

The Progressive Thinker at hand, Wednesday, Feb. 17, and as usual it is difficult to select the most useful and interesting matter for first reading. Glancing at Charles Dawbarn's "Center of Creation," I was struck with the wanderings of genius in the fields of imagination. One expression captivated my gaze when I read: "Since no two planets would be alike therefore their evolved forms of life would surely differ from anything we could imagine or conceive." This does not appear probable to me. Why should there be such a radical difference in the evolved forms of life? If life is one everywhere, differing only in degrees and methods of expression, and matter is the same—which seems probable, if not certain—and nature is one vast whole, it would seem that gravitation, mechanics, the laws of motion, and the evolution of forms and intelligence, would be quite similar on all planets, and the order of evolution from homogeneous to heterogeneous, from chaos to organic order may be regarded as decidedly probable, on all planets. Bro. Dawbarn is decidedly original and amusing in his way of dealing with facts and fancies, and it is as good as a dose of pepsin for weak digestion.

Brother Jamieson's painful grimaces whenever a ghost confronts him make good relishes for ubiquitous readers. He groans for me because he thinks I have a hard time in my correspondence with a brilliant woman! Perhaps he is aching for an invitation to help me defend mediumship. But I can assure him that I do not need any help. I have not even realized that my task was hard. It has been quite pleasant and congenial. My fair correspondent has given me liberal latitude, and left the best mediums known to Modern Spiritualism outside the pale of the hypnotic danger. The only unpleasant thing about it is the sudden discontinuance of the discussion before half the ground is covered. If I had anticipated this, I would have dealt with the subject quite differently and introduced many points that are now left untouched.

Hudson Tuttle's lecturette is a gem at once invigorating and soothingly restful. The world moves. Skeptics whip the air with intellectual icicles and shiver the years away, and Spiritualism grows. LYMAN C. HOWE.

Field Notes of an Earnest Worker.

To the Editor:—A few words about your paper; then a line covering my work in Spiritualism. I receive your paper every week, and have for one year. It is to me what the Bible is to a rank old Methodist; I wouldn't burn one of them a bit quicker than he would his Bible. I am not stingy with them, like some Spiritualists, but I save them in a small chest until they crowd each other out, then I give them where I know they will do the most good, to those I know will take the time to read them. But I have first absorbed every drop of precious strength I can get from them. Of course there are only a few articles in them that I object to, and those are the ones that bristle with the word God.

I may be a very strange person, but since I was convinced of a life beyond the grave, through the presence of spirits, I have never been able to use the word God.

I was brought up a Baptist. Of course God and Jesus were the main suffixes and prefixes to the route that led to the eternal world beyond. When I had positive proof of a hereafter through spirit power, every way to that great heaven that I had been taught melted away like the winter snows beneath a summer sky. I had no need for any expression that I had hitherto used.

And then, the word God suggests to me the old orthodox church; the lazy good-for-nothing preachers, that get their living by begging, and it brings discord to my soul instead of harmony.

I can't see what use we have for the word. Used by a Spiritualist it teaches deception, for the ignorant do not understand what is meant when a Spiritualist uses it, and the intelligent person understands other expressions.

I don't think any one has ever heard me use that expression since I became a Spiritualist, and I have lectured four years on the public platform in Bemidji. I have made dozens of Spiritualists.

I have set hundreds to thinking and investigating.

I have never had to wish for a filled hall, for I have always had it, and when I open my meetings in the fall the churches become empty, the preachers lose their temper, and a crowd of three hundred has been a common occurrence.

This winter I have not lectured here. I have been helping the outside world a little. The last of October I received a letter from a dear good Spiritualist in a little town, St. Hilair, asking me if I would come there and lecture for a few nights. He said: "There are only three Spiritualists here, but we are anxious to have you." So I went, and after lecturing and giving platform tests for three evenings, I organized a society of 25 members, and applied for a charter. They received their charter and three weeks ago they sent for me again, and on my last trip I could feel the strength of spirit power the moment I stepped upon the platform.

I must say we have a few of the staunchest Spiritualists there now I ever met. There is Mr. Harry Swenson, the depot agent, and president of the society. You could tell he was a Spiritualist a block away; and Brother Lindahl, the jeweler and vice-president of the society. He has got it worse than Brother Swenson. You can recognize the symptoms in him when you see him coming about eight blocks away. He had the misfortune the other day to meet a preacher on his way to work, and the preacher asked him if God had saved his soul. Brother Lindahl said he wasn't acquainted with him, but if he would come up to his shop they would talk it over. The preacher did not go.

And Brother Turnell whistles like a Spiritualist. The last night I was with them we had one of the most harmonious circles I ever sat in. There were about fifteen present and every one interested and full of spirit power. Sister Lindahl is one of the finest writing mediums I ever saw. Her writings are in Norwegian, and they are beautiful. She is a lady of great tact and ability in the work; she has a way of drawing people into Spiritualism in such a smooth, sweet way, that no one would think of doubting her. Sister Turnell is almost an invalid, but blessed with courage of a Spiritualist. She is a brilliant woman and can convince many with her pleasant conversation on the beautiful cause we all love so well. Brother Lindahl has one of the sweetest little girls, and the expression she makes to her father when asking for a penny for the orthodox Sunday-school, is proof enough of her tact. He says, "What do you want with that money?" "Oh," she says, "it's to help keep the devil going." Then she gets her money.

LETTER FROM LOWER EGYPT.

For some time I have thought of telling the readers of the best and most widely-read Spiritualist paper published, something about what this little society of Spiritualists and Freethinkers down here in lower Egypt have been doing for the cause.

Through the help of the good workers from abroad who happened to find us down here, our good cause has fully held its own. First, C. E. Barnes came and spent the month of March, 1903, with us, and through the splendid manifestations through the trumpet, he created quite a lively interest. Then later in the season C. E. Winans came and stopped with us a couple of weeks. He kept the interest growing until October, when that old war-horse, G. H. Brooks, in the front ranks of the workers in our good cause, came and labored with us one month.

The meetings were well attended, and through his grand work as a speaker and test medium, there was quite a revival here, and ten new members joined our ranks by giving good Bro. Brooks the right hand of fellowship, thereby proclaiming fearlessly to the world their belief and knowledge of the truth of Spiritualism. We hope to have the brother with us again next October and November.

Thirty or more years ago, when a few families here began the investigation of Spiritualism, we were ostracised and foully slandered by our orthodox friends; now we are considered to be about as respectable as anybody else, and they seem to like to converse upon the subject—on the quiet.

As a family we have been enjoying the blessings of holding seances for more than thirty years, and never once even thought that we were guilty of committing any "Great Psychological Crime," nor have we been troubled in the least by any visions or evil influences. All of the communications from the friends have always been highly beneficial to us, intellectually, morally or otherwise, nor has our intercourse with the spirit friends been harmful in any way to the medium, but has been a great help to her in every way. While I do not take sides with the author of the book, yet I think our cause HAS BEEN BENEFITED BY ITS PUBLICATION, for I don't see how in any other way Spiritualism could have been so ably discussed by so many of our foremost thinkers and writers. I don't think our cause ever before received so much free advertising. It seems it takes something of that kind to stir up the fighting element of our old warriors. Spiritualism has come to stay, and all the books published against it will only put us the more upon our guard, and show to the world what we really are, and that we are willing to stand by our guns at any and all times.

Catarrh Cured

If you Suffer from Catarrh in any form, Asthma, Bronchitis, or any Lung Weakness read this liberal offer. IT WILL BE WORTH MONEY TO YOU

THIS TREATMENT FREE.

Dr. J. M. Peebles, the noted specialist in Catarrh and Bronchial troubles has found a SURE, Speedy, and Permanent Cure for Catarrh. It not only quickly relieves and permanently cures Catarrh but gives almost instant relief in Asthma, Bronchitis, and all Throat and Lung Troubles. It completely removes the disease from the system and makes the diseased tissues like new. Mrs. Wasserding, of Seattle, Wash., writes—"I suffered from that dreadful disease catarrh, for twenty years, and found nothing that would help it until I began your treatment. I improved from the first and in a short time was entirely cured. You have rendered me a great blessing, and I recommend your treatment most highly to those having catarrh." We could give you testimonials by the thousand of those we have cured of Catarrh and Bronchial troubles in all forms and stages but they would not tell you what the treatment will do for You. The only absolute proof is in the treatment itself and believing that it will Positively Cure any case of Catarrh no matter how long standing or how many treatments have failed in the past, that we will send a full two weeks' treatment with Dr. Peebles Medicated Air Inhaler to any sufferer wishing to try it. Many are cured by this first treatment alone. Why not make a trial of it yourself and learn what it will do for you? IT IS FREE. Address Dr. Peebles Institute of Health, 23 Madison St. Battle Creek, Mich.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Francis A. Hayne passed to spirit life, at Albany, Oregon, Feb. 3, 1904, aged nearly 84 years. He was a member of the Spiritual Association of New Era, Oregon. At his request he was cremated. MRS. BELLE SCHRINER.

Passed to spirit life, from the home of her daughter, Mrs. Emma Worth, 516 West Madison street, Chicago, Mrs. Bassford, at the age of 82. A life-long Spiritualist, ever doing what she could for the cause of truth.

Mrs. W. H. Bledsoe, who has been a subscriber to The Progressive Thinker, and an ardent Spiritualist for 25 years, passed to spirit life at her home in Clinton, Mo., Feb. 10, of lung trouble. She had been a great sufferer many years, but was a kind and loving wife and mother and her place is vacant forever. She was a Progressive Spiritualist, deeply interested and ever investigating. She has now proven to her own soul those beautiful truths of the soul's immortality.

A DAUGHTER.

Mrs. Phebe J. Pierce passed to spirit life from her home in Grand Rapids, Mich., Feb. 11, 1904, after a brief illness. Funeral services were conducted by Mrs. Cora Morrell, who, three weeks before had held the same service for her daughter. Only the truth of Spiritualism gives comfort at such times. A husband and two daughters are left in earth life.

MRS. MARY ROBERTS.

A Human Life Line.

If all the people who have been cured by Vernal Palmettona (formerly known as Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine) were lined up in single file, two feet apart, the line beginning at Buffalo, would extend for miles and miles, far out toward the west. In this line would be found men, women and children, representing every vocation in life. Most of them were in bad shape physically when they began to take Vernal Palmettona. Some of them owe their very lives to it. If you were to talk to them, they would give full credit to this great laxative remedy. Some of them went way on up into middle life, some of them even to old age, before they began taking our cure.

"If I had only taken Vernal Palmettona sooner," is the regret of many who realize that they might have been saved years of suffering. Do not let this be your experience. Indigestion, constipation, dyspepsia and all other diseases of the stomach, liver, kidneys and bowels are relieved quickly and eventually cured permanently by Vernal Palmettona. Only one dose a day does the work. It is done gently, yet thoroughly. This is in direct contrast to harsh purgatives and cathartics which are positively harmful. Many people are skeptical about a medicine with which they are unfamiliar. Maybe you are one of them. We don't blame you. It is common sense. We plainly print the guaranteed formula on every package of our remedy. Better still, we will send you postpaid a free sample. Try before you buy. Address, Vernal Remedy Co., 452 Seneca Building, Buffalo, N. Y. Sold at all druggists.

Can Telepathy Explain?

Results of Psychical Research.

By Minot J. Savage.

Dr. Savage in this book of 243 pages, discusses problems that have vexed intelligent minds probably to a greater extent than any others, saving those of the religious life. He states a great number of well-authenticated instances of spiritist revelation or communication. His discussion is frank and fearless, and merits the widest reading, for he deals with facts and experiences. Price, cloth, $1.00.

New Testament Stories COMICALLY ILLUSTRATED.

Drawings by Watson Heston, with critical and humorous comments upon the texts. Heston's drawings are incomparable, and excruciatingly funny. One must see the book to appreciate it; the pictorial satire cannot be told. It will make you laugh heartily. Price in board, $1.00; cloth, $1.50.

Spiritual Effort.

Thoughts on the Work and Value of the Seance.

There are seances and seances, this to which my article refers, is the Spiritual seance—wherever it may be held—or spirituelle interview and work, which one or more human beings on the mortal side, may hold and do, with human beings on the spirit side of life, which lies "beyond the veil." Circles for spirit communications—by mental or physical phenomena, which produce more or less evidence of the reality of their claims, and of the identity of the decarnated beings who profess to make themselves known—have been held in this country, and in foreign lands, not only among the humble classes, but in realms of nobility also—for more than fifty years. Many of these seances have given grand instructions, and brought unmistakable consolation to thousands of unenlightened minds and bereaved hearts, until the whole world is grander in its philosophy, sweeter in its brotherhood, brighter in its hopes and faiths, more liberal in its views, and far more progressed in its knowledge of man himself, than it could have been without these important seances, and their conscientious and worthy oracles, or mediums, of public and private life.

The pathway of liberal thought, has been hewn largely, by the unseen workers from Out There, in the realms of spirit, in conjunction with mortal media, who have been true to their calling, and to the trust imposed upon them by the wisdom of Infinite Good; and it is no wild statement to say, that the advent of such cults as "Mental Science," "New Thought" and "Hermetic Brotherhood," has been made possible and acceptable, because Spiritualism and its medii opened the way and met the brunt of the battle with bigotry and superstition more than half a century ago.

But the seance of which this article has to tell, is not the usual circle for spirit manifestation, most commonly known to the world. It is one, that may well interest the thinker and investigator who is deeply concerned with the consideration of occult forces, within himself, and at large amid the domains of spiritual intelligence and power. It is the seance, however, of the earnest, faithful psychics, with, or without the aid and presence of magnetic, sympathizing and honest friends, who are aware of the work at hand, and who send out the vibratory forces of their soul sympathy and good will, the genial pulsations of harmony and love, to uplift and bless fellow-creatures, incarnate or excarnate, who are in need of spiritual help. That such seances are held all over this land, in private homes—but seldom in public, if ever—the writer is aware.

Having been for many years engaged in the works of Spiritualism—fourteen years as medium for the Banner of Light, other years as psychic for other journals; called to labor constantly with pen, or upon the platform and in private ways innumerable, always under the guidance and with the blessing of unseen but beloved intelligences, who gave the reason for the calls they made upon her; she is assured of the verity of the statement that the seances now referred to, are held, have been for many years—on the part of sensitives, without collusion or premeditation, and that the testimony from hundreds of these schools or sittings, of their value and importance to minds on both sides of life, is overwhelming.

We are learning that thought is power, that it is potent with energy and that it can be scientifically demonstrated as having objective qualities. Our friends, of the new schools of teaching, tell us that thought produces illness, or creates health, according to its direction; that it carries with it the power to harm or to bless its object; that the time is not far distant when thought will be registered, and measured. Spiritualism has taught these affirmations through many years. Therefore, it is not difficult to believe, that if one individual, who is highly sensitive, one whom we may call a "medium," sits in the "silence," with mind attuned to harmony with the benevolent souls of a higher life who can reach him, and draw from his magnetic aura certain elements, combining them with their own more ethereal forces, there may go forth from that magnetic and spiritual centre, a power for good to feeble, ignorant, or despondent beings, on either side of the grave, that will bear its silent message of hope and peace, its power of healing, its spiritual illumination and its mental instruction or stimulation, direct to its mark, whether the beings that are benefited realize the source of their relief or not. Such seances have been held and grand results have been known to follow, nor does it matter whether the sitters in such a gathering—or the sensitive who sits alone—know anything of spirit mediumship or not.

For three consecutive years—while in California—Prof. Longley and myself, with three friends, sat weekly in our own home, with a young man who possesses psychic powers, having the influence of spirit helpers at times, who at these seances, passed into a semi-trance, very deep on most occasions, and through his instrumentality, we learned of the good work we could do for mortals and spirits—we are all spirits, but I use the two terms for convenience—by concentrating our thought and desire upon the instruction and spiritual healing of the many who were brought to us from the lower spheres of spirit life, by the advanced teachers who instructed us in the work, through the medial organisms of the sensitives mentioned, and the writer.

During the time of our sittings, perhaps five thousand decarnated beings were stimulated to new effort to rise above the conditions that weighed them down to the earthy state—after having left the earth form—and to break the chains that held them in darkness, for after they had received the light and strength from the combined forces of the helpful mortals and ministering spirits, they could face themselves in spirit, see their true condition, its cause and cure, and become set upon a road of progress and self elevation. Mortals, too, were benefited, as was attested by the words we received from various quarters showing how aid had been received at certain hours from the invisible realm—which accorded with the work and purpose of our seance at such hours. We were told by our teachers, however, that we were by no means the only ones who sat for such work, that many centres of magnetic power had been and would be established over the earth, for such work, and this has been repeatedly proven to our satisfaction. Most radiant descriptions of the appearance of such magnetic centres have been given us, choicest language and descriptive powers have been used in detailing some of the scenes of immortal life, and the conditions of human beings, before and after their spiritual awakening. If we can know anything of the inner life and powers of humanity, we know that these important works go on, and that beings of two worlds—or of many worlds, commingle in a grand uplifting work for humanity, that has much to do with the progress of the race.

A man of keen brain, indomitable energies, successful business enterprise and philanthropic nature in the city of Washington, has had a most wide and valuable experience for many years, with the unseen in helping to raise beings who had been so sunk in the filth and degradation of their own creating on earth, that they could not see any spiritual illumination through the darkness of their own self-made auras. His magnetism, with his generous willingness to help the unfortunate and imprisoned, has brought relief to many a suffering soul. That there are literally "spirits in prison" is taught and shown, by the teachings and experiences of thousands of sensitives on earth; unseen by the physical eye, these sentient, conscious beings, dwell in the darkness of their own thought and vibratory creation, and are enslaved in the bonds of ignorance and of conditions that their willing selfishness and sin of former days have forged. A paper upon the philosophical and scientific solution of such bondage may be given at a future time, for it can be reasonably explained, and scientifically shown how impossible it is for the degenerates of humanity to build a spiritual body that is ethereal enough to escape from an earth-bound state, until in other spheres they grow to broader concepts and desires of and for higher things.

Spiritualism in its teachings and demonstrations includes the essence of such theories as of the power of mind over matter, of working out the "Karma," and other thoughts advanced today by the several schools of metaphysics and of the New Thought; and by bringing the thoughtful student into direct line with the incarnate and excarnate beings of life who have experienced psychic and occult relations with the unseen forces and intelligences of the universe, it opens up to him a vast realm of the information and revelation such as humanity has little dreamed of in the past. Therefore, the Psychical Research Society has much before it in its investigations; it has entered the vestibule of the Temple of Knowledge, and peered beyond the veil of so-called "Mystery," its further steps must be behind the veil, and its work be to show that "Mystery" is but another name for "Ignorance," and as it becomes enlightened upon the inner forces, possibilities, powers and life of humanity, on either plane of existence, it will be able to show mankind the true inwardness of the life spiritual, both here and "just beyond."

Returning to the theme of this article, it is timely to state that the sittings or seances intended for the special benefit of spirits in darkness, can never be held by frivolous, curious persons; that the spirit of willingness and of aspiration—the desire to bless some human soul—must be uppermost; personal ends must be set aside, and a wave of kindly thought and blessing towards any or all in woe, must flow forth from the sitter's hearts. In such cases the invisible or spiritual presences from higher spheres, uniting with the mortals, magnetize the apartment, filling it with a spirituelle aura; undeveloped, darkened spirits are brought to the place, under the hypnotic influence of the spirit workers, and bathed in this aura, which helps to clear their darkened vision, and to eliminate from their spirit bodies some part of the earthy elements which they contain. This sets them upon the right track for their elevation—which, however, must be self-earned—and aids them to profit by the teachings of spirit missionaries, which they will then be ready to receive. But this paper has grown sufficiently for one reading, how this work is wrought may be given later on, for it is a study that inquiring minds may do well to follow; the intricate blending of the psychical and the physical laws of life; the relations of mortal to spirit, the influence we may unconsciously exert upon others, in and out of the flesh, and the working out of the soul's salvation, are subjects that may command the attention of all but the materialist who has no faith in continuity of life, and even he may be led to reason upon the things that may after all exist beyond his mortal ken.

From the Spirit Realms.

Spirit Carlyle Petersilea.

While on Earth Mr. Petersilea was a medium for the transmission of important letters from those long in spirit life. Now, having become a freed spirit himself, he will convey his best thoughts through the mediumship of his devoted wife, and we are sure they will prove interesting to our readers.

LETTER NUMBER FOUR.

"Come, dear son," continued my father; "your mother, you and myself will sit here at this little table and partake of these luscious grapes while we talk."

He plucked some grapes that were growing at one end of the arbor; and we seated ourselves at a little table in the center of the arbor.

"Now," said he, "we will talk about that which interests you most."

"Well," I replied; "you know that music interests me more than anything else except my wife. Eternity, my wife, and music, are the three great themes that are of the most importance to me. If you please, father, we will talk of eternity."

"First, what would you know of eternity?" he asked.

"Whatever you may be pleased to tell me," I replied.

"Eternity is made up of time," he said.

"Yes; so it must be."

"And time extends throughout eternity."

"Yes; of course; but I never thought of it in just that light before."

"And time is weighed and measured," he went on.

"Weighed and measured, my dear father? How can that be?"

Does it seem so very strange to you?" he asked.

"I do not comprehend it," I replied.

"You are yet but a babe in wisdom," said my mother, with a sweet smile.

"Have I not measured the time between now and the time when it will be evening on the earth? and do I not know how many hours it will be until then?"

"Oh, yes; that is easily done."

"Then time can be measured, can it not?"

"Certainly," I answered; but how do you weigh it?"

"Anything that can be measured can be weighed," he replied. "It is the earth which is measuring and weighing her own time. She is measuring and weighing her share in eternity's time, and, as a whole, she weighs a good deal. She is a pretty heavy old earth, is she not? Now, I know, to an ounce, exactly what she weighs."

Well, I stared, but I am sure I could not contradict him.

"Then eternity is made up of time, and time is weighed and measured by the celestial bodies as they revolve forever throughout eternity. Now, you wanted to talk of eternity; but it is really that which exists throughout eternity that you want to know about. for time and eternity are made up of details, and filled with objects, and as time and eternity have neither beginning nor end, the objects, and details that go to make them up can have neither beginning nor end."

"But, father," I said, "my material body had a beginning and now it has come to an end."

"Indeed!" said my father. "How do you know that?"

I told my wife to be sure and have my body cremated, if I should die first; and I know that she will regard my wishes."

"She certainly will," affirmed he.

"Well, then, my body had a beginning and now it will be burned up and destroyed."

"Well, you don't need it any langer, do you?" he asked. "You seem to be getting along very nicely without it. It was a pretty heavy old body to carry around, don't you think so? Were you very much in love with it?"

"It has done me good service for many years," I replied. "I cannot quite ignore that which has served me so well. I must admit that I have some love left for that old form."

"Well, after it is burned up, what then?"

I admit that I felt somewhat dismayed.

"Your material form, or covering, will be disintegrated to be sure, but what of yourself, your real form? Have you a form, or have you not? There is a mirror, over there; go and look into it." My curiosity was greatly excited, and I arose and looked into a mirror that seemed to be there. I have learned since that it was simply the ether which mirrored, or reflected my form, but I did not understand it all at the time. Friends, and readers of The Progressive Thinker, the form that was mirrored there was that of Carlyle Petersilea, and none other; just as I looked before I left the material body, at the time when I was in reasonably good health.

"Well, what about your form?" asked my father. It is all there, is it not? Your form still exists, and is one of the details in eternity. This is your form and not the other. That which cannot be carried throughout eternity does not belong to you. That form, lying stark and cold, does not belong to you; it never did. You simply borrowed it for a short time, or the particles that composed it you borrowed from time to time, as you had need of them, to form a mold or covering for your real form, which is indestructible."

"But how can I know, my father, that this present form is indestructible?"

"I did not say that your present form might not be subject to change, but that it could not be destroyed. The form of a mold can be destroyed but not the form that molded it."

"Have I, then, had this same form throughout time and eternity? Did I exist previous to birth, as I now exist after death?"

"You certainly existed previous to birth, as you now exist after death, or that which is called death. Time and eternity create nothing. All things coexist with time and eternity."

"And was my form the same as now?"

"Yes, in miniature. The acorn holds the oak in miniature, but the acorn does not hold the parent oak, but another distinct one, and that other existed, in miniature, as an ethereal germ within the ether, before it was attracted to the flowering oak; so you existed in miniature, as a germ within the ether, until attracted and born into the material."

"Yes, father, you have written this before, many times; and I will write it many times again, until the world shall understand it."

"Do you see that grand old oak out there?" he asked, as he pointed toward a beautiful tree.

"Yes, and it is the grandest and most beautiful one I ever saw."

"That tree has developed, grown old, and died, as they say on earth, just as you have; but it still retains its spiritual form, just as you do yours; it is as immortal as you are. Look at these grapes, these vines, these flowers; their forms are all immortal, just as yours is; they are some of the details that infill time and eternity; they help to mark and measure the time."

"One question more, my father, and then I must return to my poor wife. I feel guilty for having left her so long. She is breaking her heart, while I am enjoying myself and drinking in wisdom: Is reincarnation true?"

"It is utterly false," he replied. "Can that grandly developed oak go back into an acorn again? Can you become a little invisible germ once more—a germ that has never yet developed consciousness—you who are so far on toward the understanding of time and eternity? No one can arrive at truth without starting right. That is why theology is all wrong. It starts wrong and ends falsely. Reincarnationists start wrong and end wrong; they start out with a full grown soul, to commence with, and then they give it the form of a baby over and over again; but how a full-grown soul can make, to cover itself, a mold in the form of a baby, passes comprehension; and how any immortal mind, that has once developed into wisdom, can become perfectly idiotic again and again, is a nut that cannot be cracked. The idea itself is idiotic and childish. No man or woman who has once become developed in wisdom, can for one moment accept such folly. How would you like to be born into the earth life again?"

"I would much prefer annihilation," I answered.

"And suppose," continued my father, "that you had a daughter. How would you like to be born again through your own daughter? What relation would you be to your wife? That would make of you your own wife's grandchild. How would you like to be the grandchild of your own wife?"

My mother's laugh rang out musically and clear, and I laughed as well.

"Or suppose I should go and reincarnate through some Hottentot or Feejee islander, or Esquimau and enjoy the supreme delight of squatting on the ground, dressed up in dried skins of bear or fish, and subsisting on succulent blubber; or I might take a notion to go and reincarnate through some queen, that I might reign as a king; or, better still, fix myself so that I might become the Pope of Rome; or how would you like me to go into the interior of Africa, and be a thick-lipped, woolly-headed savage; or, perhaps, to India, and progress so rapidly as to become a whirling Dervish? I might become a splendid Topsy, or equal with Jack the Ripper. Oh, there is no end to that which I might be; but enough; it is too absurd to even think about. You have never accepted such ideas, my dear Carlyle, and I am very glad. There are errors enough already existing on the earth, and we hope to give light and truth and not error."

"To know and understand truth is all I ask, and to be able to give it through my dear wife to those who now dwell on the earth that I have recently left. No, I have not left it; simply laid aside my material form; but I want to say a few words to Brother Peebles.

My Dear Brother: Combat this monstrous error with all your might. You are surrounded by a glorious host. My dear brother, I am now where you know I can have no selfish interest; all I want is the truth, and the truth is what you are battling for; and when you stand up, almost alone, as it were, and strike out right and left against reincarnation, you have got the grandest and brightest angels on your side. One writer, who takes you to task, says, that the soul takes possession of foetal life at conception. Now, you, as a physician, know better than that; and all well-read physicians know better; that the life, which is the soul, exists within the germ previous to its entering the egg; that the mother has nothing at all to do with creating the life principle; she merely sustains and cherishes a life, or soul, while it is developing enough to enter the outer world; that life which is the soul, or the germ of a soul, lived and existed within the blood of the male parent, and the male parent breathed it in from the ethereal atmosphere. All germs, of all life whatever, exist within the ether, and every germ is its own individual self, and never any other but itself. After development and growth, also after birth, it can no more go back and become a germ again than a chick can go back into its shell. Nothing goes backward. All things go forward; and, thus, reincarnation is an utter impossibility. Life, or soul, ever goes forward, upward, and onward. Life covers itself with matter until it becomes strong enough to throw it off, or until as is often the case, it is obliged to throw it off by disease or accident.

Now, Dr. Peebles, you have truth on your side, as I now know positively, and as I believed, and was taught by the angels, previous to my entering the spiritual state. I was determined before entering this life, that whenever I did enter it, I would return and make myself felt, and battle for truth.

Pity that so many Americans have retrograded into that old Hindu superstition.

But to return to the spiritual arbor and my father and mother: Said my father: "Everything in nature starts from a living germ."

"Father," I said, "Mr. Hudson Tuttle has been against me. Oh, how I wish I could make him see the truth."

Said my father: "We will ask Mr. Tuttle: What is life? Can one see life? One can see a material form wherein life resides, but can one see the life? The living principle of all things whatsoever is the soul or life of that which lives, and when the soul, or living principle departs, then is that form called dead; but does that which covered life, or soul, beget life? No; that which covers life does not beget life, consequently, in one sense, evolution is a myth. All nature bears upon its face the great truth that all life must be first involved before it can be evolved, and that evolution is simply development and growth of that which is first involved. Nothing is evoluted from matter. Matter is but the clothing of life or soul, and that life or soul must first be involuted into matter before it can be evoluted from it."

Now, why be ashamed to accept these great truths? I am in the spirit world. No one can be jealous of me. I have neither name nor fame to gain now, and my poor old wife, sitting in her solitude, almost helpless, wants neither name nor fame; she simply desires to do that which I wish her to do—write for me—and I simply want to work for truth.

"Now," continued my father, "it will yet be proved beyond the shadow of doubt, that that which I now tell you is the simple truth. Ancient cities will yet be excavated, dating back thousands of years beyond any that have yet been unearthed, and inscriptions will be found upon the ruins, and representations of animals, that will forever settle the question; horses, cats, dogs, cows, bears, lions, tigers, and so on, will be found to be the same as to-day, also the people who dwelt within those ancient cities were enlightened and civilized; and high art and the sciences, were not unknown to them. Buildings and architectural designs were far beyond any of the kind at the present day and that the earth has always had its savages, dwelling in caves and mud huts, also wigwams. Even where these ancient cities once were has since been the bed of the ocean.

"Different nations do not amalgamate readily, and one has but to think back a little to know that this is true. It was once thought that the Indian and the white man, or European, would at length amalgamate; but all are aware that they have not—quite the contrary. The Indian has almost disappeared and will be entirely gone before many years go by. It was thought that the blacks and whites would amalgamate; but they have not to any extent, and will not; but the blacks will yet all emigrate to their native country—Africa—and Egypt. And that is where they should go. It is now thought by some, that the Chinese and Japanese will amalgamate with the white races. But they will not. No matter how great the opportunity which they may have, they will not amalgamate to any great extent. The germs of different nations, and individuals, exist just as they are to be, in the ether; so do the germs of all animals, birds, and fowls; so does all vegetation, trees, shrubs, and flowers."

Well, my father had written all this before; but I was extremely glad to find that it was true, and but very few mistakes had been made in the writing.

"I think, my dear Carlyle," continued my father, "that this is all you can bear at present; and we will return now to the house of mourning. Pity it is that there should be mourning, and if the world had been rightly taught, there would not be. The time will come when it will be considered degrading to mourn for the so-called dead. Only the unprogressed, the stupid and the ignorant will do this. If your grief-struck wife could realize that you are, at this moment, sitting here with your beautiful mother, and the father that you loved and revered, and who has always loved and cared for you, and who loves you now more than ever—as does your mother—if she could realize that you are now sitting thus in ease, comfort, and happiness—that is to say, you would be happy but for her sorrow—now, knowing yourself to be immortal, and knowing that your joy and happiness will be forever on the increase—if she could realize all this, she would not grieve as she does. Help me and others, my dear Carlyle, to spread these great truths as rapidly as possible."

"Yes, father," I said, "I am determined to help you all that I can; but I promised my dear wife, that if I went first, I would come back through no other but herself."

"A bad promise is better broken than kept," said my father; "and you will soon discover that your promise was a bad one."

"I also promised her that I would never, never leave her."

"Another bad promise—better broken than kept—in fact, I took you directly away from her at first, and you are not with her now."

"But I want to be," I replied. "She will expect me to keep my promises, as I never yet broke my word to her."

"You shall keep them as well as is possible," answered my father. "Your mother does not care to return with us. There comes a time in the life of a soul when it cannot sympathize with grief and sorrow—there comes a time when these feelings are too degrading and actually demoralizing for a soul to return and enter into, or put itself en rapport with."

My mother now wound her heavenly arms around about me and kissed me a great many times; then she laid her beautiful angelic hand upon my head.

"Your head is still hot," she said, gently. "The feelings of earth will yet cling to you for a long period of time; but we will try to bring all things right with you, and your dear wife, as soon as possible."

Her hands brought a cool, delightful sensation to my brain, which had been hot and troubled for a number of months; my mind began to clear, and my thoughts to arrange themselves in order. My mind had not been clear, and my thoughts had been in a jumble, for a good while. Oh, how glad I was that my mind was clearing, and my thoughts becoming clear and positive once more.

"There are spirits whom we never allow to return for a great length of time," said my father; "weak ones, who have implicitly believed in all the church dogmas. If they were allowed to return at once, the wild grief and mourning of their immediate friends would so react upon the departed ones, that they would become half-crazed and despairing, and would not rise out of it for months and even years. But your mind is better fitted to return, and you may be able to do much good!"

"I hope so, my father; and I thank you for all that you have done for me in the past, and are doing for me in the present."

My mother now blessed me and departed, and my father and I returned to the house of mourning.

An Appeal to Materializing Mediums.

To the materializing mediums of this country; one and all, I make an earnest appeal that you come forward—if you are genuine and honest—and let it be known to the world at large—not for the one thousand dollars offered by Mr. Hale, but for the support and good of the cause and the convincing proof to the skeptical.

I have been investigating the phenomena as well as the philosophy of Spiritualism for several years, and am fully convinced that the spirits of the so-called dead do return and hold communion with their friends on the earth plane. As to spirit materialization I have never had convincing proof. I have for several months past been one of a circle that has met every week for the purpose of materializing spirit forms, but thus far we have not been successful. True, there have been some things developed in our midst that could not be accounted for other than by spirit influence. At the seance the room is perfectly dark, and no ray of light from the outside can penetrate, but still on nearly every occasion the place has been illuminated through some unseen source, and shadowy, vapory clouds are seen floating about; but thus far we have never been able to discern any form.

Mr. C. W. Stewart, whose article I was reading in The Progressive Thinker, speaks of a medium whom he considered the best now living, but who holds her gifts so sacred that she objects to using them for money. I respect her for this, but don't let her hide her light under a bushel; she should come forward and show to Mr. Hale and also to the many other doubting ones, that there is really such a thing as a materialized spirit form. Her conditions as told by Mr. Stewart, are very simple, and I am sure Mr. Hale could make no objection to them; and as to the one thousand dollars, she could refuse to accept only so much as would pay her actual expenses, or what would be far better, give it to some institution or society to be used for the benefit of the poor whom we have always with us.

In the name of the cause of Spiritualism, if there is such a thing as genuine materialization, let some one come forward and show it. It is a challenge to materializing mediums, and your failure to respond will seem very much like an admission that there is no such phenomena as genuine materializations, which I with many others do not like to believe. MRS. LAURA G. FIXEN.

She Meets With Hearty Welcome in Australia.

It was a great day for Spiritualism in Australia when this brilliant speaker decided to visit our great continent. Mrs. Fixen, with her secretary, Miss Stegman, landed in Sydney from the Steamer "Ventura" on January 1, 1904.

A warm welcome by Spiritualists awaited her, and at Leigh House the following Sunday night, Jan. 3, under the auspices of the Psychic Society of New South Wales, an immense audience listened with rapt attention to her first lecture in the southern hemisphere.

Urgent telegrams from Melbourne inviting Mrs. Fixen to appear at the Bijou Theatre on Jan. 10 and 17, instead of for one night only, decided her to at once proceed to that important city, at present the seat of government of the Commonwealth of Australia.

Mrs. Fixen's lecture on "Spiritualism, Science and Reason" had been widely advertised, but it was scarcely expected that for more than an hour of the advertised time for the lecture a great crowd would have assembled, eager to enter the building.

By the time the lecturer appeared on the platform there was not a vacant seat in that vast auditorium, 2,000 being present. All creeds were represented, and the lecture which told of her intimate knowledge and working with orthodox churches before her eyes were opened to the fact that the great Spiritual Universe was entirely suited to fix the attention of mixed beliefs.

For the first time for many years, as Spiritualism has been a tabooed subject in Melbourne, the daily press devoted columns of space to interviews with Mrs. Fixen, Mr. T. W. Stanford, a leading Spiritualist, brother of the late Leland Stanford, founder of the Stanford University, and other authorities on both sides. All this excitement induced Mrs. Fixen to select as a subject for her second lecture, "Why I Am a Spiritualist," with the result that the crowd was earlier than ever at the doors, and she was greeted with ringing cheers as she faced another enormous and expectant audience.

Much as her first lecture was appreciated the second proved a veritable masterpiece. Mr. Stanford and party occupied a private box, as well as the manager of the theatre, who appeared to have caught the prevalent enthusiasm.

At the close of the address a great demonstration took place, and at the request of Mrs. Chas. Bright, who sat on the platform, and voiced the thanks of the great audience, a gentleman called for three cheers for Mrs. Fixen, and she was surrounded on all sides with thanks and congratulations.

In honor of her country the platform was decorated with American as well as the Australian flag, the Consul-General of the United States, Mr. G. P. Bray, supplying the American flag for the purpose.

Special hymns printed for the occasion were sung by a choir of sixty voices with orchestra, and some fine solos were rendered. The gathering was the most successful the Melbourne Spiritualists have attracted. It has inspired the workers with fresh enthusiasm, and over a thousand orthodox people never reached before are beginning to investigate this new philosophy, and Mrs. Fixen's visit will cause a great accession to the Victorian Association of Spiritualists.

The effect of her visit will be felt throughout Australia, and she leaves hosts of friends behind, earnestly desiring her speedy return to their midst.

THE POWER OF THE BALLOT.

It has always been claimed by the opponents of woman suffrage that women could secure all the rights they desired or needed through their influence, without the aid of the ballot.

That these rights could be secured with one quarter the outlay of time, money and effort, if backed by the ballot, is clearly shown by the ease with which they are secured where women have full suffrage.

Mrs. Watson Lister, of Melbourne, Australia, who is visiting in this country, is most enthusiastic over the results of woman suffrage in her country. She says that Parliament now consults them on all bills bearing upon the interests of women. The author of the new divorce bill asked all the women's organizations to come together and hear him read it, and to make criticisms and suggestions. Such a thing was never thought of before women had the ballot, although they were affected by such measures then, the same as now.

When a naturalization bill was pending, one clause of which deprived Australian women of citizenship if they married aliens, a few women went to the Prime Minister and protested, and that clause was altered immediately.

"When we held meetings," said Mrs. Lister, "to advocate public measures that women wanted, we used to have to go out into the highways and hedges and compel the members of Parliament to come in; now the difficulty is to keep them out. The chivalry which they used to tell us would be destroyed should women enter the political field, has on the contrary been greatly increased. On the platform at one of our meetings, the secretary happened to drop her pencil, and I saw the premier and several members of Parliament scrambling to pick it up. A woman is never allowed to stand in a street car in Australia.

THE GOLD OF LIFE.

Pure Love the Central Point of Inspiration and Guidance.

To the Editor:—I herewith take pleasure in forwarding to you a communication from the eminent medium, Mr. Frank M. Snarrenberger, who is now touring Europe. His many friends in America will be pleased to see the enclosed manuscript in print in your valuable paper, and I hope you will find his ideas worthy of publication, for it seems to me that he has treated the subject in a way that will be of great benefit to many. A DE VERE CALDWELL.

The Gold of Life.

Recently an account of a find of gold was recorded in the newspapers as follows: "The particles of ore were held together by pure grains of gold, which seemed to bind the coarser metals together."

When we apply this simile to life, we find that the events, the duties, of our daily existence are without lustre and value unless bound together by the bright influence of love.

What does all the struggle of life mean to us if we have no central point of inspiration and guidance? If our efforts have no object, we go through life strangers in a strange land; but how different life and its duties seem to us when we have a companion whom we can surround with the comforts, the pleasures, the protection of home in all that the word implies!

That subtle something which we have named love is truly the pure gold of life, binding our hopes, our purest aspirations, our best thoughts into one logical and valuable existence on this earthly plane of endeavor, for

"Life is short, but Love is long;
Death is swift, but Love is strong;
Time is nothing, Love is all."

He who has lived a consistent life of love while in the physical phase of experience here on earth may expect a continuance of happiness throughout the ages of the future spiritual life, for a soul unsoiled by lust is one of the first requisites of happy contentment in that land from which many a traveler returns. Shakspeare says:

"Demetrius * * *
Made love to Nedar's daughter, Helena,
And won her soul."

The mistake made by many persons of this age lies in the fact that they endeavor to win only the body, ignoring the soul's demand for recognition, thereby laying the foundation for a den of vice which they would have us believe is a veritable temple of love. This mistake—or, rather, crime against humanity and a race yet unborn—is sanctioned by the pulpit, the law, the press, and it is licensed as other crimes are licensed. Its fruits are seen in the asylums, the sanitariums, the health resorts, the jails and the penitentiaries of the land, but the evil continues.

Why?

Because a corrupt and pernicious religion, a mercenary government, an ignorant and cowardly press, and the lustful selfishness of men and women permit it.

The remedy?

Knowledge and unselfishness.

Marriage without spiritual love is merely a thin cloak for the mother of all vice—Lust.

One authoress of this truly "woman's century" has said: "I know the very difference that lies 'twixt hallow'd love and base and unholy lust; I know the one is as a golden spur, urging the spirit to all noble aims; the other but a foul and miry pit o'erthrowing it in the midst of its career."

Then we have, as an honored member of the poetical fraternity, a man who advises his brothers to—

"Look over the dwelling you live in—the flesh
Which holds the mysterious you in its mesh.
Pass into the temple! The place is divine,
But what are you offering there at the shrine?"

Love, that tie that reaches out like a fine, invisible thread, unites the individual with a sanctuary of the soul that needs not the sanction of man-made laws to maintain; for if love be rightly understood, it means the highest and purest of relationships. The confusion of love with lust has ever resulted fatally to mankind, for love is essentially a spiritual tie—a union of souls—and love and lust are as far apart as light and darkness, as the skies above and the earth beneath.

All that is pure and unselfish is a part of love, while all that is base and destroying belongs to lust. The appearance of our outer casements, which we call bodies, have no bearing upon love, but the condition of the soul has everything to do with the growth of love in our lives. The spiritual part—the soul—instinctively seeks companionship with another soul, in affinity with it, so that unselfishness may be as a fruitful tree in the orchard of experience. Love that has for its motive other than unselfish spirit companionship becomes something far less than that high union of twin souls—a love-blessed life—for it is but temporary, while true love is eternal.

True, there are those who reject the fact that marriage without love is simply legalized, domesticated lust, producing the monstrosities which we so frequently see, and with which our reformatory institutions are filled; but examine the objectors critically, and you will find them to be living proofs of loveless marriages—lacking in both morality and intellectuality. You will find that they belong to the class of persons who revile intemperance and inebriates, but who wreck their nerves with tea and coffee—coffee-drunkards and tea-topers. Or, if they are of the masculine gender, you will find upon investigation that they chew tobacco while reading a chapter of the family Bible relating to Moses' advice to the unclean; that their skin is covered with copper-colored blotches, indicating crimes committed against the body that rendered the blood impure; that they have family prayers—especially when a guest is present—and thereafter immediately stuff themselves with indigestible viands to an extent that renders them lower, intellectually, than the rest of the hogs, the flesh of which they love so well.

In themselves they are ample proof of the truthful assertion that, under the protection of the state and that execrescence upon the body of civilization—the church—evil of the worst form has its birth in the criminally selfish union which has been dignified by the name marriage, but which is really a license for lust.

A careful study of the various grades of present-day society will convince the thinker who has the good of mankind at heart that love is distinctly a part of the higher life—spiritual, both in part and in entirety. The companion that the body desires is often far below the standard that the soul demands, but the average individual describes the resultant condition as "happiness." Not so the student of the higher life, to such a person the mental and spiritual demands for equality, if not for superiority, are supreme and imperative, to the exclusion of other lesser considerations—such as beauty of form and feature. To such a one there are no greater pleasures than those of the spirit, and the thought of the man who said, "my mind to me a kingdom is," becomes a thoroughly understood reality. The realm of spirit is as a foreign land to the worshiper of the flesh and fleshly sensations, so between these two extremes we must look for the individual souls that will make the world better by coming into it as working factors for all that tends to spiritualize and refine, and we will hopefully look forward to the time when civilization has progressed to a period in which—

"Man shall not ask his brother any more
'Believest thou?' but 'Lovest thou?' and all
Shall answer at Truth's altar, 'Yes, I love,'
For hope may anchor, faith may steer, but love,
Great love, alone is captain of the soul."

GROWING OF A SOUL.

Hear ye this parable: A man
Did plant a garden. Vine and tree
Alike, in course of time, began
To put forth fair and pleasantly.
The rains of heaven, the persuading sun
Came down alike on each and every one.

Yet some trees willful grew, and some
Strong vines grew daily in the sun,
With gaudy leaves, that ever come
To naught. And yet each flaunting one
Did flourish on and triumphantly grow
Like sunset clouds in all their moving show.

But lo! the harvest found them not;
The soul had perished from them. Mold
And muck and leaf lay there to rot,
And furnish nourishment untold
To patient tree and lowly creeping vine
That grew as grew the husbandman's design.

Hear then this lesson, hear and heed:
I say that chaff shall perish; say
Man's soul is like unto a seed,
To grow into the judgment day.
It grows and grows if he will have it grow;
It perishes if he must have it so.

The Roman Church, and the Part It Is Playing.

IS IT TOO RADICAL?

The Citizen was surprised last week when it received a call from a certain business man of the city,—surprised because we had understood that he was not in sympathy with our work. But we were much more surpised when he opened his heart to us and told us just how he felt. We did not take down his words, but they were so impressed upon us by his earnestness that we can give them almost entire. He said:

"I was born in Boston, as was my father, and so was my mother, and also my grandmother and grandfather on my father's side. I have been in business now for forty years. I have always prided myself upon my liberal views, as do my fellow-Unitarians—looking upon all sects as being about equal, except my own, of course, which I consider a little superior. The Roman Catholic church has commended itself to me as a sort of law and order league—useful for keeping in check its many lawless members. Outside of this view I have thought but little about it, except to give money when it asked it, and to rebuke those who criticised it.

"But to-day I am mad!—as Gen. Sherman expressed it, 'Mad clean through!' This is supposed to be a land of freedom—of free speech and freedom of action (within proper bounds)! But I have awakened to the ugly conclusion that our boasted freedom is all a dream—a glint of moonshine!

"I have had in my employ a young Irish boy, brought up a Roman Catholic, and until lately attending that church. He is a good boy, and gives all his money to his mother to help support the large family. I have noticed lately a change in him. I couldn't understand just what it was, but he seemed to be less Irish and Roman Catholic, somehow. I have heard him singing or whistling some of the old-fashioned Protestant hymns, and saw him one noon reading a Bible. Then I asked him a few questions and he told me that he had become a "convert" at a Salvation Army meeting, and was now attending a Congregationalist church and Sunday-school. He said it was very hard for him for his mother and all his friends and relatives were angry, and some of them had made threats. But he appeared to be happy, and very firm in his convictions.

"I thought little more about the matter until last week a priest was shown into my office, and without introducing himself he said: 'I have just spoken for a large bill of goods, and wish them sent to me. But first I wish to ask a favor. You have a young man in your store—his name is Jimmy——. He is a bad fellow—refuses to obey his mother, and defies his rector. I do not like to trade with a store in which such a fellow is employed, and my conscience will not allow me to take the goods that I have spoken for if they come from this place while he is here. It won't help your business to keep him here.'

"'But,' I replied, 'what is the favor you were to ask?'

"'Oh,' he said, 'that this chap be sent about his business.'

"'What charges have you to make against his character—charges which can be proved?'

"The arrogant priest answered: 'That will do, sir! I am a priest of the church! You need not send the goods. We have some power in Boston.'

"With that he passed out. Calling Jimmy, I asked him if that was his priest, and he said it was, and that his mother had told him that the priest had ordered her to turn him out of the house!

"During the day I related the facts to a partner in a large dry goods house. He smiled and said: 'That is a common occurrence with us. If we advertise for a Protestant clerk, we are threatened with boycott; if we advertise in a Protestant paper, we are threatened with boycott; if we refuse to give money to priest or nun, we are threatened with boycott; if my minister happens to criticise popery, and it gets into a daily, we are threatened with boycott because I attend that church. And note how they work their plans—through three channels. First, a hint comes to us from some Roman Catholic head of department that "we may lose trade if we do so and so, or don't do so and so." He says "the salesmen say so." By "the salesmen" he means, of course, Roman Catholic salesmen—perhaps Knights of Columbus. Then perhaps a priest will get word to us that we are "offending the church" and finally, a notorious blackmailing politician, who has, or thinks he has, a powerful "pull," calls on us and advises us to purchase safety by surrendering our freedom. Up to date we have defied them all—lost a little Irish trade, but retained what is worth a hundred fold more to us—our self-respect.'

"Now," said the narrator, "this same blackmailing politician called upon me—said he was formerly a Congressman. He wanted money for 'doing us a good turn,' as he expressed it. He said he had great influence and could 'prevent any trouble.'

"I controlled my temper and simply ordered the fellow out. I should have kicked him out! Do you wonder that I am mad when my dear old native city is being throttled by these dirty beggars and blackmailers, who dare to threaten a man in his own office?"—Boston Citizen.

THE ROMAN OCTOPUS IN SPAIN.

"Poor monk-ridden Spain! Already she has to support over two hundred thousand native priests and nuns, besides the numerous monks and nuns from France who continually invade the country and tax the resources of the population. And now that the time-limit of the agreement with the United States, which allowed the Philippine friars to remain in those islands, has come to an end, another influx of six thousand monks and nuns is expected.

"The anti-clerical sentiment is rapidly increasing in Spain. The appointment of the Dominican Nozaleda to an archbishopric has brought forth an outburst of the most bitter criticism from the Spanish Liberals. Recently the Republicans held a mass-meeting at Valencia to protest against the appointment, which, as one of the speakers maintained, would pave the way for a Spanish revolution. The meeting was a very violent one. Representative Blasco Ibanez, the author, exclaimed: 'To-day we protest by a meeting—to-morrow by violence!' After the case of Nozaleda had been discussed, they took up the question of the Philippine friars, who are expected soon to arrive in the country. To judge from the sentiment of this meeting they will not meet with a very happy welcome. Another speaker—Luis Tapia, said: 'The seven thousand Philippine monks bring with them seven thousand ropes—by which we shall hang them!' The same evening a revolutionary drama, entitled: 'The Vampire of the People,' was played at Teatro Vovedades. The drama, which in a very lively and realistic manner depicts the fight between the Jesuits and the workmen, was received with wild outbursts of applause. It was immediately afterwards confiscated by the authorities—which, however, has not tended to abate the anti-clerical sentiment."

ROMAN OCTOPUS NOT WANTED IN MEXICO.

"Mexico has reinformed the Vatican that diplomatic relations between the Republic and the Holy See may not be re-established. President Diaz as stoutly as ever holds out against Rome's plea. Having been burned once in the fire the Republic does not care for a second experience. The Pope's recent letter to the church in Italy on the issues between Labor and Capital is as lacking in originality as an egg is of hair. It but echoes Pope Leo XIII., in fact is naught but a collocation of sentiments from his encyclicals. Such Fabian policy precludes any judgment as to what the new pope thinks for himself on these issues in dispute, although it shows that for the time being he is on the side of conservatism and property. As journalists, we cannot be especially interested in the reiteration of the dictum that Catholic writers 'must, in all that touches religious interests and the action of the church in society, subject themselves entirely in intellect and in will.....to their bishops and to the Roman pontiff. They must, above all, take care not to anticipate the judgments of the Holy See in this important matter.' Under such conditions Roman Catholic journalism can hardly be inviting to a man of any independence of thought. Latest reports from Paris indivate that the Combes Ministry is to raise the issue of the unlimited right of the state to nominate bishops without an understanding with the pope. If fought out to its logical finish this means a severance of the Concordat, and that of the union of church and state."—From the Congregationalist, of Boston.

INFORMATION WANTED.

In Reference to Mediumship and Its Effects.

The writer desires to correct some mistakes growing out of an article in your issue of January 30, calling for certain information as to the good or bad effects of mediumship. It was thought the article could not be misunderstood, but it has been.

What I desire is to know the length of time during which the manifestations have continued—the entire period of mediumship or psychic manifestations,—and not the duration of the influence over the medium at each manifestation.

Some correspondents have hastily concluded that my object in seeking to compile statistics relative to the effects of mediumship is to "kill" a certain widely advertised book supposed to be hostile thereto.

This is not any part of the object I had in view. The desire to obtain something reliable regarding the effects of mediumship had its beginning in my mind long before the book referred to was published.

Early in my investigations I heard the charge made from various sources that mediumship was injurious and the medium an unfortunate mortal; that scores of persons had been ruined in health, mind, morals and purse thereby.

Whenever such statement has been made in my presence I have invariably asked for names, dates, addresses, and particulars, and strange to relate I always found them exceedingly elusive—I could never get hold of them.

Sitting in a seance for materialization in the city of San Francisco, some years since, the writer engaged a lady near him in conversation, asking her if she was accustomed to attend that medium's seances. She at once stated that she was not; she "was a Theosophist, and really ought not to be in such a place;" that she had been taught and of course "knew" mediumship was very injurious to the individual, had been the cause of much sorrow and had ruined many lives, and so forth. The writer politely asked her to kindly give him the names and addresses of a few of the persons whose lives had been injured by mediumship, as he was much interested in the subject and looking for just that kind of information.

The response was in the form of a hasty and decided statement that she herself did not know any such person or persons—but she "had heard of them."

Later, the writer contributed an article of two or three columns on the subject of Modern Spiritualism to one of the leading daily papers of the Northwest. A correspondent replied, and charged mediumship with having "blasted the lives" of pure-minded young women, caused many to be led into immorality, and so forth.

I promptly challenged the accuracy of his statements, asked for specific data, and said I would make a thorough investigation of every case cited and report the results, telling him he could send the data to me privately. No reply was ever received. Why?

From some Spiritualist platforms I have heard mediumship condemned—also from church pulpits—in the secular and religious press—by teachers of New Thought—by Christian Scientists. But nowhere has the writer been able to put his hand on any statistics that would shed a single ray of light on the subject, affirmatively.

Hence my appeal to Spiritualists, non-Spiritualists, mediums, sensitives, and all persons having psychic experiences, to send me a statement as to the effect of such experiences on themselves, or to send me data relative to any one else whom they know.

In order to make the statistics of any value they must be verifiable; therefore the request was made for the names and addresses of two persons to accompany each statement, who could either verify the statements made, or indorse the character of the writer for truthfulness.

Statements have been received from widely separated sections, but the response has not been very encouraging as to number. The professional mediums probably were and are busy, and others perhaps thought their statements would be unnecessary. Let me say to all such, that a statement from everyone who has any knowledge on this subject, would be appreciated.

All that the writer hoped to do was to accumulate statistics of a reliable character that would throw light on this question. All that is wished is verifiable facts. One concrete fact is worth more to the writer than a thousand unverified theories. In he mistaken in thinking they may be valued by others also?

If you know anything along this line, will you not be kind enough to make a short statement and forward to the address below? In many cases, the desired information could be put on a postal card. Will you not write to-day?

Spiritualism in Australia.

Mrs. Laura G. Fixen Writes of Her Reception at Melbourne and Other Places.

Australia is called the new world, and it would seem proper that all ideas expressed under the term New Thought should here find prolific ground. Spiritualism proper in Australia started about forty years ago in Melbourne. A seventeen-year-old lad, W. H. Terry, came from London and settled in Melbourne. When twenty-four his attention was called to Spiritualism by hearing about it, he intercsted a few others and together they investigated and had seances with remarkable demonstrations. One of the sitters developed and became a fine independent writer. Mr. Terry himself became "controlled" and then founded a society. He did a great deal to develop others; one of these saw clairvoyantly the front page of a Spiritualist paper, the heading of which read "The Harbinger of Light," and told Mr. Terry that he would edit the paper, but as he had had no literary experience, that was the last thing which he expected. Soon after another Spiritualist started a paper greatly to Mr. Terry's relief. This, however failed within a few months and Mr. Terry felt that he must obey the call and eighteen months after the vision the Harbinger of Light was started with a heading just as described, and Mr. Terry has now published the paper for thirty years without making a cent profit. It has been the organ of the cause for the entire Australasia, and one of the greatest powers for propagating the work.

Mr. Terry became especially gifted with ability to diagnose diseases, and soon nearly all of his time was taken up with ministering to the sick. More than twelve of the leading physicians of different schools in Melbourne sought his advice in difficult cases, and Dr. J. B. Motherwell, a member of the Council of the Melbourne University, and for twenty-five years honorary physician to the Melbourne Hospital, consulted him on a specially important case of internal trouble which none of the other doctors could diagnose. As the patient was cured through Mr. Terry's ministrations, Dr. Motherwell became interested and soon became one of the leading Spiritualists in Melbourne. Dr. S. D. Bird was another prominent physician who consulted Mr. Terry, who soon had an enormous clientele and wrought wondrously for the cause. He receives his communications in a peculiar way, by knockings on his forehead.

Another meteor dawned on the world of Spiritualism in 1866, Mr. Chas. Bright, literary man and editor of a large paper. He was deputed by the Argus, then the largest and only paper of power in the Southern hemisphere to write six articles on Spiritualism, the new idea which was pervading the country. Mr. Bright was an honest man, he desired to understand somewhat of the subject on which he was to write, and so began to go to seances and otherwise to investigate Spiritualism. To his great amazement he found that the claims of the cult were based upon facts. He was surprised at the wealth of literature published on the subject, which he eagerly read, and instead of writing against Spiritualism as had been the intention, he wrote strongly for it, and said that there was more in this new philosophy than the world even dreamed of. These articles caused much excitement as well as interest throughout the Commonwealth and were republished in pamphlet form and spread all over Australia. Mr. Bright became a Spiritualist and his first lecture on the subject was delivered in the Unitarian church in Melbourne in 1868. His fame as a speaker increased and the largest halls could not hold the people who came to hear him. In 1875 he gave up all his business and his income of six thousand dollars a year and henceforth devoted his time to Spiritualism until last year when his great soul went home. During the past ten years of his life he lectured considerably in America.

Another leading man who became a Spiritualist was the Honorable Alfred Deakin, the present Premier of the Commonwealth of Australia. He became a trance speaker and was conductor of the lyceum. He published a book, "The New Pilgrim's Progress," but when Mr. Deakin, fifteen years ago first entered Parliament, he thought best to drop Spiritualism and carefully bought up every copy of his book wherever it was for sale.

Another pioneer and a most ardent Spiritualist is the Honorable T. W. Stanford, brother of the late Leland Stanford, founder of the Stanford University in California. For forty years he has devoted much time, influence and money to the advancement of the cause. He has been a widower for this number of years as he lost his wife and child within a year after his marriage. Mr. Bailey, one of the most remarkable materializing mediums of the present day, has been engaged by Mr. Stanford exclusively for three years, and conducted private seances twice a week to a circle of about twenty guests. The visible results from these seances can probably not be duplicated anywhere. Mr. Stanford has in his apiary living birds which were materialized in his office, belonging to foreign countries, showers of living fish would cover the table at the seances, but some of these would only live for a few days or weeks. I also saw in Mr. Stanford's home a beautiful plant, rich in foliage, 18 inches high, grown from a materialized slip, no one has been found who knows its name or the species to which it belongs. I also saw a well preserved skull, several pieces of papyrus covered with hieroglyphics, a leopard's skin from India, a large number of varied ancient coins and several tablets covered with inscriptions from Egypt, Greece and other countries. These were very ancient and were brought direct in the room and dropped on the table by request, and as Mr. Bailey sat under strict test conditions there can be no doubt of the genuineness of these manifestations through spirit power, of nearly two hundred articles. Mr. Bailey has just left for Italy by invitation of the Psychic Research Society there.

The Spiritualists have been greatly encouraged and assisted through the visits of workers from America and England, such as the late Emma Hardinge Britten, Wm. Denton, also Mrs. Brigham, Miss Morse and Messrs. Slade, Evans, Colville, Morse and Dr. Peebles, each of whom have done grand work for the cause. The Spiritualist societies in Brisbane, Adelaide and Perth are still young, but the Psychic Society of Sydney is flourishing, with Mr. Adams as president and Mr. Sercombe as secretary. The Sydney society owes much of its early life to the energy of the Hon. J. Bowie Wilson, Minister for Lands, a most single-minded, earnest Spiritualist.

I shall not soon forget the hearty reception which was accorded me on my arrival, nor the enthusiastic audience gathered in Leigh Hall, on Sunday evening, January 3. They did all they could to make me feel welcome, and it was indeed an inspiration in itself to look at the sea of kindly faces. They paid the closest attention to the address and seemed to drink in every word.

The largest society in Australia is the Victorian Association of Spiritualists in Melbourne. Mr. Terry has been its president for many years but recently requested to be relieved and was succeeded by Mr. Otto Waschatz. R. C. T. Morgan is first vice-president; Mrs. M. A. Redfern, second vice-president; Mrs. Anna Bright, honorary secretary and Mr. W. H. Terry, treasurer. They have a membership of over 100 and have for ten years past rented a room in the Austral Building for their social gatherings. Mr. Terry has his offices in the same building, and on the ground floor is a large book store for Spiritualist literature in charge of the Misses Hinge and Skeele. Their usual Sunday meetings are held in Odd Fellows' Hall, but they soon expect to build a temple and have five thousand dollars in their treasury towards the building, while an aged member has willed them five thousand dollars more towards the same. They have a flourishing lyceum with Mr. J. Isaacs, conductor. There is as yet no state organization, but they are looking toward this end for further usefulness.

My reception in Melbourne was the most cordial I have ever had anywhere, and the meetings the largest and most enthusiastic of any I ever addressed since speaking on the Spiritualistic platform. From the moment I arrived at the depot until I left, every thoughtful attention that good will could suggest was mine. The Bijou Theater, one of the largest in the city, had been engaged, and a choir of 60 voices, drilled under the direction of Prof. Bloomfield, which with solos and orchestra rendered beautiful music. Although the theater seats two thousand it was literally packed, and on the second Sunday still more were standing up than on the first, while the enthusiasm was even greater. It was estimated that over a thousand orthodox church members attended each meeting, and Melbourne Spiritualists have had no such meetings for over twenty years. The city seemed to have caught the enthusiasm and for the first time in their history the press was opened on the subject, and every day there appeared articles of from one to two columns, pro and con, a fact very gratifying to the society. Ministers from their pulpits spoke of the craze which had struck the city and warned their people against it, and the Wesley Methodist minister announced that he would "expose" Spiritualism on the Sunday after I left. Book stores places their literature on Spiritualism in the most prominent places in the windows and I was besieged with letters of approval and disapproval.

On the first day of my arrival in Melbourne, Mr. Terry had an informal reception at his home that I might meet the executive committee. The following Wednesday a public reception was arranged in the Austral Building with addresses of welcome and on the evening before I left another audience gathered here to bid me "bon voyage."

I was presented with a loving testimonial signed by the officers of the society and numerous evidences of the thoughtful kindness of the audience.

Mr. Waschatz, the president, is a man full of power and enthusiasm. Mr. Terry, the treasurer, I can do but faint justice; his great mind and heart is given to the cause; and last but not least, Mrs. Bright, the secretary, is a source of power in herself. She it was who looked after the thousand and one things necessary to make a large meeting a success. She forgot weariness, but nothing else. She possesses the enviable adaptability which makes everyone love her, and is the essence of femininity. No wonder their society is such a power with such officials. I only wish every society was blessed with one such as these.

The word Melbourne has a new sweet sound to me, as it would have to anyone coming here as a stranger and receiving such a welcome, and as I stood on the deck of the "Pateena," which carried me out of the harbor toward Tasmania, it was with a new pain that I watched the friends on shore through a mist of tears.

LAURA G. FIXEN.

THAT SPOILS THE WHOLE THING.

To the Editor:—The article, "An Object Lesson in the Home Circle," in the issue of Feb. 20, while interesting, it has one assertion that is hard to take in. I refer to where Jesus is made to say that his "father gave him this planet," and "he is the God of it." THAT SPOILS THE WHOLE THING! Jesus never said anything of the sort; if he did, then he has retrograded from a broad-minded, free-thinking man to a narrow egotist since passing to the other side, or what is a more reasonable explanation, it was not Jesus at all, but one claiming to be him, and a very inferior understudy he made, and if the spirit claiming to be Jesus was not Jesus, then probably the whole bunch were having fun with our friend, and amusing himself at his expense.

I always leap the barbed wire fence and take to the woods when Solomon, Saul, Jesus and Abraham Lincoln are called in. I think the wiser spirits do not want their names known; are rather apt to conceal an exalted name than otherwise.

If Messers. Hale and Cherry are honest men and Spiritualists, it seems to a stupid man like myself, that it can do no harm for a materializing medium to go to Los Angeles, and make THE TRY anyway, as in case of failure they are out only the expense; if they win the $1,000, a big bunch of advertising will be the result. Messrs Hale and Cherry doubtless know something about materialization, and will give proper conditions for the same, if not for faking. The distance to Los Angeles may make it difficult for most mediums to go there, but if any medium of reputation will announce their willingness to go, I think the fare could be easily be raised by subscription through The Progressive Thinker; a series of say six seances ought to enable the guides to raise one form if they have the power at all. I Grow Taller Every Day.

You can increase your height from two to five inches by this method.

Absolutely harmless, strictly scientific and endorsed by leading physicians.

Free book explains it.

Results quickly accomplished at home.

MR. K. LEO MINGES.

I have increased my height nearly eight inches since I began following the Cartilage method. These results are lasting and are a great surprise to my most intimate friends. There is no hearsay or guess work about it. Those who knew me before and know me now are ready to swear to this statement. I am interested in all who are short and stunted and I will gladly tell you how I acquired this increased height. There is no pain or inconvenience connected with it. No electricity, drugs or knife used, simply a process which causes the Cartilages to expand and lengthen the bones. Write me and I will tell you how to receive the same benefits which I have received. Tell me your exact height and age and I will give you information that will surprise you. You will also receive my free book which tells all about this remarkable discovery and it contains the pictures and statements of many who have increased their height from two to five inches. All correspondence will be held sacredly confidential, and all letters and books sent free in plain envelopes. You can increase your height if you are not over fifty years of age. This method also develops the body proportionately. Write to-day for the absolute proof. Do not take my word for it, but satisfy yourself. I can prove it to you if you will give me the opportunity. NEW BOOK.

Psychic Light.

BY MRS. DRAKE.

Important Addition to Our Literature.

Mrs. Maud Lord Drake has a national reputation as a medium. The manifestations given through her mediumship have been most marvelous. She has written a book with this title: "PSYCHIC LIGHT—THE CONTINUITY OF LAW AND LIFE." It is a ponderous volume of 600 pages. It will hold your attention from the beginning to the end. It is chockful of stirring incidents. Price of this large volume, only $1.50 postpaid.

A VERY IMPORTANT CALL IS MADE.

A GENEROUS OFFER, AND A CALL TO SPIRITUALISTS.

To the Spiritualists at Large:—A generous offer has been made by a prominent Spiritualist in this city to give ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS to the Mediums' Relief Fund of the N. S. A., for the benefit of aged and needy mediums, provided the Spiritualists at large will contribute another Thousand Dollars to the same relief fund by the first of June next. The N. S. A. is now paying out a large monthly sum in pensions to worthy mediums; the calls for aid increase and the fund is constantly being depleted. Let every generous soul who has not already done all possible for this worthy object, kindly send contributions, large or small, to the following address, each will be acknowledged with thanks. The generous man who makes the offer desires to be unnamed to the public.

DEITIES OF MYTHOLOGY.

Gods Are Ideal Images—The Word God a Common Noun—Unknown Gods.

In reading ancient history and literature, especially of the Greeks and Romans, we meet with frequent mention of "the gods," by which is meant the gods of mythology, which were imaginary, omnipresent persons, supposed to possess various powers, attributes and influences over humanity. I have a secret suspicion that many modern writers and speakers make use of the word God without understanding it; therefore I want to lay before them names and brief definitions of a few mythological deities. This is important in discussion of the God question.

Apollo—a deity of the Greeks and Romans, worshiped as the sun god.

Aurora—goddess of morning.

Apis—god of industry, worshiped in the form of an ox.

Ate—goddess of revenge.

Annubis—dog-headed god.

Bacchus—god of wine.

Circe—a sea nymph who turned men into swine.

Comus—god of festivals.

Cupid—god of love.

Diana—daughter of Jupiter and virgin moon goddess.

Discordia—goddess of discord, banished from heaven for exciting divisions among the gods.

Echo—a nymph slighted in love, pined away until nothing was left but her voice.

Erebus—an infernal deity, son of Chaos.

Fates—goddesses who presided over human destiny.

Fauns—deities with horns and goat's feet.

Hercules—son of Jupiter, celebrated for strength.

Hymen—god of marriage.

Iris—messenger of Juno, changed into a rainbow.

Jupiter—supreme god of the Romans and father of men and gods.

Juno—sister and wife of Jupiter.

Mars—god of war.

Mercury—son of Jupiter, god of merchants and thieves.

Morpheus—god of sleep and dreams.

Neptune—god of the sea.

Pluto—god of Hades.

Plutus—god of wealth.

Styx—a river in the infernal regions by which the gods swore their most solemn oaths.

Uranus—the most ancient of the gods.

Venus—goddess of grace, love, beauty, pleasure.

Vesta—goddess of flocks and herds.

Vulcan—son of Jupiter and god of fire.

Enlightened God-believers of America should be very careful how they scorn or sneer at the deities and devotees of mythology; for they are all in the same boat—that is, the gods they all believe in are images of imagination. Can Theists of the present time show that their gods are better than the ancients? What is the difference between a dog-headed god and a three-headed god? What is the difference between a devil and a god of wrath, war, vengeance?

At the time the Christian religion was invented, in the reign of the Roman emperor, Constantine, mythology was in its greatest glory; however, the authors and projectors of Christianity did not want "the gods" in their system, because "the gods" caused much confusion and conflict; and they concluded that one god was sufficient and finally settled on Jehovah, the worst and most abominable of all gods—the god of wrath, war, vengeance.

All gods are ideal beings, supposed to possess various attributes, nevertheless, these gods exert a powerful influence over religious devotees, who become like the deities they serve; and this accounts for some nations being of warlike disposition and others peaceable.

All god-believers make their own gods. "There ain't no sich person."

The practice of god-believers writing God with capital G as a proper noun is a fraud and deception; because they wish to convey the idea that they refer to a particular God, presuming readers will not observe the trick. They might as well write man with capital M and claim that it stands for a particular individual, yet not give his name. The word god is a common noun, applied to any and all gods, and spelling it with capital G does not make of it a proper noun, no more than spelling dog with capital D makes it a proper noun. No amount of such usage and custom will ever make god a proper noun, for we cannot tell which god is intended unless the writer indicates the particular god he or she has in mind.

But there can be no valid objection to the use of capitals for proper names of gods, such, for instance, as Jupiter, Allah, Apollo, Baal, Jehovah. Theologians rarely ever write or utter the name of Jehovah; perhaps because of his awful record and bad character—nevertheless, they mean Jehovah by God.

What some folks mean by God is widely different from what other folks mean by God, and so by God we have an endless jargon of theories and beliefs founded on baseless assertions, conflicting statements, antagonistic doctrines, contradictory theories. These antagonists can unite and agree in their condemnation of the Atheist who does not accept any of their theories. He is made a butt for shafts of ridicule.

What do god-believers know of a god they say is unknown and unknowable? What can they teach on a subject which they admit is beyond comprehension? How can they define that which they declare to be undefinable? What do they understand of a god they affirm is incomprehensible? What shall we say of people who persistently make use of words and ideas they do not understand with the assumption and pretense of knowledge? This is the attitude of Theists, caught in the meshes of their own folly.

What do people know who have been taught the theories and dogmas of Theism? They know nothing but error, yet believe much delusive nonsense. Assertions without proof or basis of support are of no value. Belief of a theory or religious doctrine is no evidence of its truth, yet they have a reverence for old established precedent and follow in the beaten track.

"For men are prone to go it blind
Along the calf-paths of the mind,
And try to work from sun to sun
To do what other folks have done."

Twentieth Century Gospel.

An Extract from a Lecture Delivered by Rev. Ernest W. Hunt, at Bangor, Me.

He Talks Exceedingly Close to the Lines Marked Out By Spiritualists, and Illustrates the Progressive Spirit of the Age.

Again we turn to one of the most recent departments of science, viz.: Comparative mythology, and we ask, What have you to contribute to the Twentieth Century Gospel? We declare, say the students of this science, that men's ideas and beliefs regarding the Supreme Power in the universe, are always progressive, that in the childhood of the race men had childish modes of viewing nature and childish ways of expressing their ideas. We say that these childish methods of expressing their ideas resulted in the beautiful stories which tell of the person, work and religion of the world's great saviors, which are found in the world's great Bibles. We say that in the growth of these stories men see the unfolding of great moral and religious truth, and the working of these mighty forces which make for righteousness, acting in and upon mankind through the only agencies that were fitted for it in those early days.

This science further tells us the Bible is a literature subject to the same laws which govern the development of other great literatures, having the same defects of ignorance and superstition of errors of judgment and mistakes of copying. It also says that the Hebrew Scriptures stand pre-eminent among all sacred books as illustrating the evolution of morals and religion in the history of the race and embodying in its myths and legends the purest and most enlightened conceptions of religious faith and knowledge that the world has ever known.

CONSTRUCTIVE RESULTS.

If, as it may be, these ideas now come to you for the first time, I can understand a feeling of disappointment arising in your mind when you compare them with the religious teachings you have hitherto entertained. You doubtless feel like the little girl who had a quarrel at school with a little Jewish girl and when she got home she denounced the Jews. Her mother said reprovingly, "My dear, you must not talk in that way. The Jews were God's chosen people. Our Lord Himself was a Jew." After a moment's deep thought the child replied, in a tone of horror and regret: "O, mamma, I didn't know that. I'm so sorry. I always thought he was an Episcopalian."

But think now of the constructive results of this modern Gospel. How much better and nobler it is. It enables us to think of God not as a jealous, fitful, despotic king, something like a tyrannical sovereign of Asia Minor, but rather as the Just Ruler of the earth and the Universal Father of its peoples. It bids us think of the highest and noblest types of manhood and womanhod, not as men cruel by nature, treacherous in thought and revengeful in action, but rather that the right goal of all human action is to do the right for right's sake, to speak the truth for truth's sake, and to love others for love's sake. It gives us a nobler conception of the origin of the universe, shows us that the Divine Power is "closer than hands or feet," and that the true inspiration and joys of life belong now as ever to any or all who seek to know and do the truth. It makes our Christian Bible more beautiful and valuable than ever, because freed from the dogmatic rust which was rapidly destroying its usefulness and purpose. It reveals the essentials of Christianity as taught by its founder to be not creed but character, not uniformity but unity, not dogma but ethics, and behind all else the beautiful spirit of unselfish, undying love as the world's greatest dynamic, both for comfort and inspiration.

PRACTICAL REASON.

At this point there are men who would deny our right to proceed further. They say that all beyond what science tells us is unknown and unknowable, although by a strange contradiction the boundaries of knowledge are every day and everywhere being rapidly extended. I am safe within the bounds of truth in saying that there is everywhere to-day a growing reaction against the purely material conceptions of things which prevail very generally in the world of science only a few years ago.

The discoveries of radium bring us to the very threshold of the spirit world, whilst our investigations into the great mystery of human consciousness are revealing other sources of knowledge as worthy of credence in their various departments as geology and astronomy. One of the greatest sciences of the future will be the science of psychical research. Where science is obliged to halt, man's moral idealism becomes the constructive teacher and guide of morals and religion. There is an intellectual knowledge—a matter of thought; there is an ethical knowledge—a matter of feeling, and each advance brings us nearer to the time when

"That in us which thinks and that which feels
Shall everlastingly be reconciled,
And that which questioneth with that which kneels,"

CONCERNING GOD.

"What then has this Twentieth Century Gospel to tell us concerning God? To know God at all fully—as well might the child hope to grasp the planets in its tiny fingers, or to hold the mighty ocean in the hollow of its hand. But as the world of thought we learn that there is one life, above all, through all and in all, life which is not matter but spirit, and which spirit it calls God, so in the world of feeling our deepest emotion is love. In the world of thought our highest conception of God is that of power, but in the world of feeling our highest thought of divinity is love. We can know God best by loving Him because love is best understood by love. Some people wonder whether God is a person. It seems to me an idle question.

The power other than ourselves, which was here before we came and remains after we depart, this power has brought us into life and is therefore our Creator. By reason of its disciplinary and protecting care of the universal life, it is our Father. No plummet of human reason can sound the depths of the ocean of immensity. But as nothing is ever evolved which has not first been involved, as the greater must also include the less, so the Creator of this personal consciousness must include all of good and right and love and personality that we are, and still be infinitely more than the thing he has produced.

"Thus we can still pray Our Father, knowing that in this Twentieth Century Gospel we are face to face with a divine power or being, whichever name you prefer to use, before whom we may plead the voice of human need and imperfections, whose laws are everywhere and at all times uniform, just and equal and in the stillness of our souls we may often hear the whisperings of His love."

ON IMMORTALITY.

And this brings me to my final thought, viz.: The comfort and inspiration which this Twentieth Century Gospel brings to our conceptions of immortality. Every household has its memories of loved ones, who have passed away into the land of silence. We miss their familiar forms and long for their vanished smiles and the sound of the voice that is still. Is it for them an eternal dark, a sleep that knows no waking, or can we stand by the grave and say, "He is not here but is risen?" We wonder where they are, what interest or relation they have to the life they have left, whether they are as conscious of us as we are mindful of them, whether we shall ever meet again. Some may say "that if it should prove an eternal sleep why then 'tis rest." Some are so mentally constituted that they find it impossible to believe. But very few indeed believe that death is the end of existence. Immortality is as necessary to human life as is the sunlight to the world.

In the presence of such a tragedy as death, when our eyes are wet with weeping, and our hearts are near to breaking, as we stand beside the grave, this Gospel of the twentieth century whispers both sweetly and full of comfort the strong hope of immortality. All life is one. Even science confirms the reality of a general immortality. Through the shadows of our ignorance, faith standing upon reason sees that the grave covers no faculty of soul, only the poor, tired, worn-out body.

Whilst across the wind-swept wastes of thought love points to God, who being ever true in nature, is also true beyond our ken, who having given us a natural confidence in the integrity of things, and made love life's mightiest and sweetest force, will carry through to larger capacities of appreciation and enjoyment the desires he has placed within the human breast. It is not probable that the orchestra will be silenced in the midst of the symphony, or that the building of character will be stopped when only half completed. Everything in our modern knowledge reminds us of the illimitable resources and possibilities which await our growing conceptions. Nature has only yet begun to manifest her resources. How sweet and beautiful are the assurances of the birds and flowers concerning the dear ones, "which we have loved and lost awhile." Whatever we may think nature herself stakes her all upon the truth of immortal life. Everywhere she points her children onwards and upwards to the great light of life, bids them choose the good, and everywhere assures them that He who cares for the birds and flowers, cares also for the lives and loves of men.

And so with every addition to our knowledge we come closer to the great and final generalization which shall open for us the doors to the inner sanctum of the universe. Every new step not founded on misconception leads us nearer to that final understanding which is the ultimate heritage of the race. Already we have visions, born both of faith and knowledge of a world which shall in truth be God's free garden, where love shall reign supreme, where there shall be room for thought and for faith, where from one fane or altar all tongues shall recite one Gospel, sing one psalter and repeat one simple creed,

"Where each sorrow shall have its soothers,
And each need its kindly care,
And all mankind be brothers,
And love reign everywhere.

"Where Heaven's eternal patience,
All human hearts shall win,
And earth's enfranchised nations,
Shall hail God's kingdom in."

SOMEWHAT CRITICAL.

C. F. SHORT, A THINKER AND AND WRITER, EVER WILLING TO IMPART TO OTHERS, EXAMINES SOMEWHAT CRITICALLY THAT CHURCHLY "I BELIEVE" RIGMAROLE, CALLED "THE APOSTLES' CREED."

Why called the Apostles' creed? They never made it, saw it nor taught it, and yet it is recited over and over millions of times, as though it was the all in all, the sum total of all truth. How narrow is the line often between truth and error. Let us now consider the articles of this creed.

The first is, "I believe in Almighty God."

That means my conception, not yours.

What is worshiped is a mental image. Every one has a definition. Whether mine or yours is the correct one, is the question.

Second, "Maker of heaven."

Where is heaven and of what is it made? Is not heaven a soul-condition rather than a locality? Surely so.

Third, "And earth."

Is the earth not an accretion, a growth, a development, a gradual formation, under the operation of natural law and forces? Scientists tell us that matter is uncreated and uncreatable; that it has existed forever, and not something that was made at a certain time.

"I also believe in his son Jesus Christ, begotten by the Holy Ghost."

Does not the New Testament teach us that he was the son of Joseph the carpenter? His sacred genealogy is always traced back through Joseph. All this would be without meaning or sense unless such was the case

"I believe that he was born of the Virgin Mary."

How can this be so, if his mother was Joseph's wife, and Joseph his real father?

"I believe that he was crucified, dead, buried, and descended into hell."

Oh, my! let us hope not!

"I believe that his body was raised from the grave on the third day."

Very few people now believe in the mythical story of a literal resurrection.

"I believe that he ascended up into heaven."

What and where is up? That is very foggy, to say the least of it.

"From whence he will come to judge the living and the dead."

That the Christ spirit will spread over the whole earth, let us hope, but few indeed now believe in a literal personal return in a bodily form.

"I believe in the judgment day."

This supposes a marching up to the judge after the fashion of earthly courts, some sentenced to go down into the deep dark cellar of despair; and others to go up to the sky parlor. This belief has few defenders in this day and age.

"I believe in the holy Catholic church."

Did any apostle ever mention any such church, or a church by such a name? What is a church? It is a body of believers. Where are we told to believe in men. Certainly we cannot believe in all church members. Then all we can say is, "I believe in a portion of the holy Catholic church."

"I believe in the communion of saints."

Do you believe in mediums, in seances, in messages from our friends who have gone before? You know you do not. Then why say, "I believe."

"I believe in the resurrection of the body."

Considering that within the natural body there dwells a spiritual body, that never dies or is buried, how can it be raised up. Millions of bodies have been scattered to the four winds of heaven—never buried at all. How can they come up from where they never were?

"I believe in the forgiveness of sins."

Many there are who doubt that our little words or acts distress and make angry the Deity, and so make it necessary that we appease this anger and beg for forgiveness like naughty children; or if we must obtain it, to get it simply by feeling sorry and asking for it, is too cheap and easy a way, and such a doctrine should not be inculcated.

In conclusion, consider all these things which we say "I believe," which is only proper, if we are sincere.

A BEAUTIFUL SPIRIT.

John F. Goff, Michigan's Generous Spiritualist, Passed to Spirit Life.

Mr. Goff was born in Sempronius, Cayuga, county, N. Y., June 26, 1823; he departed this life at the home of M. E. Depuy, near Wakelee, Mich., Feb. 18, 1904, aged 80 years. He was among the Michigan pioneers, and was one of the successful ones who crossed the western plains to California in search of gold, and was perhaps one of the most generous men in Southern Michigan, if not in the state.

By his earnest love of justice and right doing, he has defended many against those who would have taken undue advantage. By this as well as by his liberality in cases of need, he has made many hearts happy, and by his planning and assistance he has helped many to gain comfortable homes that would otherwise have been in poor circumstances, if not homeless.

His gifts were not frivolous, but always practical. At Christmas time it was his custom to present flour, groceries, clothing, etc., in a quiet way that none might know whence the presents came, giving always to such as he deemed worthy and needy. His plan was to help those who tried to help themselves.

It was he who made it possible to establish the State Mediums' Home. This property is located near the center of Lansing, and will be known as the Goff Medium's Home. It cost the state society $4,750 and interest, of which Mr. Goff paid nearly $4,000. The building is 40 by 42 feet, and has thirteen rooms and basement. It is heated by furnace, lighted by gas, and supplied with city water. It is a modern building that cost several times the price paid. The property was lately deeded to the state society, Mr. Goff having canceled the debt, August 26, 1903. The Spiritualists of the state should be able and willing to keep it running for the benefit of worthy and needy mediums.

Mr. Goff has been a Spiritualist for over forty-five years. During all this time he has lived his religion, which means many slights, and much ridicule, but he has lived above it all. He was a subscriber to The Progressive Thinker from its very first. It was through his efforts that Farmer Riley first investigated and sat for development. He has helped many to see the light that is to illumine the world.

Mr. Goff was a member of the Masonic fraternity, and the brethren took charge of the burial services; interment at Fish Lake cemetery, Sunday, Feb. 21, conducted by the writer, (and I wish heartily to thank this society for their liberality in allowing us the use of their church on this and former occasions.) The following poem given by the guides a short time ago was read at the services:

A Tribute to John F. Goff.

Who was it worked in early day,
And by economy laid away
Till he had enough for rainy day?
John F. Goff.

Who was it bought up many a farm,
And helped the owners face the storm,
And proved himself their friend most warm?
John F. Goff.

Who was it went to rocky west,
The famous land that gold had blessed,
And helped himself and helped the rest?
John F. Goff.

Who was it saw the many poor
And helped them oft to meat and flour,
Just at the time, the needy hour?
John F. Goff.

Who was it paid the mortgage due,
For widow and for orphans, too,
And helped them many a winter through?
John F. Goff.

Who was it learned the truth so grand,
That spirit friends from higher strand
Come back to us from spirit land?
John F. Goff.

Having learned the fact, no soul can die,
Who tried to teach the passer-by.
The more of sorrow's tears to dry?
John F. Goff.

Who taught it is not just belief,
That saves the soul from endless grief,
But living right that brings relief?
John F. Goff.

Who tried to aid the cause so grand
And sent it broadcast o'er the land,
By doing good on every hand?
John F. Goff.

And who was given a miser's name,
Because he would not give for shame,
Yet lived above it just the same?
John F. Goff.

Who was it lent a helping hand
For many to gain a home and land?
'Twas this old soul most truly grand,
John F. Goff.

Who was it bought a home one day
Where mediums of the state can stay,
And gave it for their aid? aye, aye!
John F. Goff.

A monument more true and grand,
Than shaft of stone in any land,
This charity from "open hand"
John F. Goff.

Mr. Goff was very mediumistic, and two years ago when having some deal with Mr. R. D. Snyder, he made the remark that he would only be here about two years, and wanted to arrange all business accordingly. The time of the passing was within three days of two years. At another time he said that his father and friends had agreed to come to him and let him know before the very last. He had been quite feeble for a long time, yet able to be around the house and among the friends when weather would permit, until Monday, the 15th. After breakfast he was taken quite suddenly, and went down rapidly until the afternoon of the 18th, when the change came. He said on Tuesday that his father and friends were all with him, signifying that he had received the notice of the coming change as promised. He was conscious till the last, and without a murmur or struggle he seemed to pass gladly on with his friends to that bright home his goodness and kindness had builded in that fair land

Where soul with soul can meet,
Beyond death's open door,
In love most pure and sweet,
Where parting comes no more.

MYTHOLOGY.

The Gods in the Light of Ancient History.

Mythology about the gods was a system used by learned men to befog ignorant minds. Gods were persons. When any other animal was used as a sign of a god, it was used as a sign according to the meaning to at least some of the people, the same as the United States people have their flag and eagle.

All history beyond our own experience can be classed with mythology. Tradition by one person to another person is as reliable as one person writing to the people or to a person and calling it history. After considerable research I am of the opinion that gods were persons. Stars, planets, moon and sun were named for persons, and other animals and things the same as the later stars and planets were named for persons.

The mediumship of the god Indra was very great, and according to evidence he is a powerful spirit person even to our time. Gods came to Daniel of Bible history and God came to Moses, Jeremiah and other persons, according to printed evidence. Indra, in name, was found in Sanskrit and his name probably meant to see, to discover. Indra signifies one who sees or discovers. Gods of ancient times were wise persons, inventors and discoverers of things in nature, and other things useful or evil to mankind.

To affirm without knowledge is not a good mode to promote wisdom.

Indra was a person, a mighty man among mankind, after the same manner that George Washington and Abraham Lincoln were mighty men, each in his time. Indra loved the sun, and as man progresses he may know more about the god or gods who invented the sun and set it in, thus far, almost perpetual motion; according to history. Why should a man be worshiped because his soul, mind, has left one material body and gone into a new form of existence? Indra of old time was allowed the credit of having engendered the sun and the dawn. All the remarkable works of Indra were performed by him merely for the benefit of the good, which in the words found in the Rig Veda means the good men who were his followers. He was the lord of the good, and the enemy of those who were his enemies. Indra was also a warlike god and a mighty leader of warlike mankind.

Imagination by writers of lies, fiction has befogged many human minds. Indra at one time was the supreme god of all the gods of the Hindus.

The Rig Veda forms the great literary memorial of the early Aryan settlements in the Punjab. The antiquity of the Rig Veda is abundantly established. It was compiled long before the rise of Buddhism in the 6th century B. C. The Brahmans declare that the Vedic history was directly inspired by a spirit god.

Agni, the god of fire, ranks next to Indra, the youngest of the gods at that time, the chief giver of wealth, invoked as the genial inmate of the Aryan home, and as the bearer of oblations, and mediator between gods and mankind. Agni, the high priest, god, minister of sacrifice, herald, lavisher of wealth. He was a guide to gods. Through Agni mankind obtained wealth, plenty day by day. Agni was the first of the Angiras, the same as Jesus Christ was the first of the Christians, and Mrs. Eddy the first of the Christian Scientists. Agni was a god who driveth grief away. No mortal man, no god exceeded his mental power who sit as gods in heaven. Agni and Indra were partners in their godlike works for mankind. Mankind in ancient times sang praises of them.

Strong gods, mighty minds of the assembly, who aided to defeat the fiends—Indra and Agni sent bliss to mankind.

Let us if we have knowledge, tell the truth about the gods both modern and more ancient.

The burning of widows on their husbands' funeral pile was unknown, and the verses in the Veda which the Brahmans afterwards distorted into a sanction for the practice have the opposite meaning. "Rise, woman," says the text to the mourner; "come to the world of life. Come to us. Thou hast fulfilled thy duties as a wife to thy husband."

Women enjoyed a high position. Marriage was held sacred. Husband and wife were both rulers of the house. Each father of a family was the priest of his own household.

A LETTER TO MRS. CARLYLE PETERSILEA.

My Dear Mrs. Petersilea:—I rejoice to see you have attained the great development of transmitting your dear husband's experiences in spirit life to the people of the world, who stand in such great need of the important knowledge of that kind. I sense what courage and devotion it has required for you to so consecrate yourself in the midst of your overwhelming sorrow! You worked so nobly with him for so many years, and now take up and carry forward the doubled burden with a strong, brave heart that will not let even its own breaking interfere with consecrated duty! A lesson of astonishing and most beautiful devotion to the truth which your great, good husband loved so well that he cheerfully gave up worldly gain and fame to further its best interests! I send you admiring love and pray that you be sustained and fortified in every way you need.

Most affectionately yours,
OLIVIA FREELOVE SHEPARD

Home, Pierce Co., Washington, Feb. 18, 1904.

[Note:—I first met Mr. and Mrs. Petersilea in Los Angeles, at one of those concerts when he played a long program from Beethoven and others, without any notes whatever, as she has written on account of, for him. At the close of the wonderful and delightful program she read a chapter from his writings; it was a description of Sir Isaac Newton's home in spirit life, graphically written through him, by his father. She is a fine reader and it seemed a fitting finish to his wondrous music. She then gave tests, I was a perfect stranger to them bo (had not even been introduced), as I k o was to every person in the room. e gave me nine distinct and well-recognized tests, the most of them accurate descriptions of those who had never been able to manifest to me before, and others who had seldom done so!—O. OUR PREMIUMS.

BEAR IN MIND.

Remember, please, that we send many of our Premium Books by express. If you do not receive your order promptly by mail, inquire at the express office. If not there, notify us at once.

Remember, please that it costs ten cents to get a personal check cashed at a bank in Chicago. If you send a personal check, add ten cents to the amount sent.

Remember, please, that we have only two books which we send out now for 25 cents each. We cannot allow you to select any other book or books in their place.

Remember, please, that you are not entitled to any of these Premium Books unless you send in with your order a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker.

Remember, please, that the safest way to make a remittance is to secure a postal order.

Read our Premium Offer, AND DO NOT WRITE TO US FOR ANY OTHER TERMS. You must send $1 for The Progressive Thinker when you order one or more premium books. Please bear this in mind.

Remember, please, that mistakes and trouble may be avoided by dealing direct with this office, instead of through a news agent.

Every person who sends in a yearly subscription to The Progressive Thinker can have until further notice, the two following books for 25 cents each: "The Religion of Man and Ethics of Science," by Hudson Tuttle, and "Seers of the Ages, or, Spiritualism Past and Present," by Dr. J. M. Peebles. Both exceedingly valuable, and though widely different, each one fills an exceedingly important niche in the literature of Spiritualism.

If you order only one book, and that one neither of the books mentioned above, the price is 50 cents.

If you order two books, and neither of them the above mentioned, the price is 90 cents.

We have TEN Premium Books only, and you can select from them as follows:

Any three of the ten Premium Books you may order, price $1.10.

Any four of the ten Premium Books you may order, price $1.50.

Any five of the ten Premium Books you may order, price $1.80.

Any six of the ten Premium Books you may order, price $2.10.

Any seven of the ten Premium Books you may order, price $2.35.

Any eight of the ten Premium books you may order, price $2.65.

Any nine of the ten Premium Books you may order, price $2.90.

Lastly all of these TEN valuable Premium Books here announced are sent out, all postage prepaid, for $3.10, a price never before equaled in this country or Europe. The following is the list:

TEN REMARKABLE BOOKS FOR $3.10.

1—The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World, Vol. 1.
2—The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World, Vol. 2.
3—The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World, Vol. 3.
4—Art Magic, or Mundane, Sub-Mundane and Super-Mundane Spiritism.
5—Ghost Land, Spiritualism, Occultism.
6—The Next World Interviewed.
7—The Occult Life of Jesus.
8—A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands.
9—The Religion of Man and Ethics of Science.
10—Seers of the Ages, or Spiritualism Past and Present.

Read This Carefully Before Re-Remitting.

When you send in your subscription to The Progressive Thinker, carefully look over the books which you desire in this list, and their price, and send for them. They are very valuable. They are intensely interesting. They are elevating in tone and will do you good. In remitting do not fail to enclose a dollar for The Progressive Thinker.

These ten books, substantially and elegantly bound, and printed in the neatest style of the printer's art, will be furnished to our subscribers for $3.10, a price which modern machinery and enterprise has rendered possible in The Progressive Thinker office only. Sending out these books, however, at the prices we do, does not reduce the price of the subscription of the paper, apparently or otherwise, a single cent, for that cannot be afforded for less than one dollar per year, in view of the fact that we publish such a vast amount of reading matter.

In conclusion, bear in mind that the postage on these ten premium books is about ONE DOLLAR, leaving this office only $2.10, illustrating the great bargain you are getting—a bargain the like of which was never known before on this material plane.

CLUBS! CLUBS! CLUBS! CLUBS!

To Clubs of ten or more we offer the following terms to each one: The Progressive Thinker one year, and ONE of the following books, $1.15: "The Religion of Man and Ethics of Science"; "Seers of the Ages, or Spiritualism Past and Present"; "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands"; "The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World," Vol. 3. The one who gets up the Club will be entitled to the paper one year free, and any two of the books he may select among our list of premiums.

Man and the Spirit World as Disclosed in the Bible." By Rev. Arthur Chambers, Associate of King's College, London. An excellent book for Christian people who would investigate and learn the facts of Bible teachings as well as modern spirit phenomena. Price, cloth, $1.10.

Bible and Church Degrade Woman. By Elizabeth Cady Stanton. Comprises three essays on "The Effect of Woman Suffrage on Questions of Morals and Religion." Price, 10c.

Man the Microcosm. His Infinite and Divine Relations. Intuition—The Light Within. By Giles B. Stebbins. Price, 10 cents.

Father Tom and the Pope, Or a Night at the Vatican. Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "poteen," and an Irish recipe for "conwounding" the same. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

DEITIES OF MYTHOLOGY.

Gods Are Ideal Images—The Word God a Common Noun—Unknown Gods.

In reading ancient history and literature, especially of the Greeks and Romans, we meet with frequent mention of "the gods," by which is meant the gods of mythology, which were imaginary, omnipresent persons, supposed to possess various powers, attributes and influences over humanity. I have a secret suspicion that many modern writers and speakers make use of the word God without understanding it; therefore I want to lay before them names and brief definitions of a few mythological deities. This is important in discussion of the God question.

Apollo—a deity of the Greeks and Romans, worshiped as the sun god.
Aurora—goddess of morning.
Apis—god of industry, worshiped in the form of an ox.
Ate—goddess of revenge.
Annubis—dog-headed god.
Bacchus—god of wine.
Circe—a sea nymph who turned men into swine.
Comus—god of festivals.
Cupid—god of love.
Diana—daughter of Jupiter and virgin moon goddess.
Discordia—goddess of discord, banished from heaven for exciting divisions among the gods.
Echo—a nymph slighted in love, pined away until nothing was left but her voice.
Erebus—an infernal deity, son of Chaos.
Fates—goddesses who presided over human destiny.
Fauns—deities with horns and goat's feet.
Hercules—son of Jupiter, celebrated for strength.
Hymen—god of marriage.
Iris—messenger of Juno, changed into a rainbow.
Jupiter—supreme god of the Romans and father of men and gods.
Juno—sister and wife of Jupiter.
Mars—god of war.
Mercury—son of Jupiter, god of merchants and thieves.
Morpheus—god of sleep and dreams.
Neptune—god of the sea.
Pluto—god of Hades.
Plutus—god of wealth.
Styx—a river in the infernal regions by which the gods swore their most solemn oaths.
Uranus—the most ancient of the gods.
Venus—goddess of grace, love, beauty, pleasure.
Vesta—goddess of flocks and herds.
Vulcan—son of Jupiter and god of fire.

Enlightened God-believers of America should be very careful how they scorn or sneer at the deities and devotees of mythology; for they are all in the same boat—that is, the gods they all believe in are images of imagination. Can Theists of the present time show that their gods are better than the ancients? What is the difference between a dog-headed god and a three-headed god? What is the difference between a devil and a god of wrath, war, vengeance?

At the time the Christian religion was invented, in the reign of the Roman emperor, Constantine, mythology was in its greatest glory; however, the authors and projectors of Christianity did not want "the gods" in their system, because "the gods" caused much confusion and conflict; and they concluded that one god was sufficient and finally settled on Jehovah, the worst and most abominable of all gods—the god of wrath, war, vengeance.

All gods are ideal beings, supposed to possess various attributes, nevertheless, these gods exert a powerful influence over religious devotees, who become like the deities they serve; and this accounts for some nations being of warlike disposition and others peaceable.

All god-believers make their own gods. "There ain't no sich person."

The practice of god-believers writing God with capital G as a proper noun is a fraud and deception; because they wish to convey the idea that they refer to a particular God, presuming readers will not observe the trick. They might as well write man with capital M and claim that it stands for a particular individual, yet not give his name. The word god is a common noun, applied to any and all gods, and spelling it with capital G does not make of it a proper noun, no more than spelling dog with capital D makes it a proper noun. No amount of such usage and custom will ever make god a proper noun, for we cannot tell which god is intended unless the writer indicates the particular god he or she has in mind.

But there can be no valid objection to the use of capitals for proper names of gods, such, for instance, as Jupiter, Allah, Apollo, Baal, Jehovah. Theologians rarely ever write or utter the name of Jehovah; perhaps because of his awful record and bad character—nevertheless, they mean Jehovah by God.

What some folks mean by God is widely different from what other folks mean by God, and so by God we have an endless jargon of theories and beliefs founded on baseless assertions, conflicting statements, antagonistic doctrines, contradictory theories. These antagonists can unite and agree in their condemnation of the Atheist who does not accept any of their theories. He is made a butt for shafts of ridicule.

What do god-believers know of a god they say is unknown and unknowable? What can they teach on a subject which they admit is beyond comprehension? How can they define that which they declare to be undefinable? What do they understand of a god they affirm is incomprehensible? What shall we say of people who persistently make use of words and ideas they do not understand with the assumption and pretense of knowledge? This is the attitude of Theists, caught in the meshes of their own folly.

What do people know who have been taught the theories and dogmas of Theism? They know nothing but error, yet believe much delusive nonsense. Assertions without proof or basis of support are of no value. Belief of a theory or religious doctrine is no evidence of its truth, yet they have a reverence for old established precedent and follow in the beaten track.

"For men are prone to go it blind
Along the calf-paths of the mind,
And try to work from sun to sun
To do what other folks have done."

Twentieth Century Gospel.

He Talks Exceedingly Close to the Lines Marked Out By Spiritualists, and Illustrates the Progressive Spirit of the Age.

Again we turn to one of the most recent departments of science, viz.: Comparative mythology, and we ask, What have you to contribute to the Twentieth Century Gospel? We declare, say the students of this science, that men's ideas and beliefs regarding the Supreme Power in the universe, are always progressive, that in the childhood of the race men had childish modes of viewing nature and childish ways of expressing their ideas. We say that these childish methods of expressing their ideas resulted in the beautiful stories which tell of the person, work and religion of the world's great saviors, which are found in the world's great Bibles. We say that in the growth of these stories men see the unfolding of great moral and religious truth, and the working of these mighty forces which make for righteousness, acting in and upon mankind through the only agencies that were fitted for it in those early days.

This science further tells us the Bible is a literature subject to the same laws which govern the development of other great literatures, having the same defects of ignorance and superstition of errors of judgment and mistakes of copying. It also says that the Hebrew Scriptures stand pre-eminent among all sacred books as illustrating the evolution of morals and religion in the history of the race and embodying in its myths and legends the purest and most enlightened conceptions of religious faith and knowledge that the world has ever known.

CONSTRUCTIVE RESULTS.

If, as it may be, these ideas now come to you for the first time, I can understand a feeling of disappointment arising in your mind when you compare them with the religious teachings you have hitherto entertained. You doubtless feel like the little girl who had a quarrel at school with a little Jewish girl and when she got home she denounced the Jews. Her mother said reprovingly, "My dear, you must not talk in that way. The Jews were God's chosen people. Our Lord Himself was a Jew." After a moment's deep thought the child replied, in a tone of horror and regret: "O, mamma, I didn't know that. I'm so sorry. I always thought he was an Episcopalian."

But think now of the constructive results of this modern Gospel. How much better and nobler it is. It enables us to think of God not as a jealous, fitful, despotic king, something like a tyrannical sovereign of Asia Minor, but rather as the Just Ruler of the earth and the Universal Father of its peoples. It bids us think of the highest and noblest types of manhood and womanhood, not as men cruel by nature, treacherous in thought and revengeful in action, but rather that the right goal of all human action is to do the right for right's sake, to speak the truth for truth's sake, and to love others for love's sake. It gives us a nobler conception of the origin of the universe, shows us that the Divine Power is "closer than hands or feet," and that the true inspiration and joys of life belong now as ever to any or all who seek to know and do the truth. It makes our Christian Bible more beautiful and valuable than ever, because freed from the dogmatic rust which was rapidly destroying its usefulness and purpose. It reveals the essentials of Christianity as taught by its founder to be not creed but character, not uniformity but unity, not dogma but ethics, and behind all else the beautiful spirit of unselfish, undying love as the world's greatest dynamic, both for comfort and inspiration.

PRACTICAL REASON.

At this point there are men who would deny our right to proceed further. They say that all beyond what science tells us is unknown and unknowable, although by a strange contradiction the boundaries of knowledge are every day and everywhere being rapidly extended. I am safe within the bounds of truth in saying that there is everywhere to-day a growing reaction against the purely material conceptions of things which prevail very generally in the world of science only a few years ago.

The discoveries of radium bring us to the very threshold of the spirit world, whilst our investigations into the great mystery of human consciousness are revealing other sources of knowledge as worthy of credence in their various departments as geology and astronomy. One of the greatest sciences of the future will be the science of psychical research. Where science is obliged to halt, man's moral idealism becomes the constructive teacher and guide of morals and religion. There is an intellectual knowledge—a matter of thought; there is an ethical knowledge—a matter of feeling, and each advance brings us nearer to the time when

"That in us which thinks and that which feels
Shall everlastingly be reconciled,
And that which questioneth with that which kneels,"

CONCERNING GOD.

"What then has this Twentieth Century Gospel to tell us concerning God? To know God at all fully—as well might the child hope to grasp the planets in its tiny fingers, or to hold the mighty ocean in the hollow of its hand. But as the world of thought we learn that there is one life, above all, through all and in all, life which is not matter but spirit, and which spirit it calls God, so in the world of feeling our deepest emotion is love. In the world of thought our highest conception of God is that of power, but in the world of feeling our highest thought of divinity is love. We can know God best by loving Him because love is best understood by love. Some people wonder whether God is a person. It seems to me an idle question.

The power other than ourselves, which was here before we came and remains after we depart, this power has brought us into life and is therefore our Creator. By reason of its disciplinary and protecting care of the universal life, it is our Father. No plummet of human reason can sound the depths of the ocean of immensity. But as nothing is ever evolved which has not first been involved, as the greater must also include the less, so the Creator of this personal consciousness must include all of good and right and love and personality that we are, and still be infinitely more than the thing he has produced.

"Thus we can still pray Our Father, knowing that in this Twentieth Century Gospel we are face to face with a divine power or being, whichever name you prefer to use, before whom we may plead the voice of human need and imperfections, whose laws are everywhere and at all times uniform, just and equal and in the stillness of our souls we may often hear the whisperings of His love."

ON IMMORTALITY.

And this brings me to my final thought, viz.: The comfort and inspiration which this Twentieth Century Gospel brings to our conceptions of immortality. Every household has its memories of loved ones, who have passed away into the land of silence. We miss their familiar forms and long for their vanished smiles and the sound of the voice that is still. Is it for them an eternal dark, a sleep that knows no waking, or can we stand by the grave and say, "He is not here but is risen?" We wonder where they are, what interest or relation they have to the life they have left, whether they are as conscious of us as we are mindful of them, whether we shall ever meet again. Some may say "that if it should prove an eternal sleep why then 'tis rest." Some are so mentally constituted that they find it impossible to believe. But very few indeed believe that death is the end of existence. Immortality is as necessary to human life as is the sunlight to the world.

In the presence of such a tragedy as death, when our eyes are wet with weeping, and our hearts are near to breaking, as we stand beside the grave, this Gospel of the twentieth century whispers both sweetly and full of comfort the strong hope of immortality. All life is one. Even science confirms the reality of a general immortality. Through the shadows of our ignorance, faith standing upon reason sees that the grave covers no faculty of soul, only the poor, tired, worn-out body.

Whilst across the wind-swept wastes of thought love points to God, who being ever true in nature, is also true beyond our ken, who having given us a natural confidence in the integrity of things, and made love life's mightiest and sweetest force, will carry through to larger capacities of appreciation and enjoyment the desires he has placed within the human breast. It is not probable that the orchestra will be silenced in the midst of the symphony, or that the building of character will be stopped when only half completed. Everything in our modern knowledge reminds us of the illimitable resources and possibilities which await our growing conceptions. Nature has only yet begun to manifest her resources. How sweet and beautiful are the assurances of the birds and flowers concerning the dear ones, "which we have loved and lost awhile." Whatever we may think nature herself stakes her all upon the truth of immortal life. Everywhere she points her children onwards and upwards to the great light of life, bids them choose the good, and everywhere assures them that He who cares for the birds and flowers, cares also for the lives and loves of men.

And so with every addition to our knowledge we come closer to the great and final generalization which shall open for us the doors to the inner sanctum of the universe. Every new step not founded on misconception leads us nearer to that final understanding which is the ultimate heritage of the race. Already we have visions, born both of faith and knowledge of a world which shall in truth be God's free garden, where love shall reign supreme, where there shall be room for thought and for faith, where from one fane or altar all tongues shall recite one Gospel, sing one psalter and repeat one simple creed,

"Where each sorrow shall have its soothers,
And each need its kindly care,
And all mankind be brothers,
And love reign everywhere.

"Where Heaven's eternal patience,
All human hearts shall win,
And earth's enfranchised nations,
Shall hail God's kingdom in."

SOMEWHAT CRITICAL.

C. F. SHORT, A THINKER AND AND WRITER, EVER WILLING TO IMPART TO OTHERS, EXAMINES SOMEWHAT CRITICALLY THAT CHURCHLY "I BELIEVE" RIGMAROLE, CALLED "THE APOSTLES' CREED."

Why called the Apostles' creed? They never made it, saw it nor taught it, and yet it is recited over and over millions of times, as though it was the all in all, the sum total of all truth. How narrow is the line often between truth and error. Let us now consider the articles of this creed.

The first is, "I believe in Almighty God."

That means my conception, not yours.

What is worshiped is a mental image. Every one has a definition. Whether mine or yours is the correct one, is the question.

Second, "Maker of heaven."

Where is heaven and of what is it made? Is not heaven a soul-condition rather than a locality? Surely so.

Third, "And earth."

Is the earth not an accretion, a growth, a development, a gradual formation, under the operation of natural law and forces? Scientists tell us that matter is uncreated and uncreatable; that it has existed forever, and not something that was made at a certain time.

"I also believe in his son Jesus Christ, begotten by the Holy Ghost."

Does not the New Testament teach us that he was the son of Joseph the carpenter? His sacred genealogy is always traced back through Joseph. All this would be without meaning or sense unless such was the case

"I believe that he was born of the Virgin Mary."

How can this be so, if his mother was Joseph's wife, and Joseph his real father?

"I believe that he was crucified, dead, buried, and descended into hell."

Oh, my! let us hope not!

"I believe that his body was raised from the grave on the third day."

Very few people now believe in the mythical story of a literal resurrection.

"I believe that he ascended up into heaven."

What and where is up? That is very foggy, to say the least of it.

"From whence he will come to judge the living and the dead."

That the Christ spirit will spread over the whole earth, let us hope, but few indeed now believe in a literal personal return in a bodily form.

"I believe in the judgment day."

This supposes a marching up to the judge after the fashion of earthly courts, some sentenced to go down into the deep dark cellar of despair; and others to go up to the sky parlor. This belief has few defenders in this day and age.

"I believe in the holy Catholic church."

Did any apostle ever mention any such church, or a church by such a name? What is a church? It is a body of believers. Where are we told to believe in men. Certainly we cannot believe in all church members. Then all we can say is, "I believe in a portion of the holy Catholic church."

"I believe in the communion of saints."

Do you believe in mediums, in seances, in messages from our friends who have gone before? You know you do not. Then why say, "I believe."

"I believe in the resurrection of the body."

Considering that within the natural body there dwells a spiritual body, that never dies or is buried, how can it be raised up. Millions of bodies have been scattered to the four winds of heaven—never buried at all. How can they come up from where they never were?

"I believe in the forgiveness of sins."

Many there are who doubt that our little words or acts distress and make angry the Deity, and so make it necessary that we appease this anger and beg for forgiveness like naughty children; or if we must obtain it, to get it simply by feeling sorry and asking for it, is too cheap and easy a way, and such a doctrine should not be inculcated.

In conclusion, consider all these things which we say "I believe," which is only proper, if we are sincere.

A BEAUTIFUL SPIRIT.

Mr. Goff was born in Sempronius, Cayuga, county, N. Y., June 26, 1823; he departed this life at the home of M. E. Depuy, near Wakelee, Mich., Feb. 18, 1904, aged 80 years. He was among the Michigan pioneers, and was one of the successful ones who crossed the western plains to California in search of gold, and was perhaps one of the most generous men in Southern Michigan, if not in the state.

By his earnest love of justice and right doing, he has defended many against those who would have taken undue advantage. By this as well as by his liberality in cases of need, he has made many hearts happy, and by his planning and assistance he has helped many to gain comfortable homes that would otherwise have been in poor circumstances, if not homeless.

His gifts were not frivolous, but always practical. At Christmas time it was his custom to present flour, groceries, clothing, etc., in a quiet way that none might know whence the presents came, giving always to such as he deemed worthy and needy. His plan was to help those who tried to help themselves.

It was he who made it possible to establish the State Mediums' Home. This property is located near the center of Lansing, and will be known as the Goff Medium's Home. It cost the state society $4,750 and interest, of which Mr. Goff paid nearly $4,000. The building is 40 by 42 feet, and has thirteen rooms and basement. It is heated by furnace, lighted by gas, and supplied with city water. It is a modern building that cost several times the price paid. The property was lately deeded to the state society, Mr. Goff having canceled the debt, August 26, 1903. The Spiritualists of the state should be able and willing to keep it running for the benefit of worthy and needy mediums.

Mr. Goff has been a Spiritualist for over forty-five years. During all this time he has lived his religion, which means many slights, and much ridicule, but he has lived above it all. He was a subscriber to The Progressive Thinker from its very first. It was through his efforts that Farmer Riley first investigated and sat for development. He has helped many to see the light that is to illumine the world.

Mr. Goff was a member of the Masonic fraternity, and the brethren took charge of the burial services; interment at Fish Lake cemetery, Sunday, Feb. 21, conducted by the writer, (and I wish heartily to thank this society for their liberality in allowing us the use of their church on this and former occasions.) The following poem given by the guides a short time ago was read at the services:

A Tribute to John F. Goff.

Who was it worked in early day,
And by economy laid away
Till he had enough for rainy day?
John F. Goff.

Who was it bought up many a farm,
And helped the owners face the storm,
And proved himself their friend most warm?
John F. Goff.

Who was it went to rocky west,
The famous land that gold had blessed,
And helped himself and helped the rest?
John F. Goff.

Who was it saw the many poor
And helped them oft to meat and flour,
Just at the time, the needy hour?
John F. Goff.

Who was it paid the mortgage due,
For widow and for orphans, too,
And helped them many a winter through?
John F. Goff.

Who was it learned the truth so grand,
That spirit friends from higher strand
Come back to us from spirit land?
John F. Goff.

Having learned the fact, no soul can die,
Who tried to teach the passer-by,
The more of sorrow's tears to dry?
John F. Goff.

Who taught it is not just belief,
That saves the soul from endless grief,
But living right that brings relief?
John F. Goff.

Who tried to aid the cause so grand
And sent it broadcast o'er the land,
By doing good on every hand?
John F. Goff.

And who was given a miser's name,
Because he would not give for shame,
Yet lived above it just the same?
John F. Goff.

Who was it lent a helping hand
For many to gain a home and land?
'Twas this old soul most truly grand,
John F. Goff.

Who was it bought a home one day
Where mediums of the state can stay,
And gave it for their aid? aye, aye!
John F. Goff.

A monument more true and grand,
Than shaft of stone in any land,
This charity from "open hand"
John F. Goff,

Mr. Goff was very mediumistic, and two years ago when having some deal with Mr. R. D. Snyder, he made the remark that he would only be here about two years, and wanted to arrange all business accordingly. The time of the passing was within three days of two years. At another time he said that his father and friends had agreed to come to him and let him know before the very last. He had been quite feeble for a long time, yet able to be around the house and among the friends when weather would permit, until Monday, the 15th. After breakfast he was taken quite suddenly, and went down rapidly until the afternoon of the 18th, when the change came. He said on Tuesday that his father and friends were all with him, signifying that he had received the notice of the coming change as promised. He was conscious till the last, and without a murmur or struggle he seemed to pass gladly on with his friends to that bright home his goodness and kindness had builded in that fair land

Where soul with soul can meet,
Beyond death's open door,
In love most pure and sweet,
Where parting comes no more.

MYTHOLOGY.

The Gods in the Light of Ancient History.

Mythology about the gods was a system used by learned men to befog ignorant minds. Gods were persons. When any other animal was used as a sign of a god, it was used as a sign according to the meaning to at least some of the people, the same as the United States people have their flag and eagle.

All history beyond our own experience can be classed with mythology. Tradition by one person to another person is as reliable as one person writing to the people or to a person and calling it history. After considerable research I am of the opinion that gods were persons. Stars, planets, moon and sun were named for persons, and other animals and things the same as the later stars and planets were named for persons.

The mediumship of the god Indra was very great, and according to evidence he is a powerful spirit person even to our time. Gods came to Daniel of Bible history and God came to Moses, Jeremiah and other persons, according to printed evidence. Indra, in name, was found in Sanskrit and his name probably meant to see, to discover. Indra signifies one who sees or discovers. Gods of ancient times were wise persons, inventors and discoverers of things in nature, and other things useful or evil to mankind.

To affirm without knowledge is not a good mode to promote wisdom.

Indra was a person, a mighty man among mankind, after the same manner that George Washington and Abraham Lincoln were mighty men, each in his time. Indra loved the sun, and as man progresses he may know more about the god or gods who invented the sun and set it in, thus far, almost perpetual motion; according to history. Why should a man be worshiped because his soul, mind, has left one material body and gone into a new form of existence? Indra of old time was allowed the credit of having engendered the sun and the dawn. All the remarkable works of Indra were performed by him merely for the benefit of the good, which in the words found in the Rig Veda means the good men who were his followers. He was the lord of the good, and the enemy of those who were his enemies. Indra was also a warlike god and a mighty leader of warlike mankind.

Imagination by writers of lies, fiction has befogged many human minds. Indra at one time was the supreme god of all the gods of the Hindus.

The Rig Veda forms the great literary memorial of the early Aryan settlements in the Punjab. The antiquity of the Rig Veda is abundantly established. It was compiled long before the rise of Buddhism in the 6th century B. C. The Brahmans declare that the Vedic history was directly inspired by a spirit god.

Agni, the god of fire, ranks next to Indra, the youngest of the gods at that time, the chief giver of wealth, invoked as the genial inmate of the Aryan home, and as the bearer of oblations, and mediator between gods and mankind. Agni, the high priest, god, minister of sacrifice, herald, lavisher of wealth. He was a guide to gods. Through Agni mankind obtained wealth, plenty day by day. Agni was the first of the Angiras, the same as Jesus Christ was the first of the Christians, and Mrs. Eddy the first of the Christian Scientists. Agni was a god who driveth grief away. No mortal man, no god exceeded his mental power who sit as gods in heaven. Agni and Indra were partners in their godlike works for mankind. Mankind in ancient times sang praises of them.

Strong gods, mighty minds of the assembly, who aided to defeat the fiends—Indra and Agni sent bliss to mankind.

Let us if we have knowledge, tell the truth about the gods both modern and more ancient.

The burning of widows on their husbands' funeral pile was unknown, and the verses in the Veda which the Brahmans afterwards distorted into a sanction for the practice have the opposite meaning. "Rise, woman," says the text to the mourner; "come to the world of life. Come to us. Thou hast fulfilled thy duties as a wife to thy husband."

Women enjoyed a high position. Marriage was held sacred. Husband and wife were both rulers of the house. Each father of a family was the priest of his own household.

A LETTER TO MRS. CARLYLE PETERSILEA.

My Dear Mrs. Petersilea:—I rejoice to see you have attained the great development of transmitting your dear husband's experiences in spirit life to the people of the world, who stand in such great need of the important knowledge of that kind. I sense what courage and devotion it has required for you to so consecrate yourself in the midst of your overwhelming sorrow! You worked so nobly with him for so many years, and now take up and carry forward the doubled burden with a strong, brave heart that will not let even its own breaking interfere with consecrated duty! A lesson of astonishing and most beautiful devotion to the truth which your great, good husband loved so well that he cheerfully gave up worldly gain and fame to further its best interests! I send you admiring love and pray that you be sustained and fortified in every way you need.

Most affectionately yours,
OLIVIA FREELOVE SHEPARD
Home, Pierce Co., Washington, Feb. 18, 1904.

[Note:—I first met Mr. and Mrs. Petersilea in Los Angeles, at one of those concerts when he played a long program from Beethoven and others, without any notes whatever, as she has written on account of, for him. At the close of the wonderful and delightful program she read a chapter from his writings; it was a description of Sir Isaac Newton's home in spirit life, graphically written through him, by his father. She is a fine reader and it seemed a fitting finish to his wondrous music. She then gave tests. I was a perfect stranger to them both (had not even been introduced), as I was to every person in the room. He gave me nine distinct and well-recognized tests, the most of them accurate descriptions of those who had never been able to manifest to me before, and others who had seldom done so!—O. F. S.]

10—Seers of the Ages, or Spiritualism Past and Present.

Read This Carefully Before Re-Remitting.

When you send in your subscription to The Progressive Thinker, carefully look over the books which you desire in this list, and their price, and send for them. They are very valuable. They are intensely interesting. They are elevating in tone and will do you good. In remitting do not fail to enclose a dollar for The Progressive Thinker.

These ten books, substantially and elegantly bound, and printed in the neatest style of the printer's art, will be furnished to our subscribers for $3.10, a price which modern machinery and enterprise has rendered possible in The Progressive Thinker office only. Sending out these books, however, at the prices we do, does not reduce the price of the subscription of the paper, apparently or otherwise, a single cent, for that cannot be afforded for less than one dollar per year, in view of the fact that we publish such a vast amount of reading matter.

In conclusion, bear in mind that the postage on these ten premium books is about ONE DOLLAR, leaving this office only $2.10, illustrating the great bargain you are getting—a bargain the like of which was never known before on this material plane.

CLUBS! CLUBS! CLUBS! CLUBS!

To Clubs of ten or more we offer the following terms to each one: The Progressive Thinker one year, and ONE of the following books, $1.15: "The Religion of Man and Ethics of Science"; "Seers of the Ages, or Spiritualism Past and Present"; "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands"; "The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World," Vol. 3. The one who gets up the Club will be entitled to the paper one year free, and any two of the books he may select among our list of premiums.

Man and the Spirit World as Disclosed in the Bible." By Rev. Arthur Chambers, Associate of King's College, London. An excellent book for Christian people who would investigate and learn the facts of Bible teachings as well as modern spirit phenomena. Price, cloth, $1.10.

Catholic Federation and the Public Schools.

The Catholic attack on the common schools has taken a new form. The priestly authorities have found that the public sentiment in favor of a state-sustained system of education in which the denominational religion has no part, is too strong to overcome. Hence the American Federation of Catholic Societies has taken for its object to organize and disseminate Catholic opinions, and the leading "opinion" is to capture funds from the public treasury to sustain parochial schools.

Bishop McFall voices the new scheme, which is most assiduous and though plausible, revolutionary. He said before the Federation meeting lately at Detroit:

"Retain the present public school system, but do not bar Catholics out of their rights as citizens. The Federation has taken an admirable stand on this question. Its platform is, that there shall be no public moneys paid out for religious instruction in any school. But let the state examine our schools, and if on examination it is found that we are giving the children an education which comes up to the requirements of the state, then let the state pay for it."

The government has established the schools, making the educational advantages the best money and experience can procure. It refuses to admit sectarian religion. If any sect is not satisfied it has the right to found schools of its own, and pay for them.

What has so suddenly changed the attitude of the Catholics on the school question? The schools they have declared immoral and degrading are now all right, and "no religious instruction in any school!"

If the parochial schools are to be free from Catholic religious instruction, so free that they are perfectly acceptable to the state school examiners, then they will be just like the present state schools, and not have them under Catholic control.

If this demand of the Catholics be granted, why not allow the Methodists, the Congregationalists, the Jews and all the hundreds of sects into which the religious people are divided, the same privilege? And the Spiritualists and Freethinkers should have their schools, all supported by the common school fund That would be the complete breaking down of the grand scheme of public education which has been the glorious outcome of the combat of centuries between church and state! Let us say, right here and now, that the American people are too wise to be caught by this insidious Jesuitical scheme. The public schools are founded by the people, for the people, and if any sect is not satisfied with them, they must maintain their own systems of instruction.

PSYCHIC PIANO PLAYER PERFORMS—MRS. ELLEN M'ALLISTER-SPENCER GIVES EXHIBITION IN PARLORS OF DR. JOHN D. QUACKENBOS—PROFESSOR HYSLOP LISTENS—AS AN UNBIASED OBSERVER HE ACTS AS MASTER OF CEREMONIES, BUT IS NOT FULLY CONVINCED.

As set forth in the New York Daily Herald of Feb. 17, music lovers and specialists in psychic phenomena gathered the night previous in the parlors of Dr. John D. Quackenbos, professor in Columbia College, Doctor of Medicine, and lecturer on hypnotism, to witness a private performance—the first in New York—of Mrs. Ellen McAllister-Spencer, who is known to her friends as the "psychic piano player."

Mrs. McAllister-Spencer is personally and ancestrally well known in Chicago and other western cities. She is the daughter of the late William King McAllister, for many years senior Judge of the Appellate Court in Illinois. Her home is in Ravenswood, Chicago. According to the story she told me last night her father and mother were both fond of music and wished that she should be taught in her early youth to play the piano.

"I took lessons," she said, "for about three years between the ages of twelve and fifteen, but my teacher gave me up as an impossible subject. In the first place, my hands, as you see," and she held up a plump and diminutive hand, with very short fingers, "are too small for a piano player's. Furthermore, I could never memorize a piece, and I was not the least bit interested in my studies. So my parents had to accept the teacher's verdict."

How She Learned to Play It.

Some twenty years ago the family was living in Waukegan, Ill. Spiritualism was beginning to be talked about there. It was a favorite pastime for young people to sit in a circle around a table with their hands upon its surface and concentrate their attention in the hope of making the table move.

The table never did move in the McAllister family, but a sister of Mrs. Spencer suddenly began to move her hands as if she were playing a piano. It was suggested that she should seat herself at the piano and see what she could do. This experiment also was a failure.

"Suddenly I expressed an ardent wish that I could play," said Mrs. Spencer. "I felt a strange inspiration. My mother told me to try. I sat down at the keyboard, and to the astonishment of everybody, my own especially, my hands flew over the keys in an improvisation. I played on for hours, and everything that I played was as new to everybody as it was to me. I felt that I was impelled by some unseen force within me. Since that time the gift has never left me."

"And how do you account for it?" was asked.

"Personally, I believe that the spirits of masters dead and gone take possession of my mind. For while I do not play anything that is in their works I always play in the style of some famous composer."

Unbiased Observers Present.

The guests had gathered by this time and the performance began. Professor James Hyslop, of Columbia College, was the master of ceremonies. He came simply as an unbiased observer to make up his mind as to the character of Mrs. Spencer's gifts, and if they were supranormal to make a report to the International Psychic Society, of which he is the most prominent New York member.

This was the method employed. Professor Hyslop whispered in Mrs. Spencer's ear the name of some composer whose method she was to follow. She at once dashed into a brilliant performance. Her fingers moved over the keys with a precision and agility that—seemed to bespeak the trained performer.

At the close of every selection the audience was called upon to give its verdict as to the master who had been imitated. In every case the musical critics responded correctly. The list comprised Chopin, Wagner, Beethoven, Mozart, Grieg, Schumann, Gottschalk, Strauss and Stalsmidt.

Then themes for improvisation were suggested, and the following were successfully performed without hesitation: "Evening," "Rain," "Cradle Song," "Death," "Battle," "Dreams," "A Wedding March," "Love," "A Funeral March."

Yet, as Mrs. Spencer avers, she had never, prior to her entrance into this psychic state, been able to memorize, still less to improvise, a single bar.

At the close of the performance Professor Hyslop, while acknowledging that it was a brilliant tour de force, said he would have to reserve any decision as to possible psychic influences until he had had further opportunity to study the pianiste.

"Of course," he said, "from the bare facts before me it is impossible to say whether it is a feat of memory or not. I must hear the lady play many times and subject her to many tests before I can be assured that each selection is really an improvisation of the moment. If she never repeats herself in a long series of performances then it would seem that her gifts are supranormal.

"I would next have to obtain facts as to her ancestry, to learn if her gifts were atavistic. I think from what I have heard to-night, however, that it is likely Mrs. Spencer's mind has a disposition to subliminal activity."

Dr. Quackenbos Convinced.

Dr. Quackenbos, on his part, was entirely convinced that Mrs. Spencer's pneuma or soul is impressed by discarnate or uncarnate spirits, that is, of spirits who have shuffled of this mortal coil or who never had any mortal coil to shuffle off.

He did not, however, believe that these personalities of the past entered into her body and dispossessed the soul, but rather that they acted upon that soul from the outside.

Mrs. McAllister Spencer, the "psychic piano player," has gone back to Chicago. Previous to her departure she gave to the representative of the Herald and to some musical connoisseurs a private seance, in which she once more exhibited her remarkable powers.

The method was that which was followed at the performance given at the recent sitting in Dr. Quackenbos' rooms, The Herald representative whispered to her the name of some famous composer of the past.

She at once started upon an improvisation in the manner of the dead and gone worthy.

The connoisseurs were then asked to guess the name of the master imitated. They never failed to respond.

As to whether her gifts are supra-normal the connoisseurs did not agree. It was thought by some that the problem could be explained on purely natural grounds. Dr. Quackenbos, however, believes that it is quite possible that she is in communication with the spirit world. His statement follows:

Dr. Quackenbos' Statement.

Assuming the facts of Mrs. Spencer's biography to be as represented by her friends, we are compelled to explain her wonderful power as due to some kind of transliminal influence. The lady herself is a spiritist, and believes that she improvises in the styles of dead composers, while under spirit control. By the way of illustration: When the name of Mozart, for instance, is given to her, the spirit of that worthy immediately presents itself, elbows her own pneuma-psyche out of the way, takes possession of her soma or physical body, and flashes out through the medium of her brain and nerve organs musical creations that are unmistakably suorum generum. But it is not necessary to accept a theory so repugnant to reason in explanation of the phenomena. A more satisfactory philosophy is that of simulation by her penuma of the musical personalities it meets and admires in its cosmic environment; an appropriation or borrowing of their transcendent gifts, and a spontaneous utterance of these gifts through bodily functions and organs that are absolutely under her own subpersonal control.

To explain: Every human being exists in two spheres of consciousness, described by psychologists as the objective, supraliminal, or world of waking life, and the subjective or transliminal, the world of sleep, of extra-planetary existence. The better self of the transliminal sphere—the deathless pneuma or "spirit" of the New Testament—exercises control that is practically boundless, within the limitations of possibility and right, over organs of body and faculties of mind, and the whole purpose of hypnotic suggestion is the establishment of such control, either where it has become relaxed or in fields where it has not before been operative. Not only may irregularities in the fulfilment of physical functions be remedied by assumption of the natural psycho-physical control, but all attitudes of the objective mind—its trends of thought, opinions, beliefs, desires, propensities, tendencies, emotions and passions—are controllable and alterable by this higher human personality along lines that are moral and true. For the transliminal self of man per se is that principle in us which dictates what is right and inclines to good—that "spirit" in which or under whose control the Apostle Paul urges men to walk in order that they may neither be condemned by the moral law nor bound by the law ceremonial. And a man will always act in response to that "touch of explosive intensity," as Professor James has designated it; that suggestional force which awakens ethico-spiritual activities in the supraliminal life, and subordinates the lower tendencies of the carnal nature when imparted by a pure-minded suggestionist who is in genuine sympathy with the subject and operates with the courage of his convictions. It happens to be a psychological fact that in a state of sleep, natural or induced, the "touch" described above may be imparted.

Another fact: The thoughts, emotions, beliefs, aspirations and moral status of a suggestionist may be designedly or undesignedly communicated to a subject whose mind becomes mysteriously tuned in unison with that of the operator. As one patient expressed it to me, "Your thoughts become my thoughts."

The time has indeed come, as Maeterlinck predicted it would, when souls may know of each other without the intermediary of the senses. We have within us an immaterial principle entirely independent of sense organs and sense acquisitions. Its pinion is not reconciled to earth. It represents a flight above the temporal and hints of heaven.

Who, then, would venture to deny the possibility of impression by extra-human intelligences? Whence come the beautiful and practical thoughts that possess us as we sleep and clamor for utterance at the moment of our awakening? Granted, during the hours of slumber, symposiums in the transliminal world of spirits having interests in common and free to combine and interpenetrate; granted on such occasions unrestricted access on the part of every soul to the knowledge and experience and impulses and ideals cherished by every other soul in the circle, and thought impression during states of sleep is rationally explained through creative communication. The Gospel teaches the communication of saints, the spiritual fellowship, mystically in and through Jesus Christ, of all believers, dead as well as living, who are united in the Holy Catholic church. But mystical communion does not necessarily imply communication between the living and the dead. The teaching of the New Testament as to the possibility of intercourse between embodied souls and discarnate spirits is negative, but it positively affirms the possibility of transliminal communication between uncarnate spirits and embodied souls. Intelligence not human, ill-wishing and well wishing, would appear to influence man, and the modus impressendi must involve action on a receptive transliminal consciousness.

But whether or not uncarnate daimons communicate through the instrumentality of suggestion, and whether or not disembodied souls reach, via the channel of the related selfs, those of us who are still in the flesh—one fact I regard as established by my experiments (which cover five thousand experiences with hypnotized men and women), viz.: A rational and dignified way is open for such spiritual communication every time we lose ourselves in slumber, for there is no difference as regards suggestibility between natural sleep and the so called hypnotic trance. In the latter, the sleeper is en rapport exclusively with the person who has induced the state; in the former, he may be en rapport with his own objective self, perhaps with a multitude of discarnate personalities who think and feel in common with him, and in case he be of superior parts, possibly with all well wishing daimons.

The Neoplatonic philosopher was right when he proclaimed the night time of the body to be the day time of the soul. The impressing outside personality operates through the double consciousness fused in the human unit, the superior spiritual self being obnoxious to the insinuation of a belief impulse, or thought which may dominate the objective life. Spiritistic communication on this principle implies a plane of meeting infinitely higher than that of the ordinary seance, where soul or daimon are supposed to communicate through the mind of an entranced medium who chatters a confused mass of trivialities and irrelevancies.

It were pleasant to feel that a contingent of our better thoughts is inspired by those whom we have loved, who, when they appear in visions we remember, always appear as living and thinking and acting personalities. Perhaps there is in this latter fact, a suggestion of that immortality which psychic vision and psychic audition incontestably prove in that they illustrate the power of the soul to operate as a discarnate entity, as a spirit disentangled from the flesh.

Why should this soul, freed permanently at the moment of death, cease to project aspirations, communicate ideas, uplift human natures, simply because it is forever done with the perishable body as an instrument of expression? If, then, in the providence of God, disembodied souls are free to do so, assuredly they have open to them a ready way of communicating with us by direct impact in the world of transliminal life. But a pneuma so impressed may or may not see fit to take advantage of its corporeal investure (as our inspired mimic seems to have done) for the transmission to incarnate beings of knowledge, power, genius, forecasts derived, in the sphere of transliminal consciousness, from uncarnates or discarnates.

This explanation of Mrs. Spencer's performance is psychological, in that it accords with the known laws of thought in operation on this earth. It is rational, in that it is consistent with an exalted conception of the state of the departed. It is dignified, because it makes neither a fool nor a tool of the human personality concerned. And, in view of the negative position of the New Testament regarding the possibility of cosmic communication with discarnate souls, it is not inharmonious with Christian belief.

Mrs. Spencer herself believes that she is under spirit influence. She has been told and she half believes that she is under the control of Mozart's disembodied essence. Dr. Quackenbos, as will be seen from the above, holds that the spirits act from the outside upon her transliminal self. She is inclined to think that Mozart's soul takes actual possession of her bodily self, leaving her a passive agent while under this spiritual control.

Mrs. Spencer is the daughter of a hard-headed, shrewd and logical justice of the Supreme Court of Illinois, the late Judge McAllister, who presided over some of the most famous criminal trials of recent days.

"My father," she told me, "had no belief in Spiritualism until he was forced to acquiesce in the evidence given to him in his own family circle.

"After I had developed this strange gift of improvisation at the piano my sister one day expressed a wish to play upon the harp. She had never played upon a harp in her life. My father procured this hitherto unknown instrument, gave it to her, and she straightway began to play upon it as if she had been familiar with its use for years. She and I often sit together and play duets, she using the harp and I playing upon the piano. Such is the accord between us that we improvise pieces the moment we sit down together without any previous understanding between us."

Mrs. Spencer was asked whether her peculiar powers extended beyond the musical sphere. She answered in the affirmative.

"One day," she said, "I felt moved by some unseen influence within myself to mimic some personality unknown to me. When I had finished, my brother, who was present, told me that I had given an exact production of the tone and manner of a friend of his—a civil engineer—who had recently died. I even repeated the exact words he had uttered on his deathbed, 'Oh, let me go! Let me go! I have had enough of earth.' My brother had never told me anything about his friend."

Returning to the subject of her musical improvisations Mrs. Spencer said that she could always respond to any demand made upon her. She is especially fond of playing in the morning before she sets to her daily task or in the evening when she is free. But occasionally, during the day, when engaged upon her household duties, she feels a call so imperative that she has to drop everything in order to rush to the piano and deliver the message that has come to her from the unknown.

The case is one in which experts like Professor Hyslop, of Columbia College, are devoting serious attention. Professor Hyslop does not feel that he has sufficient data at hand to reach any positive conclusion, but when he has had further opportunities to study Mrs. Spencer he will embody his investigations in a report to the Psychic Society, of which he and Dr. Quackenbos are members.

For Sick Mediums

Mr. Charles Bolton, of Nauvoo, Ill., contributes $10.00 to assist in taking care of sick and disabled mediums. How much have you contributed? Send on your contributions to Mrs. M. T. Longley, Secretary N. S. A., 600 Pa. Ave., S. E., Washington, D. C. Every self-sustaining medium in this broad land, every society that meets on Sunday, and every Spiritualist who is actuated by humanitarian feelings, should first read Mrs. Longley's appeal, and then contribute something to aid in this great work.

The "Spiritual Death" of Babies.

The Rev. W. Ashmore, in the Chicago Standard, said that "death reigns over everybody that ever lived." When asked to explain, he said:

"1. Because, as a matter of fact, death has reigned over everybody that ever lived, and does reign. This bare fact would be sufficient to establish the affirmation without a single word further.

"2. Because a father who is himself sinful can not possibly beget a sinless child. Therefore the infant never had any spiritual life to begin with. If he is not spiritually alive, then he must be spiritually dead. There is no intermediate state.

"3. The entire teaching of the Bible proceeds on the assumption that everybody is lost, which is another way of saying that everybody is dead; that everybody needs a Savior; and that everybody needs to be quickened in order to have eternal life."

Now the horrible doctrine of "infant damnation," or absolute death of babies, dying too young to "believe" on Jesus Christ, or anything else, has not vital interest to Spiritualists who have outgrown the dogma. The subject is introduced as evidence of how hard such damnable beliefs, which cast a blighting shadow over life and are a libel on the goodness and justice of the Supreme, die out of the minds of theologians.

Are we not glad that as Spiritualists, knowing the purposes of life and its progressive unfoldment, free from the interference of the arbitrary Mumbo Jumbo which disturbs the reason of theologians, we can smile at such speculations as the nightmare dreams, or the spectres of delirious fevers?

LOOKING BACKWARD.

Changed Positions on Materialism and Spiritualism.

In looking over an old scrap-book I find "A Reply by me to W. F. Jamieson," dated March 31, 1871—a third of a century ago—clipped from the Boston Investigator. The letter was in response to a challenge from Mr. Jamieson "to all infidels, and to B. F. Underwood in particular" to discuss propositions respecting Modern Spiritualism. I was about to leave for the Pacific coast to meet appointments extending over several months and therefore was obliged to decline this challenge for a discussion then, expressing willingness, however, to meet Mr. Jamieson after my return from California, at the same time saying, "I have not sought controversy with Spiritualists, but on the contrary have endeavored to secure their co-operation in the great work of freeing the world from the thralldom of the Christian superstition."

In later years I met Mr. Jamieson personally, twice I believe, and had some pleasant correspondence with him, but nothing more was said about a debate. Indeed his views had undergone a marked change and there was probably nothing between us worth while discussing. Mr. Jamieson had outgrown his belief in Spiritualism and had become quite pronounced in his materialism and, I believe, he still holds to this system.

My acceptance of materialism became more and more qualified until I completely discarded it as an inadequate explanation of phenomena, and although the label was for a long time still attached to my thought, I disavowed materialism and wrote against it during the years I was editor of the Boston Index—from 1881 to 1887—and earlier and subsequently during my connection with the Open Court and the Religio-Philosophical Journal. The study of psychology satisfied me that materialism has no standing in the court of philosophy, that what we call matter is not an ultimate, or something per se, but the phenomenal manifestation of an underlying reality known to us only as states of consciousness. I saw that that only of which we have direct and indubitable knowledge is mind or spirit and not matter, and from that point of view I have continued my investigations for more than a quarter of a century.

While Mr. Jamieson has been repelled from Spiritualism, I have been attracted to it and forced to accept its essential principles both by the study of philosophy and by careful and long continued examination of supernormal phenomena according to the rigid scientific method.

My conviction of man's survival of death (so-called) is so strong that it would not be shaken if I stood alone on this point; for the certainty which I feel is not the result of tradition, longing or authority, but of personal examination and experience, with verification, which no amount of outside testimony could affect. I would probably go as far as Mr. Jamieson in putting aside as unevidential much which is claimed as the direct work of invisible intelligences, but the falsity of ignorant pretension and the fraud of charlatanry should not be permitted to obscure the validity and value of such facts and phenomena as can neither be denied nor ignored by the investigator who pursues the subject for years as Crookes, Myers, Lodge and Hodgson have, not to disparage earlier and less systematic investigators.

In the light of my present knowledge, if I had my work, as a Liberal lecturer, to do over again, I would put emphasis upon the future life, to which the present is but a preparatory stage of being. I used to lecture on "The Pros and Cons of a Future Life," giving the arguments for, and the objections to the doctrine, allowing my hearers to draw their own conclusions. With my present knowledge and my present convictions I should have been able to fortify and strengthen the faltering faith of many in what I believe to be an important and helpful view of man's destiny, with no less, but even more success in battling against absurd and revolting dogmas.

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

Martin Luther and Smoot.

Smoot may be all that his church opponents say that he is, but where is the consistency of holding him up to obloquy, and setting up Martin Luther as a model of excellence and paragon of virtue? Luther is the head of a great church and almost worshiped by its members, who idealize him without knowing anything about the real man. Catholicism was sensual enough out of which Martin Luther came, but if his character and writings were refinement on the Catholic grossness, imagination would fail in description. Were the filthy utterances of this "reformed priest," to be more than hinted at, a clear case of "obscene literature" publication could be made out. From a celibate monk, he became a libidinous polygamist and proclaimed it as Scriptural. When a young convert married two wives he wrote Chancellor Bruck, "I indeed acknowledge that I cannot forbid it when one marries many wives, for it does not contradict the Scriptures." (DeWitte, p. 459.)

To the pure and saintly Melancthon, Luther wrote: "I have already had three wives at the same time whom I loved intensely. Two I have lost, are now attached to other bridegrooms. The third one whom I now scarcely hold in my left arm, may leave me at any time." (Ib p.2, 648.)

Not only did he assert polygamy to be right, but he struck at man's free will in resisting tendency for evil, and thereby has given excuse for the cowardly and unmanly. He taught that no man has a free will, that chastity is a delusion and impossibility, and the natural aim is gratification which should be unimpeded.

To remove any objections which might arise from the ten commandments he said (DeWitte, 4188), "We must remove the decalogue out of sight and heart." "If Moses should attempt to intimidate you with his stupid ten commandments, tell him outright, 'Chase yourself to the Jews.'"

Luther had courage, the obstinate courage of the brute. When his friends sought to dissuade him from boarding his enemies at Worms, thinking it certain death for him to do so, he said, "I'll go if there are as many devils as there are tiles on the roofs of the houses." A less virile will might not have carried the reformation. And it would seem that all religions in their beginnings rely on erotic passion, rather than moral purity.

THE MAGICIAN KELLAR,

And His Expose of Mediums at Cassadaga.

"Seen and Heard" is a magazinelet, aping the "Philistine," in appearance, and attempting the same crude witticism. The difference is that between pop fresh drawn, and pop a week after the cork is blown out. Among its choice tid-bits, is a laudation of Kellar, or rather that notorious performer of tricks fills the editorial ear with whatever he thought would be good advertising material. Kellar says he was before the Seybert Commission and surprised the members more than had the performance of any person who claimed to operate by "spirit power." As that commission held its sessions to show "how not to do it, it is not surprising that Kellar pleased, though it is difficult to understand the relation a professional mountebank has to Spiritualism. Slade, Maud Lord, Margaretta Fox and other mediums were there, and the committee do not even claim that they detected them in fraud.

But Kellar's great triumph was at the great camp-meeting at Cassadaga Lake in 1895. He "denounced the whole business as a fraud and was publicly challenged to explain the manifestations."

In his words: "Spiritualists were thicker than bees in a hive at the lake, and the Cassadaga propaganda was the talk upon all tongues. It was nothing more or less than a regular cabinet sitting with all the familiar tests, except that the conditions surrounding the cabinet were such as to apparently preclude the possibility of any human being entering it or being concealed in it. A huge sheet of plate glass was first placed upon a number of trestles to form a platform. Then an ordinary cabinet was built up, piece by piece, upon the glass floor, the curtains were drawn, and Cagliostro did the rest."

But that was nothing to the doll-house of a cabinet Kellar followed with.

He continues: "Within a week he was ready to show Mr. Medium a trick worth two of his. He made two little trestles about two feet wide, and across these placed a piece of window glass about two and a half feet long. Then he proceeded to construct a cabinet on the glass. He put it together piece by piece, and when it was completed, it was about as large as a little girl's doll house. They were stumped at the very outset by the extreme smallness of the tiny cabinet."

Thus prepared he proceeded to give all the manifestations, to the wonderment and confusion of the Spiritualists who were completely "stumped."

We have no doubt that Kellar is giving fresh news and the magazinelet is printing matter never before circulated. It is presumable that of the tens of thousands of visitors at the camp grounds, not one remembers the coming of the great Kellar, or the "stumping" of the mediums. A public challenge and its acceptance, the building of such a cabinet on a huge sheet of glass, or making a display from a cabinet no larger than a "doll-house," surely would have attracted attention, and some hint of it would have been given in the newspapers at the time. Yet there has never been a mention of this greatest of fakirs having visited that camp!

The charge is so libelous, and damaging on account of its source, that it should be met with the strongest evidence procurable. Hence, I wrote to Hon. A. Gaston, for many years president of the Cassadaga Association, at present Representative in Congress and a man whose word is as good as his bond. The duties of his office required his presence and personal attention.

His reply has no "equivocal" sound, although he does not give the name to those who deal in such stories:

"Meadville, Pa., Feb. 21, 1904.

"My Dear Mr. Tuttle:—

"So far as I know Kellar, the magician, was never on the grounds at Cassadaga. Had he been there openly and in his own name, it would have created a sensation and I would certainly have heard of it and sought him out. As to any such public demonstration it never took place, nor anything upon which to base such a statement. I cannot understand why Kellar needs to lie, for he draws good audiences on his own merits. The secretary, A. E. Gaston, who was on the grounds every day during that season, joins me in this statement, and if more evidence is needed the testimony of the trustees and every visitor on the grounds through that season might be taken. I am respectfully,

"A. GASTON."

It is expecting too much of "poor human nature," that editors of magazines publishing such false statements will make honorable amend by admitting their refutation. The attack by falsehood has been made continuously for fifty years on Spiritualism, and if in a single instance, the cowards who have dealt the blows have ever acknowledged their errors, the miracle has not come to my attention.

If Kellar was not at Cassadaga, as he claims, if he was not challenged to "explain the manifestations," of what value is the other portion of the story? Kellar in the role of a medium is a fake, and his tricks have no more relation to the genuine phenomena, than a bogus coin has to the United States mint.

HUDSON TUTTLE, Editor-at-Large N. S. A.

IMPORTANT TO SPIRITUALISTS.

A Move in the Right Direction.

To the Editor:—A meeting was held on Monday evening, Feb. 15, at 77 31st street, of three delegates from each Spiritualist society in Chicago. Dr. G. B. Warne was in the chair. The object of the meeting was to form an organization for the protection of societies and mediums, and to obtain recognition by the press of Chicago; also for the upbuilding of the cause in the city. Committees were appointed to meet a week later, on the West Side, and on Tuesday evening, Feb. 23, the following societies were represented: Illinois State Association, Psychic Force Society, Hyde Park Occult Society, Universal Occult Society, Rising Sun Mission, Students of Nature Society, Progressive Spiritualist Society, Research Society.

Resolutions were adopted and committees appointed to draft the by-laws and charter. The name adopted for the organization was, "The Chicago Spiritualists' League." The next meeting will be held on Monday evening, March 7, at the home of Sister Hilbert, on the North Side.

How to Overcome the Malign Influence of the Planets and People. = A Discourse = Through Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond. Chicago, January 24th, 1904.

"Canst thou bind the sweet influences of the Pleiades or loose the bands of Orion?"

Many people in modern times are seriously affected mentally about thwarting the baleful influences of the planets. Numerous other people are seriously occupied in endeavoring to thwart the evil influences of people. Proving, as we have always said that humanity is very anxious to have a scape-goat. If anything harmful or painful occurs, there is a great desire to blame something or somebody.

Now astrology, even as taught in modern times has gained quite a hold on the thought of the day. Ancient astrology was a mixture of astronomy and psychical science. It was astronomy spiritualized. All science in those days, (the days of the Magians and of the secret orders) was held as sacred. Even mathematics was known only to the few the perfect mathematical symbol of the six-pointed star was held in the sacred orders and temples because the masses had no apprehension of its meaning, and the different points were named after sacred names and numbers in order to protect both the mathematical instruments and the mathematicians from invasion. These were in caves, laboratories, convents or wherever the learned men, apart from the world, could experiment and also worship God.

SEPARATION OF SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

There came a time when science and religion were separated; when the material philosophy and facts took possession of what had formerly been known only to the recluse and adept; the crucibles of alchemy were changed to those of chemistry, and there were no longer the mysterious incantations, nor anything occult connected with chemistry. The same is true with the astronomical tables. Yet we have every reason to believe that the ancient Egyptians understood astronomy as we understand it. The astronomes, the tables, the inscriptions, the mathematical structures all convey this thought. We also have every reason to believe that Babylon not only held the full measure of all astronomical, mathematical and chemical science, but everything that is known to the world to-day; that ancient "Babylon" that the children of Israel were told to shun, whose learning has only descended to us through Phenicia and Greece, or through the sacred order of Freemasonry.

SCIENCE AND INSPIRATION.

To-day many people are making blundering searchings for the "occult" and "mysterious" among these things that are partly told as science and partly as inspiration. Intuition or inspiration is largely manifest in modern astrology, but it bears very little resemblance to ancient astrology in this: that its subjects and teachers are rarely sufficiently inspired. Inspiration preceded the letter in those days. When Memnon struck the note of language it was not from external, but from intuitional sources. When Cadmus journeyed into Egypt and returned to Greece with other letters of the language, his was also from the sages and inspired sources. To-day people take their learning as they take their medicine: by prescription, and usually it is just about as hard to take. Of course it very often degenerates into the feet instead of taking possession of the brain. Perhaps it does not do the feet any harm. The truth is that to-day learning is supposed to be something acquired from without, instead of something born from within.

Observation is not merely external. The telescope is not an external instrument; it was fashioned because of the necessity of thought of spirit. When Herschell saw the planet mentally that no one else could see, the teleseope had to be invented and builded that would make other people see it. No spiritual telscopes have been built as yet to make people see the heavens other than the stars, but science is climbing that way. "Psychic Research" has told you of the necessity of having the telescope, but has not offered to build it. Behind all this modern thought lurks the psychical fact, that it is time for a new out-pouring of knowledge, a new revelation of spiritual mysteries, a new unfolding, an unlocking of the secret store-house of knowledge.

Oh the man that could say, "Canst thou bind the sweet influence of the Pleiades, or loose the bands of Orion?" did not have to go to Cambridge to learn his astronomy. He knew what he was talking about.

Old as Egypt is the knowledge that somewhere, if not Alcyone, some other sun is a greater center around which, not only this solar system, but others, probably twelve in number, move, and all moving around other suns or centers, and of the great deflections that cause the precession of the equinoxes, that brings you, now at this time of the year in Aquarius, and that where there is a perihelion or aphelion with reference to other centers it affects the movement of your planet and your solar system just to that degree. The truth is, there is no world, no planet, no system that is not affected by all other worlds, planets or systems.

When sometime in the past history of the unfolding of your solar system from the great cosmic circle there was a planet, or should have been where the asteroids are now found, probably the pressure from without of new-born worlds and the pressure from within of the new planet Mars made the struggle that split into fragments that circle so it never became a planet between Mars and Jupiter; between Jupiter and Saturn this was a great period of stress and strain in the formative process of the worlds or planets of your solar system. We cannot show you how as separate planets they unfolded one after another from the great central circle, how systems are thus evolved in their turn and solar centers are formed; but every one must admit, who understands anything of the law of what is in modern times called "vibratory action," or whatever law it is that pulsates into light, that pulsates into motion, that pulsates into electricity, into every force that you recognize, that law primarily affects, pervades and wields all substance, and that no world can be blotted out, no smallest satellite could disappear without its pulsations not only affecting all within that solar system, but in distant solar systems. You drop a pebble in a lake, however small it may be, and the undulations will go on and on until they reach the sands upon the shore. How far the effect passes you do not know. But a great shock to another planet or solar system would inevitably produce a shock to all the planets of the solar system and to all co-related systems. If it were merely a dynamical shock it would be great; if it were electric or magnetic it would be still more subtle and of interest to determinate. But whatever force it is that connects these planets one with the other, one cannot be disturbed or affected without disturbing all.

It is unquestionably true that your solar system is held together by a mutual set of certain balances: the great centripetal and centrifugal, and the magnetic and electric balances proceeding from the great center and having its counter-balance in what is called space, which must hold all systems together. So by and by when you cease to utilize all discoveries as instruments of destruction some Edison will arise who will be able to tell you the exact pulse-beat of every planet, and measurably the throbbings of the great heart of the sun, and tell you what is going on there that makes your winters colder or warmer, and your earth fluctuate in its atmospheric conditions and the hidden fires come forth when there is a great cyclic change.

When the earth has passed a certain period in the great or larger cycle that the solar system enters into, there are new belts or new ethers into which it enters, new conditions. You will note that from the year 1881, or thereabout, there have been periods of sunset splendor and wonderful coloring of tints and tones unnoted before, except occasionally may have noticed also, after the eruption of the volcanoes on the distant islands of the sea the sun's rays, even though the sun shone, had less power, and all that summer you complained of its being a cold summer. The sunshine had been intercepted by the volcanic dust.

Sometimes there is cosmic dust, sometimes there is cosmic clearness. We can talk for hours on this subject, days, weeks and months would be inadequate to exhaust it. That which is known, or even hinted at in existing scientific speculation or actual knowledge, is very little. But from things known people usually reason to things unknown very incorrectly. The unknown must precede the known or you cannot reason correctly. It is because the unknown precedes the known in the mind of the discoverer or the inventor that the world knows anything.

For instance, you cannot observe natural phenomena intelligently unless you know how to observe them. In the first experiments of electricity one of the learned professors in that branch of study was giving an eminent author an exhibition and the author said, "What am I to expect to witness?" That was precisely the intelligent man's question. He wanted to have his mind prepared to observe. Many people may see things and never see that which is passing before them. The eye is not the vision, the thoughts must be occupied with that which is seen.

The intelligent observer is the only qualified observer. We do not necessarily mean by this the scientific observer, for he is frequently very bigoted, he is bigoted by what he knows or thinks he knows. The intelligent observer has some idea of what he is going to see, or what he is going to observe. In all psychic phenomena, in all spirit manifestations this has been the great difficulty: the lack of intelligence in the observer. People go to witness these manifestations prepared by prejudice instead of by intelligence, hence they are not correct observers. But in the phenomena of nature, in the ordinary manifestation of what is called the rising and setting of the sun, your senses are fallacious: you do not see the sun rise at all, you do not see it set. It is only in the mind that you know that the earth moves and causes the phenomena of sunrise and sunset.

In the vast inter-communion and inter-sympathy between planets, between the sun and its corelated planets, and between systems, there must be entirely a dependence on intelligent methods, and the methods must be largely intuitive, methods which can never become "scientific" until first intuitive. Herschell's intuitions were alert for certain mathematical ratios in the distances of planets. That is the way he discovered the one which for a time was called by his name. All this preparation to the real man of science, the real inventor, the real discoverer is known to come from within. Edison makes no claim of discovery by external observation. He knows, and he says that he knows, that these things come to him from an inner and higher source. He experiments, not to make them true, but to utilize them.

If your earth, as a planet, is exactly corelated in a certain portion of its expression first to Mercury and Venus, then to Mars and the outer circle of planets beyond, then there is nothing to do or to be gained excepting to know how to adjust your material affairs to the adjudication of the planets. The mariner does not change the position of the North Star nor does he change the North Pole by navigating the sea, but his compass tells him the direction, and with his chart he is able to be guided. Man does not form the waves by sailing upon them; man does not control the electric currents of the earth by placing himself in sympathy and harmony with them. He who handles the lightning must beware, unless he knows the laws that regulate them. He who handles the X-ray must understand under what circumstances and conditions it is destructive as well as potent.

PRESERVING AND DESTRUCTIVE FORCES.

The truth is, that when an inventor or discoverer perceives a principle, reveals a new power, a new force or a new manifestation of force, straightway it is seized upon by commerce without an adequate study of its preserving and destructive forces. In this the ancients were wise; they kept the new processes secret until they were understood in all beneficent and harmful methods. Every force of nature that is sufficiently powerful to move hundreds tons of weight is sufficiently powerful to be equally destructive. That which can move a ship can destroy it; that which can light this building can destroy it; that which can move a steam engine to wonderful accomplishments alike can destroy it. But people are so eager for the commercial benefits to be derived from these discoveries that they do not study the opposite. There was some method in the Hindoo custom of worshiping Siva the god of destruction, because the Hindoos thought that then they would be saved from his wrath. Vishnu, the preserver, did not need to be worshiped, and Brahm the great eternal "Good" did not require worship. But Siva could destroy, "let us worship him." That is the reason the Orientals worshiped the dreamer in the laboratory, the recluse that learned the art of controlling the destructive forces of nature.

When commerce can rest a little while, when it is compelled to rest by the action of its own destructive energy, people will have time to study these "baleful influences," as they call them, and adapt themselves thereunto. Sailing with the wind and tide is not always practicable, but sailing against the wind and tide is only practicable with a force that is superior to the wind and tide or by compromise. Therefore, if you would cause these destructive bolts to cease, these destructive fires to be used only as agents of life, you must have as much control over their destructive force as over their ability to help you. You must understand both sides of the proposition.

There is no planet in the solar system or in the universe that is intent on doing the earth any harm. There are planets that sometimes intercept the rays of light from the sun when the planets are in conjunction or in apposition, so there are different vibratory actions than when they are in position; when in perihelion they have a certain influence, and in aphelion another influence. But the intuitive study of this subject is so remote from present human understanding that you cannot even observe the planets intelligently. The man that will use the X-rays for commerce before he knows its destructive as well as its useful force is an enemy to the human race. A man that will use it at all until he knows its destructive energy and potentiality is an enemy to the human race.

It is not enlightenment to press forward and take possession of these treasures of nature until you are prepared to adapt yourselves to both sides, the useful and the destructive sides. Therefore, radium, the most potential stored energy of light thus far discovered, fortunately is so rare that it can be little used. But when it becomes the possession of the race, look out! For radium, an energy that can last without destroying itself is an energy almost akin to the power of destruction itself, which seems to be a postulate from eternity, that which gives, without exhaustion, forever.

THE SOUL A SPIRITUAL POSTULATE.

The soul is the spiritual postulate that resembles this new substance. Where you have so much light, there is also energy. We have told you that in the present century the sunshine will yet light your buildings at night and warm them in the winter. You will turn on the sunshine as you now do electricity. It may also prove that you will have an agency of equally destructive power.

People cannot ward off the influences of planets by knowing that under certain conditions the earth is subject to those influences, as you call them, that are due to the presence or withdrawal of the sun's rays. There are certain sympathetic currents that flow toward the earth when they are present that produce a certain effect, and when they are withdrawn that produces another effect.

People who are related to the earth exclusively in their physical and mental conditions are subject to planetary influences that affect the earth. If you are either largely magnetic or largely electric you will be affected by such influences as magnetically and electrically affect the earth. Thunderstorms will affect you; rarefied atmospheres will affect you, or dense atmospheres, according to your physical conditions as regards the earth.

Human bodies are adjusted to the earth in relation to their temperament, or polarity, for they are magnetic or electric just as substances are. If you know this, you can understand your conditions and you may adapt yourselves to them. If you are too electric you can remove yourself from the substances that generate too much electricity. If you are too magnetic you can, also, apply that rule. But you cannot do this without intelligence. If thunderstorms affect you, insulate yourself (just as you do the electric wire, when you want to send a message correctly), so that you do not take on any more electricity. If you are too electric, adapt yourself to the natural electric currents of the earth and make your bed so that you sleep with your head to the North, that the currents of electricity in your body may flow in accordance with the natural passing of the currents of electricity on this portion of the earth.

All this requires knowledge. If one is determined to live wholly in the body, she or he can occupy himself or herself constantly studying these influences and adapting himself or herself to them, by wearing clothes that are either electric or non-electric, and live by living in habitations constructed properly to be either electric or non-electric. As you must live in houses, you might have them adapted to you; you may have less dark corners for dust and cobweb collectors. It would seem that whole generations of people seek for microbes. You may understand that microbes do not like the light. They can be destroyed very rapidly in the light and before they can do you any harm. More sunshine is like more intelligence.

THE EGO GREATER THAN ITS SURROUNDINGS.

When you are born, according to modern astrology, under certain planets (that is if certain planets are in the ascendant at the time of your birth), such and such will be the results. But this depends upon something else. Now there are many, hundreds, possibly more, human beings born at exactly the same minute every day, who are not equally affected either by atmospheric or planetary conditions, because they are not born in the same spiritual state or conditions, they have not the same temperament, they have not the same purpose in life. If people were just things and nothing else, if they were plants or bugs there might be exact earth conditions, there might be an exact explanation by these planetary conditions. But people are as different as their spirits are different. They come into possession of the physical form under certain a priori conditions but their state of coming modifies those conditions.

If the earth was governed by planets alone there would be no human beings here. You come here as you would take a ship because it is going where you want to go; it is doing the thing that you want to do; it is doing the kinds of things you want to do, and you who arrive and understand that you have arrived are not affected by all these planetary conditions. The Ego is, of course, greater than its surroundings. The daily expression of human beings proves all the while that they are upsetting these theories by doing exactly the things that the astrologers tell them they cannot do. An astrologer may tell you that you must not go out at such a time, as it would be very bad for you, that you would meet with an accident or something, for such or such a planet will be in the ascendant; but if you are intent on going out you will go, and nothing happens, though the planet goes on exercising its influence just the same.

The influence of the planet is not as great as the influence of the human spirit. People who live more in the intellectual or spiritual realm are, therefore, not as subject to physical, electrical, solar and planetary conditions as people who care a great deal about the weather and other merely temporal things. Some people like all kinds of weather; some people are very much depressed under certain meteorological conditions while others are uplifted under those conditions. Now, the more people are dominated by and live in the physical environments and the natural influences of the planets over the earth, the more will they be affected by what is called "planetary influences." But the spiritual line of destiny is what the real astrologer largely consults.

Now the immediate Nemesis of the earth is spiritual, and in a planetary sense is Mars. That immediate Nemesis applies to all things that relate to certain intellectual and moral conditions of the earth and their physical belongings. So if you begin with the interior analysis instead of the exterior, you will find where there are reactions from excessive aggression and acquisitions and prosperity and all these conditions that belong to the earth, they are the reaction from a false height mentally or morally, and are the immediate results of the psychical influence of the planet Mars, and, therefore, cannot in any way be evaded or avoided, because if the earth or any portion of its inhabitants are in a condition to be thus pressed or urged forward to pursue mere material things the inevitable reaction will come.

You know by the law of dynamics, or the law of force, that a certain amount of pressure in a certain direction will inevitably be followed by reaction, because it is out of the normal condition and cannot always be maintained. So these violent reactions from prosperity to poverty; from a certain state which seems like material or intellectual exaltation unto the opposite, are not the result of physical influences alone, but are the result of the natural moral reaction. The nemesis being in the inter-planetary spiritual sphere, which means the spiritual intelligences of Mars.

AN AVENGING MORAL FORCE.

There is not any great moral force in the universe avenging itself on man. There is a moral force in man avenging itself on him. There is a moral force outside of man that takes cognizance of all these conditions, and, by the inevitable result of sympathy between these states the consciousness of the inhabitants of the planet Mars must be aware and must assist in all of these influences that will be helpful to the human race.

"Go into the slums and clear them out," some voice says.

"Yes, but you will have to destroy everybody there before you do. There will have to be certain provisions made for those who live there."

"But go into the slums," says a voice, "and let in the sunshine."

The Rev. Dr. Van Meter in New York; Jane Addams in Chicago, and some one at the "Seven Dials" in London, let in the light and let pacilla out. Sometimes from Mars, not from the twinkling planet itself, not from its belt magnetic, electric or ethereal that may have influence over the physical state of Earth; but from its flashing thoughts, from its inhabitants that are wise, some one sends a voice, "Let in the light!"

"But it upsets our plans, our institutions, our business!" cries the worldling. But the voice keeps on and the light is let in. The only way not to be thus affected by Mars is not to be in the state where the light is needed. But you cannot find that light except by growth, and no one is to blame for lack of growth. You cannot have an astrologer prepare a statement or chart that will help you one particle. It will be growth from within. Neither does the wonderful orb Jupiter or that more perfect planet Saturn, which is said to exercise a "baleful" influence, have any effect upon human beings except where their influence is needed. And when the spiritual light and force is considered, angels and archangels are the messengers that bear from world to world and planet to planet the great thought that is to set people free from physical thralldom.

The malign planetary influences of the planets that you can know anything about really cannot harm you. The people that are affected by the physical influences of the planets are the same that would be affected by the changes of the seasons or the weather; or those whom you crowd into the gorges between the hills because they labor for their daily bread, and have them swept out from human life by the destruction of a flood.

There are many people who want to be released from the "malign influence" of people; we mean spiritual people as well as those of the world. Some people say, "Oh, I cannot go to a hall, I cannot go to a public meeting because the people affect me so." If you do them some good they cannot affect you. If they are more unfortunate than you, help them; if they are more fortunate they cannot harm you.

There is only one secret in all this dread of the "malign" influence of people, and that is: fear. Theology fastened this fear upon the people in the form of Satan, and the various forms of religions have incorporated this in various impersonated powers of malignity. Look in the glass when you are angry if you want to see Satan. Look into your own spirit if you want to see that which haunts you. There is no burglar that would want to come into this room now; he knows that our people do not have what he wants, and the murderer would not come in here to do his murder.

It is a piece of egotism to think that a spirit wants to haunt you, unless you have that which he seeks. If you are happy, if you are intelligent, you can help the spirit; if you are worse than the spirit the spirit may help you. If you are afraid, you do not know anything about spirit. Did your father, or your mother or teacher ever take you when you were a little child into a dark closet and let you feel around and see there were no bears there? Did you ever when a child go right up stairs after dark into father's room or mother's room and bring mamma something she wanted? you can go into the darkest slums in this city and if you are not in the state of the slums, nor the state of the fear of the slums they will not hurt you, if you are you will go there of your own accord.

We say, this fear is all there is of the "malign influence" of people. The "Evil Art," "Black Magic" and the baleful influence of the Sorcerer are the invention of fear, and first invented by people who wished to maintain power over others.

There may be teachers of supposedly "occult" things, mediums and others, who tell you to come to them to have "evil influences removed." Just go courageously into the dark corners of your own life and you will find nothing there but yourself. The great wide firmament of spiritual forces uses its influence according to the law of attraction. You need never fear anything worse than yourself, than your own thoughts.

As there is an absolute law governing the force that unites planets, worlds and systems; so there is a law governing the communion of souls and the communion of lives, and while it hurts you to send forth malignant thoughts, it does not hurt the one you send them to. It is like the boomerang; every malignant thought you send forth returns to you, and rarely goes beyond you. Nothing but fear will make anyone dread it. The only harm it can do anyone is through fear.

The ordinary influence of people over others, that which you consider harmful, or an oppressive influence may be alleviated by this knowledge and the added knowledge that if you place yourself in accord with the highest spiritual forces that are within, and that come to you from the realm unseen that in itself is harmony. Now anyone can go up to that instrument and make a discord, but you would let no one continue to do it, even if it were a baby you would not let it do it, very long. But the one who offers to perform knows something of harmony. So anyone who has an influence over your life is in a measure adjusted or attuned to your life, in a measure belongs to you, and this determines alike what they do to you and what you will do to them, and under these conditions you will be related to them definitely or not at all.

The truth is that the lines of life that link humanity together in this and all worlds at last resolves itself into a great chain of beneficent moral and spiritual principles and propositions. People are not let loose upon each other psychically as they think they are physically to destroy one another.

People seem to think that spirits are doing just what nations are doing, slaying one another. But they are not, they cannot do it. No one comes into your life or crosses your pathway who does not come to receive or give a blessing or a lesson.

MERITS OF THE CONFLICT BETWEEN RUSSIA AND JAPAN.

There is a disposition on the part of some people to show sympathy with Russia in her present differences with Japan, because Russia is a Christian, and Japan is a pagan, nation. It is thought by such persons that the success of the Russians would result in an advancement of civilization and Christianity.

The fact is, Japan is to-day the more progressive nation. She has made strides during the past quarter of a century compared with which the little progress made in Russia is insignificant. She has enlarged her commerce and her relations with the whole civilized world; she has increased the number and improved the quality of her public schools; she has adopted the methods of modern civilization; she has enlarged the liberties of her people; she has increased the number of free institutions; and she has, in every way, shown herself to be an up-to-date and genuinely progressive nation.

On the other hand, Russia is kept back by an inertia that is the result of her racial, as well as her political and religious conditions, and she has at the same time, shown an earth-hunger, an unscrupulousness in seizing foreign territory, and a relentless cruelty in slaughtering the people of the countries she has invaded, which are without parallel in modern civilization. The less we have of the Christianity of that sort the better for the world.

The following paragraph, quoted from The Outlook, may pertinently close what we have to say on this subject at the present time:

"It is true that Russia has long been regarded as a great power. It is true that Japan has just attained that dignity. Yet, Japan's commercial marine is much greater than Russia's, and so is Japan's ability to raise a loan. More important, still, Japan has proportionately three times as many children in elementary schools as has Russia. Russia's three times Japan's population, Russia's fifty times Japan's territory, sink into deserved insignificance beside this impressive educational fact. In trade and education, Japan is outdistancing Russia. War would not help but hinder Russia in that race."

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

ALL THE TIME.

What was the answer once you gave me, dear,
When for a time I had not seen your face,
And meeting, asked you had you thought of me
Since parting we had named our trysting place?
With loving glance you told me, "All the time."

That answer came to mind as yestereve
I sat alone; and, what that day you said,
Methought I heard in echoes of your voice,
"There is no death; dear heart, I am not dead,
But near, and thinking of you, darling, 'All the time.'"

A peace divine stole o'er my troubled heart,
Supreme my faith arose o'er time and space;
I know that when the silver cord is loosed
And rent the mystic veil that hides your face,
I shall be with you, darling, "All the time."

* * * * * * *

"Yes, all the time; 'mid tempest, calm or sun
I will be with you till your battle's won;
Then in a home prepared in sunnier clime
You will be with me where there is no time."

DEAFNESS CURED

By No Means Until "ACTINA" Was Discovered.

Ninety-five per cent of all cases of deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The air passages become clogged by catarrhal deposits, stopping the action of the vibratory bones. Until these deposits are removed a cure is impossible. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of aurists or physicians to cure. Ear drums are worse than useless. That there is a scientific cure for deafness and catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of Actina. The vapor current generated in the Actina passes through the Eustachian tubes into the middle ear, removing the catarrhal obstructions as it passes through the tubes, and loosens up the bones (hammer, anvil and stirrup) in the inner ear, making them respond to the slightest vibration of sound. Actina has never failed to cure ringing noises in the head. We have known people troubled with this distressing symptom for years to be completely cured in only three weeks' use of Actina. Actina also cures asthma, bronchitis, sore throat, weak lungs, colds and headache; all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh. Actina is sent on trial postpaid. Write us about your case. We give advice free, and positive proof of cures. A valuable book—Professor Wilson's 100 page Dictionary of Disease, Free. The Mystic Thesaurus,

Or Initiation in the Theoretical and Practical secrets of Astral Truth and Occult Art. By WILLIS F. WHITEHEAD, Editor Agrippa's "Natural Magic." The book treats of The Symbol of the Cross, Spiritual Gifts, Inspirational Conception, Initiative Exposition, The Astral Brotherhood, Message of the Brotherhood, The Magic Mirror, and Celestial Companionship. It is a good text book for students of the Mystic, and will be sent postpaid, in paper, for $1.00.

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH,

Or the Future Life According to Science. By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French by S. R. Crockee. A very fascinating work. This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author says: "There is a true and respectable idea in Spiritualism," and regards as proved "the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of earth." Price, $1.50.

THE SOUL:

ITS NATURE, RELATIONS AND EXPRESSIONS IN HUMAN EMBODIMENTS. Third edition now on sale. Price $1.00. This is one of the best books given by the guides of Mrs Cora L. V. Richmond. They are really lessons, published primarily, as a book of reference for those who have been members of the classes receiving them. This volume is a careful compilation from reports of lessons, containing the bases of the teachings.

THE MISSING LINK IN MODERN SPIRITUALISM.

By A. Leah Underhill, of the Fox Family.

Interesting and valuable as a history of the beginning of Modern Spiritualism, by one of the Fox Sisters. 478 Pages, 16 illustrations, including portraits of the Fox Family. History of the Hydesville rappings, as related by eye-witnesses; remarkable and well-attested manifestations; the "exposures," etc. Handsomely bound in cloth. But few copies remaining. Publishers' price, $1.50. We will send the book postpaid for $1.40.

A NEW CATECHISM,

BY M. M. MANGASARIAN.

This is a new "Catechism" in the full sense of the word. There has as yet appeared in the world of liberal literature nothing like this most wonderful little book or reason. B. P. Powell, the well-known author, the reviewer and critic, says: "The remarkable thing about this 'Catechism' is that it tells the truth." It deals with the questions of God. Immortality—the Creeds, the Clergy, the Church, Prayer and Salvation, Jesus and his Teaching, the Growth of the Christian Scriptures, and many other philosophical, scientific and ethical questions with the utmost candor, courage and clearness. 188 pages. Cloth 75c; paper, 50c

PSYCHOPATHY, OR SPIRIT HEALING.—A class in Psychopathy, or Spirit Healing, under the instruction of the spirit of Dr. Benj. Rush, through Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, is about to be formed. For further information inquire of Mr. Wm. Richmond, 3802 Ridge avenue, Rogers Park, Chicago, Illinois.

The Springfield Union has the following: "ORDERS HAVE GONE OUT FROM THE WASHINGTON POLICE FOR CLAIRVOYANTS, MEDIUMS AND MIND-READERS TO LEAVE THE CITY. POLITICAL FORECASTERS, PROPHETS OF EVIL AND CALAMITY HOWLERS IN CONGRESS ARE NOT TO BE DISTURBED."

L. I. Wilson, city editor of the Pueblo Star Journal, writes: "Mrs. L. O. Larson, a medium of this city, has been here for the past three years. While I am not a believer in Spiritualism, at the same time I am an honest investigator, and am moved to speak for her. I have watched her work, and what she manifests through clairvoyant and clairaudient forces (what she claims) is to my mind at least mysterious. She certainly has given tests that are marvelous; many would say supernatural. For many Sundays I have attended her meetings, and have been amazed at her manifestations. The rank and file of Pueblo citizens are all believers in Mrs. Larson's honesty and have the utmost faith in her work. Frankly, I am impelled to say that her work here has convinced me more of the mysteriousness in Spiritualism than twenty years of past investigation. Everyone who goes to her meetings (Sundays and Thursdays) is convinced that she is honest. She has given communications that are simply unanswerable, and has given her patrons and followers, and also skeptics, ample food for thought that no other manifestations could possibly accomplish."

Spiritual meeting, entertainment and dance, Thursday, March 3, 1904, at 8 p. m., at Hopkins' Hall, 528 West Sixty-third street. Program: Spirit messages by Mrs. Alice Gehring, Mrs. Mary Cochonour, Mrs. Blake, of Grand Rapids, and others. Solo by Mrs. Alice Markham. Recitations by Miss Esther Bucton and Grace Schoeneman, James. F. Hurlbut, James A. Patterson. Dialogue by Misses Esther Bucton and Grace Schoeneman. Admission, 25 cents.

The High Springs Journal, of Florida, has the following interesting item: "The trial at Jacksonville, Fla., of the mental science healer, Mrs. Helen Wilmans-Post, who is charged with devising a scheme to defraud divers persons and using the mails to further this scheme, brought out very little new evidence Wednesday. A letter from an Indiana woman was read and placed in evidence, in which she wanted to know if Mrs. Wilmans-Post would undertake to get her out of prison by using her mental treatment to persons who requested it by Mrs. Post's direction to the effect that nothing was impossible, and that she would take the case for $4 per month. It was brought out that she answered letters and promised to give her treatment to persons who requested it for every imaginable disease, and also for troubles of all kinds. She had agreed to give treatment for making a new set of teeth grow; to make a leg grow on a stump from which the lower limb had been amputated; to make hair grow on bald heads; to restore the affections for each other of persons who had become estranged; to transfer the affections of persons, and, in fact, to do anything she was asked to do."

Mrs. Flora M. Allen writes from Manhattan, Kansas: "Our society would like to correspond with genuine mediums who may be passing through our state, in regard to holding meetings here. Speakers and psychometric readers and test mediums are preferred. Address me in care of Box 711, Manhattan, Kansas."

A story that rivals Noah and the ark comes from the mouth of the White river, says the Vincennes Capital. Francis Fields, ferry at White river, lived with his family in a small house on the river bank. The high water threatened his home, but he paid no attention to it until a white dove flew across the raging river and perched on the house. It remained a whole day, cooing to the Fields family. Mr. Fields took this as an omen, and prepared to move out. By that time the water had risen so high that he had to wade to land. The family is now in a precarious condition as a result of the exposure, but is thankful to have been saved from drowning by the timely omen.

Mrs. Isa A. Cross, corresponding secretary writes: "Mr. Walter DeVoe will lecture for the Hyde Park Occult Society on March 6, at Alliance Hall, 323 East 55th street, at 7:45 p. m. Everybody come out, and have a good full house to welcome him. Our progressive euchre party on Feb. 23 was a grand success. We will probably have one about March 16, but will announce the date more positively later. The Club room where the euchre party is held is at 474 East 55th street. There are always fine hand-painted china pieces for prizes."

Dr. P. Douglas writes from Kentucky: "The books I ordered have been received all right: "I wish to say that I have enjoyed them to the fullest extent. I received a spirit rap immediately after they were delivered to me. When I read Dr. Peebles' book, I received another rap from the spirit world. I am clairvoyant and can see my friends on the other side of life quite frequently."

H. F. Coates writes: "Dr. J. H. Randall will lecture for the Church of the Spirit Communion, Kenwood Hall, 4308 Cottage Grove avenue, Sunday, March 6, at 8 p. m. The Doctor is one of our most able speakers and it is to be hoped a large audience will greet him. The subject of 'Development' was handled in a masterly manner, Feb. 21, by Mr. H. F. Arnold, who is one of our most promising speakers. Messages are given at all our meetings."

Prof. Delitsch, of "Babel and Bible" fame, Berlin, Germany, has again come to the front with elaborate objections to the present methods of imparting religious instruction in the schools. He says: "The findings in recent excavations in Mesopotamia should be put before schoolboys and girls. They should not be brought up in ignorance of the results of later investigations into the history of religion."

Prof. Delitsch, of Berlin, Germany, says: "I am opposed to having school boys and girls taught that the narrative about the world being made in seven days is true, or that there is any veracity in the statements that man was made of clay, that life was breathed into his nose, and that woman was made of a man's rib. I object to the tales about the ten patriarchs, about the summits of the highest mountains being covered deep with deluge water, and about the ark of Noah. Only truth and the whole truth can make one free."

The German-English Society Bund der Wahrheit No. 18, holds services every Sunday evening at 7:30 in Brandt's Hall, 152 E. North avenue, between Halsted and Clybourn; and every Wednesday evening at 7:30 in Garfield Turner Hall, corner of Garfield and Larrabee streets. Emil T. Vaas, leeturer; Frank Joseph, medium.

C. H. Murray writes from Elkhart, Ind.: "We have had hot times here the past few weeks. The altars have been hot and many have 'confessed' Christ and the preciousness of his 'blud,' and are singing, 'What a wonderful Savior is Jesus.'"

Percy Howard says: "It should now be borne in mind that to make suggestions to the subjective mind, it is not necessary for the recipient of the suggestion to be in a state of trance. There are many stages of hypnosis before the somnambulistic condition is reached, and the subjective mind at all stages is open to receive suggestion. This fact also must not be lost sight of. The subjective mind is just as amenable to the suggestions of its own objective mind as it is to the objective mind of another. Were it not so, the whole theory would fall. In other words, it is amenable to auto-suggestion. Thus is man constituted a free agent."

Through a hole in the ice a young mulatto woman was baptized recently in the Delaware river off East Camden. Her teeth chattered so that she could not respond to the questions asked her by the elders of Bishop Crowdy's Church of God. The convert was barefooted and attired in a thin gown. The elders carried axes with which to break through the ice. When a hole was made one of the taller elders jumped in. The water was up to his chin. Then a prayer of thanksgiving was made that the convert was not put in first, as she was short and the water would have been over her head. A hole over more shallow water was then cut. All this illustrates the fact that all the fools are not dead yet.

Wilson Duncan writes from Council Bluffs, Iowa: "Prof Henry Abbott is lecturing here at present. Not since Prof. Lockwood's sojourn here years ago, has Council Bluffs, Iowa, received such an awakening along scientific lines, far in advance of ordinary minds, in light, color and inner forces. He will doubtless be remembered as one of the world's great masters."

Word comes from Paris, France, that with a view to improving the standard of ballet dancing, a curious experiment has just been tried at the Opera Comique. In the presence of an audience of ballet dancers from the Opera and other theaters, a young woman woman named Mlle. Madeleine, who knows little of music or dancing, was thrown into a hypnotic sleep by Prof. Magnin, of the School of Magnetism. As soon as the instruments played she began to dance in the most graceful fashion, her movements reflecting the exquisite sensations produced upon her by the composer. The experiments are to be repeated in order to teach the dancers the art of expression and graceful movement.

Prof. Ransby writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "In regard to The Progressive Thinker, I would be sorry to do without it. I should like to see it in every Spiritualist home. It would be if justice were done to your paper. In regard to the Great Psychological Crime, I feel sure it will do good in the end. I would be glad if every Spiritualist had a copy of Brother C. W. Stewart's lecture to read and study. I am sure every good thinking medium would endorse the same."

A recent dispatch from Marshalltown, Iowa, has the following relative to Rev. Nathaniel Pye, formerly pastor of the Lyons M. E. church: As a result of some scathing remarks uttered by Rev. Nathaniel Pye in a recent sermon in the Methodist church, when he spoke on the subject, "Spiritualism, With the Testimony of God and Many Against It," a formal challenge to a debate with an expounder of Spiritualism, Rev. Moses Hull, pastor of the Spiritualists of this city, has been issued. The challenge is as follows: "Having graduated from the church into Spiritualism, we can say that we enjoy that which comes to us through Spiritualism, to say the least, as much as we ever enjoyed what we found in the church. When you ridicule and condemn Spiritualism you attack that which to us is as sacred as your religion is to you; in our estimation you are a blasphemer. Now, in the name of candor and fair dealing, we invite you to a public investigation of that religion which you denounce and affect to despise. Let the people hear both sides of the question on which we differ, and let that be from the same platform on the same evening."

Columbus Wells writes: "I have become impressed strongly with the idea that there is no intelligence outside of personal beings. The conclusion is that it is impossible for mind to exist without an organized body and brain. The spiritual form, or body and mind, can not be separated; one cannot exist without the other. People have made the great mistake in assuming that the earth and everything thereon had to be created. Space is boundless, so is the number of planets or worlds revolving therein. Each planet has its spiritual counterpart."

Mrs. L. Robinson writes from Baltimore, Md.: "We have a young society, a little over a year old, and we are making a determined stand for the glorious truth of Spiritualism. We stand by the teachings of Spiritualism as inculcated by The Progressive Thinker, and we admire the fearless way in which you expose the fakes and frauds. Go on with the good work, and may the time soon come when all who disgrace the cause shall hide their heads in shame, and relegate themselves to the rear."

Correspondent writes from Sioux City, Iowa: "By the mystifying influence of magic and all kinds of clever sleight of hand tricks, Alonzo Moore, traveling magician with the New South Jubilee Singers, who is said to be the only colored magician, entertained a fair-sized audience at the Y. M. C. A. gymnasium here. The jubilee singers also came in for their share of appreciation. Mr. Moore performed a number of tricks which were entirely new to many in the audience. The billiard ball trick, in which he made the little spheres appear and disappear at will, was especially clever, and which to people easily gulled would be called a most wonderful spirit materialization. When will gullible Spiritualists learn the difference between trickery and genuine spirit power?

Fallowfield township, Pa., residents are up in arms all because a number of people in that neighborhood declare that a light nightly shines in the window at the deserted pesthouse, and that consequently, they believe there are smallpox victims' ghosts about the place

When Mrs. Angeline Kreider died last Saturday morning it was known by some of her friends that she had quite a sum of money and a note. Saturday the house was thoroughly searched but the missing money could not be found and Monday morning the preparations to resume the search were made before they began. Rev. S. T. Dodge appeared on the scene and said that he had had a vision during the night and the hiding-place of the money had been revealed to him. He said he dreamed that a man appeared and asked him if he was worried over finding Mrs. Kreider"s money, and said that he was. The man then told him to look between two mattresses, on a certain bed, and he would find it. After his explanation the searchers went to the bed named and found the money, almost $100, and the note. While this may sound "fishy," it is true, and can be proven by responsible citizens.—Prairie City Herald.

W. E. Harvey writes: "I wish to state that I am a trumpet medium, capable of sitting under the strictest test conditions. I also get independent tablet writing. My brother, who is with me, a boy of 16 years, gets full-form materialization. We would like to visit good Spiritualists in Illinois, Missouri and Iowa. We will be in Booneville, Ind., for two or three weeks. Just finished a four weeks' stay there, last week. My address there will be W. E. Harvey, care of Dr. Grant Newton, Booneville, Ind."

Judge Garretson at Long Island City, N. Y., decided to grant a decree annulling the marriage of Margaret Jane Familton and Edward J. Roache. Miss Familton was married to Roache on October 12, 1903, by the Rev. Dr. Francis J. Snyder of the Lutheran church, Manhattan. On the day previous she had been married to Frederick S. Kirkman of Flushing by the Rev. Dr. Thorp of the Rosehill Methodist Episcopal church. Another action will be begun for the annulment of the girl's marriage to Kirkman. Kirkman is said to be out of the state, and notice will be served by publication. He is only 19 years old. Miss Familton was arrested on October 19 on a charge of bigamy made by Kirkman. She was subsequently tried and found guilty, but sentence was suspended. Her explanation of her dual marriage was that she was subject to hypnotic influence by Kirkman, and thus compelled to marry against her will.

Correspondent writes from Buffalo, N. Y.: "Harmony Circle Spiritual Society is in a prosperous condition. It has added quite a number to its roll of members this season. Our Sunday meetings are attracting good-sized audiences, and a large number of strangers attend. Our speaker and medium is Mr. Charles S. Hulbert. His work is of a high order. His message and test work is far beyond the ordinary. Our entertainments so far this winter have been a financial as well as a social success, and our commodious and cozy hall has been taxed to its utmost. Our vice-president, Mrs. M. E. Lane is also doing a good work. Her mediumship has taken wonderful strides and she bids fair to become one of the best message bearers in this country. Our developing circles, are largely attended, and all its members show marked improvement and spiritual culture, and some will make fine mediums, and are better men and women for it in every way. We as a body think that The Progressive Thinker is doing a grand work, and wish it the greatest possible success, in upholding and upbuilding our glorious cause."

A paper published in Fort Scott, Kansas, has the following: "Mrs. Virginia Bryan, the lady who delivered two lectures in our city last week, was pronounced the best exponent of the occult that ever has visited here. The many people who were fortunate enough to hear her are loud in the praise of her wonderful powers. It is said, 'that it was easy to see she was under control of some foreign power other than her own.' The Bourbon County Occult Association, which meets every Sunday night in the parlor of the W. O. W. hall, has secured some excellent talent along these lines of thought, but no one ever portrayed the beauties of the new thought with more ease and comfort than Mrs. Bryan. It is only regretted that more people did not hear her. Mrs. Bryan is an ordained minister of the gospel of Spiritualism, having ordination papers from the states of Ohio and Illinois. Fort Scott was the only city in Kansas that Mrs. Bryan visited and we feel highly honored. She came from Cedar Rapids, Iowa, where she had been lecturing for two weeks and came to Fort Scott for Sunday, Feb. 7, stopping over Friday, the 19th, then going to Denver, Colo., where she receives a large salary for one month's work. Mrs. Bryan may stop over on her return trip. We only wish she could stay with us always."

Dr. H. E. Ballard writes: "In answer to the question, 'What is home?' allow me to say: Home is a bulwark provided by the husband for the preservation of his loved companion; the wife's infirmary where with her angel tread and tireless hands she succors the mental and physical needs of her loved companion; the mother's sanctuary for the preservation of the flock over which her heart centers, shields them from the elements and temptations, guides their erring steps with love, forgives their misdemeanors, and sacrifices her life's force to soothe pain and banish care. That holy name of mother awakens the God in man, and hangs on the lips as cherished memories of the past."

Following the recent Holy Roller excitement, Corvallis, Oregon, is now much aroused over the manifestations of two Seattle Spiritualists who are giving seances at the Maitland House. One of these men is W. H. Kanouse, and the other is F. W. Rowe. The former is the physical medium and the latter, the photo medium. These men have power, they claim, to produce the picture of people who have passed to the other world; to recall and converse with departed spirits and do other strange and uncanny things. From 10 to 25 people attended a seance, a few evenings ago, and besides hearing an orchestra of stringed instruments played by alleged spirits, the crowd saw and heard enough to leave them thoroughly mystified. The mediums claim that their power is simply a gift, and does not come from study nor other source. The two men came to Corvallis on invitation from friends.—Portland (Ore.) Journal.

Emil T. Vaas writes: "Allow me to send you a short report from the Chicago field. On the evening of Feb. 18, while quietly reading the Psychological Crime, our bell rang violently, and on opening the door a noisy crowd rushed in, crying, Surprise! Surprise! Well, we were surprised indeed. The society Bund der Wahrheit No. 18, which we have been serving as lecturer for the greater part of last year, came laden with packages of good things to eat, flowers and presents of various kinds, together with a substantial donation in gold and paper money, which they overwhelmed us with in remembrance of our 51st birthday anniversary. Mr. Frank Joseph, medium, made a very kind address to which we responded as best we could under the circumstances. All then spent a very enjoyable evening until nearly 2 o'clock in the morning, when we reluctantly gave the good-bye to each other, retaining the memory of a happy evening, happily enjoyed by all."

Frank T. Ripley has been lecturing at Findlay, Ohio, and the paper published there reports him as saying in one of his lectures: "Spiritualism proves man's immortality and the existence of a spiritual universe. It destroys all fear of death, annihilates the doctrine of eternal punishment, and substitutes the cheering assurance of eternal progress. It sweeps away the idea of a personal devil and locates the sources of evil in man's own imperfections. It denies the immoral and soul-corrupting doctrines of any vicarious atonements for sin, and, on the testimony of millions of immortal spirits, solemnly affirms that every guilty soul must arise and become its own savior. It ignores the degrading conception of a martial and vindictive God, and substitutes the worship of an infinite, Eternal and all-perfect Spirit, as Alpha and Omega, all love, wisdom and law. It abolishes the absurd and materialistic conception of the theological heaven and hell, making each a state of happiness or misery, dependent on the good or evil within the soul itself. It is the death-blow to superstition, sectarianism and religious persecution, but the friends and promoters of all reforms that tend to elevate and benefit humanity. While Spiritualism proclaims that there is a standard of truth in everything, it acknowledges man's incapacity to discover all truth, and therefore it fetters no one's opinions and teaches, but never forces its beliefs on any one. Concerning all spiritual life, state and being, Spiritualism accepts no theories that are not sustained by proven facts and corroborative testimony. Its phenomena being based on immutable principles of law, open up endless arenas of new research for science, and its consensus of revelations being founded upon facts, tend to place true religion on the basis of science, and vitalizes science with all that is true and practical in religion."

Mrs. Mary Ince writes from Lafayette, Ind.: "Rev. E. W. Sprague and wife, N. S. A. Missionaries, have just closed a second series of lectures in our society, which has been very beneficial, and greatly enjoyed by all. There was a large attendance throughout the entire series, and great interest manifested. They arrived here on Jan. 1, and on the 8th they organized the Psychic Spiritualist Society of Lafayette, Ind., with 40 members, and left here on the 11th of January. Since that time the society has leased the old Universalist church on Ninth street for one year, and have papered and fitted it up for their exclusive use. Brother Sprague was called back last Sunday to dedicate our new church. He highly approves the step taken to place the society on a higher plane where its light may shine throughout the land, and show to the world that we are not ashamed to proclaim the truths of Spiritualism."

Mrs. M. Henry, secretary, writes: "The Ladies' Auxiliary connected with the Universal Occult Society held its first social under its state charter at the residence of its president, Mrs. Davenport, 3138 Rhodes avenue. At least seventy-five were in attendance. Harmony reigned supreme. The enjoyable occasion will long be remembered and be repeated every second Saturday evening. The vocal and instrumental music was inspiring to that extent that it brought forth a very beautiful poetic improvisation from Mrs. Karcher, also very appropriate remarks from Princess Viroquo, Mrs. Bliss-Green, Mrs. Hansen and others. A poem was read by Prof. P. C. Marsh of Boston. Mrs. McMenamin did excellent psychometric work. Mrs. Burland, Mr. Hillis, Mr. Phillips and others entertained with tests and messages, also palm readings. This very enjoyable occasion happened to fall upon the birthday anniversary of the treasurer, Mrs. Wills, who was made the happy recipient of a magnificent palm, one of nature's emblems of eternal life. The presentation speech by the president was followed by a very affectionate response from the recipient. A Book on Solar Biology should have been presented to her, but through some neglect it did not arrive in time. She will get it later. She also received a large birthday cake and all seemed to enjoy it very much. The Universal Occult Society holds conference meetings at 3 p. m.; speaking, tests and messages. Lecture followed by messages, at 8 p. m., every Sunday in Hall C, at 77 East 31st street, near Cottage Grove avenue."

Arzelia C. Clay writes: "I left Grant, Mich., Jan. 16, and came to Grand Rapids. I find considerable interest manifested in the great subject of immortality. It is pleasant to meet with those whose hearts are in the work. Miss Emma Gibbs takes an unfeigned interest in the cause. We feel assured she will become an earnest and eloquent speaker for future days. Mrs. John Lindsey holds meetings at the Soldiers' Home; as she is everybody's friend, we wish her much success. Mrs. James Walker is likely to become a fine test medium. Our kind friends, Mr. and Mrs. D. Hinkley, residing in the Hermitage, Grand Rapids, are doing a good work for the sick. We were greatly interested in the picture of a guide, Jehozadak, who was a high priest of Israel more than 500 years before Christ! This fine portrait was given Mr. Hinkley through the mediumship of Mrs. Augusta Ferris. Mr. Samuel Smith has organized a home circle at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Chas. Haynes, on North Lafayette street. Friends meet every Thursday afternoon. They are entitled to hearty thanks from the writer for the hospitality given. The good talk from a German control, and the sharp wit of Jimmy Jones (two guides of Father Smith), will be well remembered. My present address is 91 Bostwick street, Grand Rapids, Mich. Finding Sister Sarah L. Davis very sick and low, I am serving in the capacity of nurse. Mrs. Davis is a thorough Spiritualist. She is not able to read and write at the present time, but if friends will send her a few good wishes, I will take charge of her mail to the best of my ability."

Mrs. A. Sexsmith writes: "The Rising Sun Spiritualist Mission, which meets at Star Lodge Hall, No. 378 S. Western avenue, held a Package Party on Monday evening, Feb. 22, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Green, 770 West Van Buren street. We were sorry that Mrs. Green was not able to be with us, as she was called away to the sick bed of her mother, but the party was a grand success. The packages, as they were sold off to the highest bidder, afforded much merriment. Our president, Bro. Kerchner, certainly never worked harder than he did selling off the packages, but each one sold rapidly. We had an enjoyable half-hour with the talking-machine, and then came the raffling of a beautiful sofa pillow donated by our vice-president, Sister Close, and which was the lot of the writer to obtain. Our palmistry parlor was well patronized. Our good sister, Mrs. Trafton, dressed as a gypsy, rendered great satisfaction. We had some recitations and instrumental music, and every one went home feeling that they spent an enjoyable evening, although they may have been lighter in pocket, as the proceeds exceeded $28. We thank the dear friends and members very much for their kindness."

There is many a trouble
Would break like a bubble,
And into the waters of Lethe depart,
Did we not rehearse it
And tenderly nurse it,
And give it a permanent place in our heart.
There's many a sorrow
Would vanish to-morrow
Were we but willing to furnish the wings;
But, sadly intruding,
And quietly brooding,
It hatches out all sorts of horrible things.

The Elmira (N. Y.) Advertiser has the following in reference to Mr. Edgerly: "The spirit of John McCarty, a sailor who died at his home in Newburyport, Mass., in 1882, addressed the congregation at the services in the First Spiritualist Church last evening, speaking through the mediumship of the Rev. Oscar A. Edgerly, who is conducting the services in this church for a short time, at least that is what Mr. Edgerly claims. In this connection it may be stated on the same authority, that it was McCarty's spirit which first made Mr. Edgerly's mediumship manifest at a meeting which the latter attended in 1885. Mr. Edgerly stated to an Advertiser reporter that he was sitting quietly in the meeting when he was suddenly and without premonition completely entranced and that the spirit guides then foretold the work they would perform through his instrumentality. His mediumship having been developed exactly as foretold Mr. Edgerly states that he realized that it was the obvious desire of his guides that he should devote his entire time to his mediumship work, which he has since done. McCarty last evening recapitulated his entire life. He was a most entertaining spook. An Irishman, he spoke with the brogue of a true son of Erin, the flashes of wit and humor that frequently convulsed the audience, being typical of the Irish race. Briefly stated, John McCarty was a sailor residing in Unicorn street, Newburyport, Mass., where he died in 1882. In the words of McCarty himself, as interpreted by Mr. Edgerly, 'I woke up one morning to find myself dead.' It was then that he became converted to Spiritualism when he found that he could, through a medium, communicate with those still living on earth. McCarty, who claimed to have been very intemperate while on earth, made a strong, earnest plea for temperance in the use of alcoholic beverages, giving a detailed explanation of the ill effects which result from the abuse of alcohol, which he says dwarfs the soul. In closing he made a plea for an impartial investigation into all things to determine their truth. Mr. Edgerly stated that the meeting last evening was given more as a social and should not be considered as typical of the regular Sunday services. At the Sunday afternoon meeting questions asked by any one in the congregation will be answered, the only stipulation being that they are germane."

The Rev. R. C. Filingham, vicar of Hexton, England, is back in New York, prepared to carry out his threat made when he was in that city last June, to "root priestcraft from the Protestant Episcopal Church." He says that the mind has a great influence on the body, and that when the mind becomes priest-ridden the body is bound to fail, and adds: "I can cite Spain and Italy as instances where a priest-ridden people have become inferior. So sure as we become ritualists we will degenerate to their level. The Russians are another race predominated by priests, and the result of this war will be that because they are a degenerate people they will be conquered. I shall now begin to organize my committee of prominent men, many of whom have expressed their willingness to join me in making a public protest. Meanwhile I shall write articles protesting against ritualism, and I shall hire halls in various cities in which to work up public indignation. Then next fall, when I come here again, I shall go to one of your high churches and make my stand. I may be arrested and imprisoned, but that will be only the beginning of my work."

Jennie P. Merchant writes from Wichita, Kansas: "On the morning of the 23rd ult., my mother, Mrs. E. O. Fyfe (who came lately from Chicago) told me she had felt a breath pass her face, and in it the words, 'The Russians have taken Corea.' Why such a thing should happen to her, she is at a loss to determine, as she has taken no interest whatever in Russo-Japanese situation. I have written you this as a matter for future reference."

Mrs. Addie Cooper writes from Syracuse N. Y.: "I would like to tell you about the First Society of Spiritualists in this city. Mr. E. G. Reiley is the president; Alfred Underhill, vice-president; Mr. C. A. Whitlock, secretary; Mrs. Nellie Binning, treasurer and speaker; Mrs. G. H. Garner test medium. The society is composed of about 30 or 40 members and are mostly tried and true. We meet in Dr. Butterfield's hall on Sunday at 3 o'clock, to hold lyceum; then the truth seekers' class convenes; then at 7:30 p. m. we have the usual lecture and messages. Our hall is well filled, many times standing-room being at a premium. Through the efforts of our esteemed president we have enjoyed the privilege of listening for two evenings this week to the esteemed brother and co-worker, Harrison D. Barrett, formerly editor of the Banner of Light, Boston, Mass. The sentences flow from his lips in a very easy eloquent manner, and every word so plain that anyone can understand its meaning. We have secured his services as a pastor for two months, beginning with March 1. He is now on his way to Anderson, Ind., to organize a state association."

Some one writes from Clinton, Iowa, as follows, but neglects to sign the name: "I am still working as medium and speaker for the Philosophical Society of Clinton, trying to spread the beautiful truths of the spiritual philosophy to all who will listen. I am trying to make people realize that Spiritualism is a practical, vital religion that can be lived seven days in the week, and not like a Sunday coat to be taken off on Monday morning and hung in the closet; that it is a science which can be applied to every act and experience of life; a religion that ought to make us better men and women, truer friends, more peaceful neighbors, and more worthy citizens. If Spiritualism has not done this for us, it is because we have not gained a true conception of it, or have not made a proper application of its principles to our lives. Sometimes I think we become so absorbed in what is going on in the skies that we lose sight of the work that is lying all about us waiting for the services of true hearts and willing hands. We roll our eyes upward and crave the help of our 'loved ones gone before,' while our loved ones left behind are in need of our ministrations. Angels will help us only in using our powers to help others. But I did not intend to preach a sermonette, I only wanted to say I am here, and will answer calls for funerals within a reasonable distance of Clinton. Address me at No. 223, Seventh avenue."

C. W. Stewart writes from St. Louis, Mo.: "Mr. Folsom has been very sick for two weeks with a malignant attack of erysipelas in his face, and is still hovering between life and death. All our meetings and work of every kind is stopped, and God knows what the outcome will be. If Mr. Folsom recovers at all he is liable to lose his sight, but we are hoping for the best." Pastor Predicts His Death.—Rev. Clarence M. Folsom Passes Away Near Hour He Fixed. St. Louis, Mo., Feb. 28.—Arousing himself from a feverish slumber before dawn to-day, Rev. Clarence M. Folson, assistant pastor of the Church of Spiritual Unity, predicted to his wife that he would be dead before 4 o'clock in the afternoon. At 3:45 he peacefully passed away. He had suffered three weeks from erysipelas.—Chicago Chronicle.

The subject of the discourse at the Church of the Soul, Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, pastor, on Sunday, March 6, will be: "The Spiritual and Material Significance of the War in the Orient."

G. S. Foster writes from Pepsin, Wis.: "Will you kindly allow me to speak a word of praise through the medium of The Progressive Thinker, for one who is justly deserving. We have just been given a rare treat by Will J. Erwood, secretary of the Wisconsin State Spiritualists Association, who lectured here on the 22nd and 23rd of this month. Although we have but a handful of Spiritualists here, the hall was well filled both evenings. Mr. Erwood is an able speaker, the audience being, on both occasions, held spellbound. We bespeak for Mr. Erwood, a brilliant future."

March 10 Will See Awful Human Slaughter! New York, Feb. 27.—A spirit which, he says, appeared to him some years ago and returned to repeat its warnings at various intervals, has revealed to Chesser Lortie of 157 Miller avenue, Brooklyn, the coming of a vast conflict that is to involve two hundred million people, and in which sixty-six millions will be killed. To forestall this horror Lortie has written President Roosevelt and Pope Pius to warn them that the war between Russia and Japan is the beginning of the threatened struggle in which Japan, England and the United States are to be arrayed against Russia, Germany and France. Austria, Spain, Italy and Turkey are to be involved and the outcome of the whole mix-up will be that Turkey will be dismembered and England will be severely beaten. She will only be saved from total annihilation, he says, by the timely assistance of the United States. Lortie predicts that by March 10 the vital change will occur. The prophet is thirty years old and lives with a widowed mother and brother in a cozy flat in East New York. He has been a clerk in the employ of the Long Island Railroad thirteen years, and in his off moments has given himself up to matters occult...—Chicago American.

Theodore Nicols writes: "One of the most enjoyable events of the season was appreciated by those present at the entertainment given by the Progressive Spiritual Society, at Heuser's Hall, Sunday, Feb. 21, The program was opened by the worthy president, Mr. Hill, followed by an address rendered by Dr. Warne, president of the I. S. S. A., which was received with the usual satisfaction. The Misses Doderwalds, with their selection of music, captivated the audience, which compelled a further display of their talent. Next on the program was an original poem, 'Burning of the Iroquois,' composed and rendered by W. D. McKenna, which was received with great enthusiasm. Elocution, songs and recitation added much to the applause of the audience. The astrological readings by Mrs. Noyse were well received. The spirit messages by Mrs. Howes and Mrs. Hilbert (pastor of the society) were highly appreciated. A good supper was served, followed by a social evening. Everybody went away with a pleasant remembrance of the occasion."

Addie J. Simpson writes: "I care not how the mediums stumble over syllables, if they have the power of the spirit and are able to convince the skeptic of immortality."

Mrs. Burland writes that on March 6, she will speak for the Star Mission Society on the West Side, and that Mrs. Nora Hill will speak for her church, Light of Truth, 47th and Cottage Grove avenue. She also holds socials where there are always a number of good mediums to give tests, good music and lunch, the second and fourth Wednesday evenings. Circles Tuesday evening at 3019 Vernon avenue.

E. Wonderly writes from Defiance, Ohio: "The Spiritualist Society held a meeting Sunday, Feb. 21. Mrs. Carrie Curran, of Toledo, state president, was our speaker. This inspired speaker gave two lectures, afternoon and evening, followed by readings in Psychometry. We feel encouraged to go on with the good work. As this is a newly organized society, we will be pleased to hear from any of the missionaries who may pass this way, and also ask the good wishes of sister societies."

Charles Nuss writes from Harrisburg, Pa.: "Chas. Theo. Schneider, formerly of Williamsport, Pa., was in our city aiding us to unite ourselves together. Through his inspirational power much good work has been accomplished. He goes from here to Renwo, Pa."

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

On the morning of February 20, the "Silent Messenger" came as a blessed Angel of Release to Mrs. Martha J. Tyler, aged 74 years and who for fifteen months has been helpless and speechless through a stroke of paralysis. She was the beloved mother of the well-known medium, Mrs. S. T. Elliott, of San Diego, Cal. Appropriate funeral exercises were conducted by the writer, at Whitson's undertaking parlors, after which the deserted tenement, amid a profusion of flowers, was laid to rest in Mount Hope Cemetery.

WILL C. HODGE.

Passed to spirit life, Feb. 13, 1904, at the home of his niece, Mrs. John Cook, No. 15 Bassick avenue, Bridgeport, Ct., Mr. William Adams, aged 75 years. He was a good friend, a firm believer in spirit return and a kind, harmonious old gentleman. Services by the Rev. Dr. Beckwith G. Ewell.

MRS. JOHN COOK.

Passed to spirit life, Feb. 14, 1904, Leonard Harrington, at Selma, Oregon, aged 75 years. Comrade Harrington had been a Spiritualist for fifty years. He was a veteran of the Civil war.

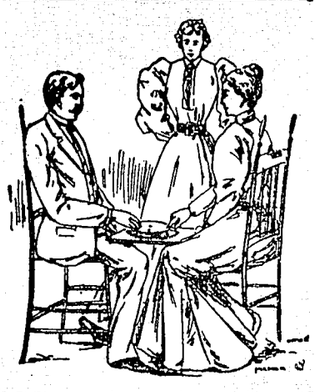
E. D. HAGAN.

The infant son of W. T. and A. G. Patton, of Pittsburg, Pa., passed to spirit life, Feb. 4, 1904. The services were conducted by Rev. L. M. Oles, of the Psychic Research Society of Allegheny, Pa.

Passed to spirit life, George Little, of Warren Summit, N. H. Our brother was more than kind to aged pilgrims, who many times get abused in this too-often rough journey of life. His last words were: "The sun will rise and set just the same when I am gone; morn, noon and night will come and go. I would like to work longer, but it is God's will for me to go. I bid you all a kind good night."

ARZELIA C. CLAY.

Passed to the higher life, Mrs. Abagail Bassford, of pneumonia, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Emma L. Worth, 516 West Madison street, Chicago. Services conducted by G. V. Cordingley. She had been a life-long Spiritualist, and was loved by all who knew her. A DAUGHTER.



Wm. Whitsel, of Dallas, Texas, passed to the higher life, Feb. 17, aged 70 years, leaving sister and two brothers to mourn his earthly loss, but in the full realization that he has only passed to a higher life. Funeral services at the home of Mrs. J. R. Davis, his sister, conducted by Mrs. Alice Baker.

Mrs. Louise C. Clisbee, of Danville, N. Y., passed to the higher life, Feb. 20, 1904, after a brief illness. An earnest Spiritualist, of whom it can truly be said, "She has done the very best she could." Her greatest pleasure was in assisting others to the light. When reading some poem in The Progressive Thinker, she often said, "This is food for my soul." A Galveston sufferer.

COR.

Mrs. Mattie E. Hursen, bade adieu to her loved ones at the home of her son, H. H. Hursen, Feb. 22, and departed for the spirit land. She was in her 61st year, and had been suffering with rheumatism for a long time, and was quite anxious to go, was even impatient, but had to stay in the form as long as there was anything to cling to. Upon her special request a very short and simple service was held, presided over by the writer hereof, and the remains were taken to the Graceland Crematory, for incineration. Mrs. Hursen was well known in the Spiritualistic ranks as a staunch advocate of the philosophy, but was not a public worker.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH
—OR—
DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Ware in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

Albert W. Miller: Q. How do spirits foretell the future? Are there any books except "The Discovered Country" giving an account of the inhabitants of the planets?

A. All events run from cause to effect, and every effect is the result of cause or causes. The astronomer taking the position of the earth, moon and sun, can by the well-known laws of their motions predict eclipses for unnumbered years, or go backward and give the day and second of the times they have occurred. The events which go into the conduct of life are more obscure and diverse, yet if the causes are all known, the effect they will produce is certain, and this effect, becoming a cause leading to other effects, may be taken as a stepping stone, and thus by steps from cause to effect, the future may be predicted.

There is no faculty or power of mind, in mortal or spirit, which presciently, or intuitively penetrates the veil of the future. A clairvoyant or sensitive may receive such prophecy, but if true, it is received from some mind that has wrought it out, by means of superior knowledge. In limited ways persons in this life are doing this same prophetic work all the time. They often fail, and often succeed, and their method is the same that spirits of the most profound mental powers must follow.

There are seven, possibly nine, planets in the solar system. There may be one inside the orbit of Mercury and one oueside the orbit of Neptune, and the orbit occupied by the unknown number of fragmentary asteroids. There have been many descriptions of the inhabitants of these planets, all fanciful, and without the least evidence of correctness. In fact, the conditions which prevail on all these planets, the relations of heat and light, are such as to make it impossible for any beings like those inhabiting the earth to exist on any of them.
